European Community – Trade marks – Registration – Distinctiveness – Surname – Factors to be taken into account in assessment of distinctive character – Common surname – Whether limitation on proprietor’s rights in relation to other’s trade use of own name relevant to assessment – Council Directive (EEC) 89/104, arts 3(1)(b), 6(1)(a).

Nichols, a company incorporated in the United Kingdom, applied to the Registrar of Trade Marks (the registrar) for registration of the surname ‘Nichols’ as a trade mark for products including vending machines, and food and drink of the type typically dispensed through such machines. The registrar granted the application in respect of vending machines, but refused it in respect of all other products. He found that the surname ‘Nichols’, including its phonetic equivalent ‘Nicholls’ and its singular form ‘Nichol’, was common in the United Kingdom and was not capable of communicating that food and drink goods originated from one and the same undertaking. In view of the nature of the business involved and the potential size of the market for those goods, ‘Nichols’ could be used by other manufacturers and providers and, accordingly, the surname was devoid of distinctive character; the market for vending machines, however, was more specialised, with fewer people trading in it and therefore the mark could be registered in respect of those goods. Nichols appealed to the Chancery Division of the High Court of England and Wales, which considered that a question had arisen whether a fairly common surname had to be regarded as ‘devoid of distinctive character’ until it had acquired a distinctive character through use; and that it was proper to take account of the limitation of the effects of the mark as provided for in art 6(1)(a)<sup>a</sup> of First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 (to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks). Article 6(1)(a) provided that a trade mark would not entitle the proprietor to prohibit a third party from using, in the course of trade, his own name or address provided he used them in accordance with honest practices in industrial or commercial matters. Accordingly, the national court stayed the proceedings and referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling pursuant to art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) questions concerning, inter alia, in what circumstances should a trade mark (ie a ‘sign’ which complied with the requirements of art 2<sup>b</sup> of Directive 89/104) consisting of a single surname be refused registration as being in itself ‘devoid of any distinctive character’ within the meaning of art 3(1)(b)<sup>c</sup> and what conditions applied to the assessment, in the context of art 3(1)(b), of the distinctiveness or otherwise of a trade mark constituted by a surname, particularly where that surname was common, and whether the fact that the effects of registration were limited pursuant to art 6(1)(a) had an impact on that assessment.

Held – In the context of art 3(1)(b) of Directive 89/104, the assessment of the existence or otherwise of the distinctive character of a trade mark constituted by a surname, even a common one, had to be carried out specifically, in accordance with the criteria applicable to any sign covered by art 2 of the directive, in relation, first, to the products or services in respect of which registration was applied for and, second, to the perception of the relevant consumers. The fact that the effects of registration of the trade mark were limited by virtue of art 6(1)(a) had no impact on that assessment. Article 2 contained a list of signs which could constitute a trade mark, provided that such signs were capable of distinguishing the goods or services of one undertaking from those of other undertakings, ie that they fulfilled the trade mark's function as an indicator of origin. That list expressly includes 'personal names'. Furthermore, in assessing distinctiveness, art 3(1)(b) drew no distinction between different categories of trade mark. The criteria for assessment of the distinctive character of trade marks constituted by a personal name were therefore the same as those applicable to the other categories of trade mark. Whilst it could prove more difficult to establish the distinctive character of trade marks in certain categories than that of those in other categories, that could not justify the assumption that such marks were a priori devoid of distinctive character or could not acquire such character through use. Article 6(1)(a) limited in a general way the right granted by a mark after its registration, that is after the existence of the mark's distinctive character had been established. It could not therefore be taken into account for the purposes of the specific assessment before the trade mark was registered (see judgment paras 25, 29, 33, 34, below).

I—INTRODUCTION

h 1. The present proceedings raise the problem of the distinctive character of common surnames within the sphere of intellectual property.

The United Kingdom Trade Marks Registry consistently refuses to register ordinary surnames which occur frequently in the London telephone directory, provided that there is a large number of operators in the market for the goods or services designated.

i It should be noted at the outset that neither the Trade Marks Directive<sup>2</sup> nor any general principle requires surnames to be treated differently from other types of mark. Their specific distinctive character must be assessed in relation to the products which they are intended to cover and the perception of the consumers concerned. Nevertheless, it must be recognised that such consumers are accustomed, particularly in the case of services carried out by certain professional practitioners, to the use of a surname to indicate the origin of the service. Very frequently occurring surnames in a given sector may be disqualified from use as trade marks on the ground that they lack the necessary distinctive character.

II—LEGISLATIVE BACKGROUND

1—Community law: the Trade Marks Directive

2. According to art 2 of the directive, a trade mark—

‘may consist of any sign capable of being represented graphically, particularly words, including personal names, designs, letters, numerals, the shape of goods or of their packaging, provided that such signs are capable of distinguishing the goods or services of one undertaking from those of other undertakings.’

3. Article 3(1) goes on to provide:

‘1. The following shall not be registered or if registered shall be liable to be declared invalid:

- (a) signs which cannot constitute a trade mark;
- (b) trade marks which are devoid of any distinctive character;
- (c) trade marks which consist exclusively of signs or indications which may serve, in trade, to designate the kind, quality, quantity, intended purpose, value, geographical origin, or the time of production of the goods or of rendering of the service, or other characteristics of the goods or service;
- (d) trade marks which consist exclusively of signs or indications which have become customary in the current language or in the bona fide and established practices of the trade ...
- (g) trade marks which are of such a nature as to deceive the public, for instance as to the nature, quality or geographical origin of the goods or service ...’

4. The Trade Marks Directive authorises registration of a sign which falls within any of the cases described in para (1)(b), (c) or (d), if it in fact enables the origin of the goods or services to be identified. Article 3(3) states:

‘A trade mark shall not be refused registration or declared invalid in accordance with paragraph 1(b), (c) or (d) if, before the date of application for registration and following the use which has been made of it, it has acquired a distinctive character.’

5. Article 6(1), under the heading ‘Limitation of the effects of a trade mark’, provides:

‘The trade mark shall not entitle the proprietor to prohibit a third party from using, in the course of trade,

- (a) his own name or address;
- (b) indications concerning the kind, quality, quantity, intended purpose, value, geographical origin, the time of production of goods or of rendering of the service, or other characteristics of goods or services;

a (c) the trade mark where it is necessary to indicate the intended purpose of a product or service, in particular as accessories or spare parts; provided he uses them in accordance with honest practices in industrial or commercial matters.’

b 6. The provisions of the directive cited above coincide almost exactly with arts 4, 7(1) and (3) and 12(1) of the Community Trade mark Directive<sup>3</sup>.

2—Domestic legislation

7. The Trade Marks Directive was incorporated in domestic law by means of the Trade Marks Act 1994, which superseded a statute that had been in force since 1938.

c 8. In May 2000, the Registrar of Trade Marks published Practice Amendment Circular 6/00 (hereinafter PAC 6/00), concerning the registration of names and surnames.

9. The following passages from that circular are particularly relevant:

d ‘5. In judging the capacity of a surname to distinguish the goods or services of one undertaking the Registrar will consider:

a. the commonness of the surname;

b. the number of undertakings engaged in the trade and from whom the goods or services specified in the application can be said to originate.

e 6. For this purpose the number of relevant undertakings includes manufacturers, designers and specialist retailers of goods, and providers of services.

f 7. The Registrar will continue to have regard to the London Telephone Directory in assessing the commonness of a surname. However, with the continuing increase in the number of telephone users it is now possible for a name which appears a significant number of times in the London Telephone Directory to be quite uncommon. Consequently, the Registrar will not regard a surname as “common” unless it appears 200 times in the London or other appropriate telephone directory.’

g 10. The reasoning underlying the two criteria of assessment set out in the circular is that the smaller the number of operators active in a given market, the more likely it is that the average consumer will perceive in a surname, even one that occurs frequently, a sign capable of distinguishing the goods or services of a particular undertaking. PAC 6/00 gives as examples the producers of agricultural chemicals and providers of airline services<sup>4</sup>.

h 11. Conversely, where a very large number of operators are involved, it is more difficult for the public to identify a commercial origin on the basis of a common surname. By way of illustration, the circular refers to manufacturers of clothing and foodstuffs or drinks, and law firms<sup>5</sup>.

III—FACTUAL BACKGROUND

i 12. Nichols plc (hereinafter Nichols) is a commercial company incorporated in the United Kingdom. On 8 August 2000 it applied to the United Kingdom

3 Council Regulation (EC) 40/94 (on the Community trade mark) (OJ 1994 L11 p 1), as amended by Council Regulation (EC) 3288/94 (amending Regulation 40/94 on the Community trade mark for the implementation of the agreements concluded in the framework of the Uruguay Round) (OJ 1994 L349 p 83).

Trade Marks Registry for registration of a word sign 'Nichols' to designate goods belonging to classes 29, 30 and 32 of the Nice Agreement<sup>6</sup>. The goods concerned are automatic vending machines and products frequently sold by that means, essentially foodstuffs and drinks. The company did not claim acquisition of distinctiveness through use.

13. By decision of 11 May 2001, the Trade Marks Registry granted the application regarding automatic vending machines but refused it in relation to the other indications. In giving its reasons, it relied on the two criteria laid down in PAC 6/00<sup>7</sup>, taking the view.

First, that the surname 'Nichols', together with phonetically similar names, such as 'Nicholls' or, in the singular, 'Nichol', are common surnames in the United Kingdom, since they appear 483 times in the London telephone directory.

Second, that the food and drinks market, covered by classes 29, 30 and 32, in respect of which registration was applied for, is made up of a large number of operators, so that it is difficult for consumers to identify the commercial origin of the products from a common surname.

As regards automatic vending machines (included in class 9), the Registry recognised that this is a rather more specialised sector, in which fewer undertakings operate.

14. Nichols appealed against that decision by application of 14 February 2002, which came before the High Court of Justice of England and Wales, Chancery Division (which has jurisdiction at first instance in, among others, industrial property matters) under s 76(3) of the 1994 Act.

15. In his order for reference, Jacob J, after explaining the practice followed by the United Kingdom Trade Marks Registry regarding the registration of common surnames as trade marks, adds that the real question is whether a fairly common surname should be regarded as 'devoid of any distinctive character' unless and until it has acquired a distinctive character following use (see [2002] EWHC 1424 (ChD), [2003] RPC 16).

According to the judge himself, the problem associated with a frequently occurring surname lies in the fact that, until it has distinctiveness acquired by use, it does not really indicate goods as coming from a particular undertaking. That applies with greater force to services.

Milk and milk powders; preparations made with milk, ad-mixtures of milks, fats, starches and sugars for use in making beverages; dairy toppings; yoghurt and yoghurt drinks; desserts; flavoured extracts from juices made from fruit and vegetables.'

Coffee, tea, cocoa, drinking chocolate; coffee essence, coffee extracts, mixtures of coffee and chicory, all for use as substitutes for coffee; sugar, confectionery, edible ice, cakes and frozen foods; dessert toppings, and preparations for making desserts, drinks.'

'Class 32

Non-alcoholic drinks and preparations for making such drinks; soups and concentrates for making non-alcoholic drinks; fruit flavoured beverages; ice beverages.'

'Class 42

Restaurant, cafeteria and catering services.'

a In that connection, a trade mark which has become established by use displays the notable feature of having already foreclosed the position for others of the same or a similar name.

He also points out that registration confers a monopoly not merely of use of the word as registered but also regarding similar words whenever there is a risk of confusion.

b 16. In the order for reference, the basis of assessment applied by the United Kingdom Trade Marks Registry is accounted for by the aim of obviating a monopoly for certain common names and variants thereof which might be misleading.

c 17. Common surnames as such, in the absence of use establishing them, are not capable of indicating that goods come from a particular undertaking. Their use to a sufficient extent over time presupposes that they have excluded others which are the same or similar.

d 18. The national court, rather than taking a purely theoretical approach, prefers to take a realistic view of the functioning of the registered trade mark system. Accordingly, he suggests that attention be paid to the risk of monopolisation deriving from the registration of a common surname to cover a wide range of goods or services. In view of that danger, the possibility, which is costly in terms of time and money, of challenging some of those indications on the ground of non-use, after the expiry of five years following registration, does not seem to be an effective remedy.

e For the same reasons, it is inappropriate to take account, when analysing the distinctiveness of a trade mark, of considerations concerning the limitation of its effects, even though that seems to be the approach adopted in para 37 of the Baby-Dry judgment<sup>8</sup>. In practice, favourable treatment is accorded to whoever has secured registration.

f 19. After considering those matters, the national court raises questions as to the impact of art 6(1) of the Trade Marks Directive on the assessment of the distinctiveness of surnames.

IV—THE QUESTIONS ON WHICH A PRELIMINARY RULING IS SOUGHT

g 20. In the course of the appeal before it, the High Court decided to stay the proceedings and seek a preliminary ruling from the Court of Justice on the following questions:

h (1) In what circumstances, if any, must a trade mark (ie a “sign” which complies with the requirements of Article 2 of the Trade Marks Directive 89/104/EC) consisting of a single surname be refused registration as being in itself “devoid of any distinctive character” within the meaning of Article 3(1)(b) of the Directive?

i (2) In particular (a) must or (b) may such a sign, before it has acquired distinctive character by use, be refused registration if it is a common surname in the Member State in which the trade mark is sought to be registered or if it is a common surname in one or more of the other Member States?

(3) If the answer to either Question 2(a) or (b) is in the affirmative, is it appropriate for national authorities to determine the matter by reference to the presumed expectations of an average customer in relation to the goods/services in question in the Member State, taking into account

the commonness of the surname, the nature of the goods/services at issue, and the prevalence (or otherwise) of the use of surnames in the relevant trade? a

(4) Is it of significance for the purpose of determining whether a surname is “devoid of any distinctive character” within Article 3(1)(b) of the Directive that the effects of registration of the trade mark are restricted under Article 6(1)(a)? b

(5) If so, (a) is the word “person” in Article 6(1)(a) of the Directive to be understood as including a corporation or a business and (b) what amounts to “honest practices in industrial or commercial matters”; in particular, does that expression apply where (i) the Defendant is not, in practice, deceiving the public by the use of his own name or (ii) the Defendant is merely causing unintentional confusion thereby? c

V—PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE COURT OF JUSTICE

21. The order for reference was received at the Registry of the Court of Justice on 12 November 2002.

22. Submissions were lodged by the appellant in the main proceedings and also by the United Kingdom, Greek and French governments and by the Commission of the European Communities. d

23. At the hearing on 27 November 2003, the representatives of the above-mentioned governments and of the Commission presented oral argument. e

VI—OBSERVATIONS OF THE PARTIES

The first three questions

24. For Nichols, the appellant in the main proceedings, the United Kingdom Registry’s practice is not compatible with art 3(1) of the Trade Marks Directive. In its view, registration of a trade mark should never be refused solely because it uses a common surname, a criterion whose application by reference to a telephone directory in any event produces arbitrary results. f

25. The Greek and French governments agree that the commonness of a surname does not render it unsuitable for use as a trade mark. Its specific capacity to identify the products or services concerned should be assessed, in each case, from the standpoint of the relevant average consumer. g

26. The Commission is critical of the fact that, without any justification whatsoever, the United Kingdom Registry has adopted a method radically different from that generally used for assessing the potential capacity of a trade mark to distinguish goods or services.

27. For its part, the United Kingdom government maintains that a common surname does not possess the distinctive nature required by art 3(1)(b) of the Trade Marks Directive. That requirement is not satisfied by the fact that a mark is recognisable; it must also, in the eyes of an average consumer, be identifiable with, and actually identified with, the products and services of an undertaking. The United Kingdom Registry’s practice seeks to ensure that, as far as common surnames are concerned, only those capable of designating a commercial origin are registered. h

The fourth and fifth questions

28. According to Nichols, it is necessary to take account of art 6(1)(a) of the Trade Marks Directive when analysing the distinctive character of a sign under a art 3(1)(b). In addition, there is no reason for restricting its effect so as to benefit only natural persons. The term 'honest practices' should be construed as meaning 'bona fide use'.

29. For the Greek government, it is possible to use a business name in the context of art 6(1)(a) of the directive, provided that it comprises a person's name. For the rest, an assessment as to whether use is in good faith must take

b account of the conception of social ethics of the average well-advised person.
30. All the other parties coincide in the view that assessment of the specific distinctive character of a trade mark should be separated from any assessment of the limitation of its effects. A negative reply to the fourth question would render the fifth question academic.

c VI—LEGAL ANALYSIS

31. Like most of the parties to the proceedings before this court, I also consider that the first three questions submitted by the United Kingdom court must be dealt with together. The essential issue is whether trade marks
d consisting of a common surname are subject to specific conditions regarding their capacity to distinguish products or services, in particular when their specific distinctive character under art 3(1)(b) of the Trade Marks Directive is being appraised

32. It must first be observed that a surname fulfils the minimum requirements to constitute a trade mark under art 2 of the directive, since it is e capable of distinguishing the products or services of one undertaking from those of others.

Article 2 itself refers, in its non-exhaustive list<sup>9</sup>, to 'personal names'.

Moreover, surnames, including common ones, represent one of the categories of trade mark to which operators most frequently resort.

f Finally, the wording of art 6(1) gives the impression that the Community legislature was aware that surnames were suitable for registration as trade marks.

That statement of principle is, therefore, generally accepted.

33. It must also be borne in mind that surnames are not included in the list of marks given in art 3(1)(c) of the directive. They are not therefore, at first sight, g generic or descriptive signs for specific products or services. As I shall explain shortly, it follows from this fact that it is not possible, in relation to the differentiating capacity of the surname in question, to rely on considerations of a general nature with a view to ensuring their availability for the generality of operators.

34. The Commission states in its written observations that the practice
h followed by the United Kingdom Registry in determining whether a surname is suitable for registration as a trade mark is at odds with that provided for in the directive, as interpreted by the Court of Justice.

i The United Kingdom Registry verifies whether the surname sought to be registered as a trade mark is common, for which purpose it customarily refers to the London telephone directory. When the result of its search is positive, it calculates the number of operators active in the relevant markets, so that registration is granted or refused depending on the resulting figure.

It has been suggested that that method is inappropriate since it involves setting an arbitrary threshold above which a surname is deemed to be common. It is not for this court to make value judgments concerning national legislation but rather to rule as to its compatibility with the Community rules. For my part, I recognise that any method used to identify the distinctiveness of a mark inevitably involves some degree of subjectivity. a

35. In this case, it seems clear that the method employed by the United Kingdom Registry differs from the approach preferred by the Court of Justice to date in assessing the distinctive character of a mark. However, no sufficient reasons have been put forward in favour of choosing another interpretative method. b

36. I agree with the majority of the parties that the question whether a surname, however common, may indicate the commercial origin of products and services must be analysed in relation to the specific market concerned. The fact that, in a given commercial sector, ordinary surnames are customarily used for identification of that kind, with certain possible consequences regarding the assessment of distinctiveness, cannot be transposed, without more, to any other sector<sup>10</sup>. Reference could be made, in the last resort, to specific particular features, linked to the peculiarities of the products or services designated, rather than to a special characteristic inherent in a category of marks<sup>11</sup>. c

37. For the rest, there is nothing in the directive to justify treating surnames differently, since art 6(1)(a), the only provision specifically devoted to them, is concerned with limiting the protective effects of trade marks, and that is quite separate from the question of examining absolute grounds for refusal, as I shall have occasion to explain shortly. e

38. In those circumstances, any judgment as to the distinctiveness of a surname must observe the same guidelines as those applicable to other types of word marks.

39. According to the Court of Justice, for a trade mark to fulfil its principal task, it is sufficient if it enables the public to distinguish the product or the service which it designates from others which have another commercial origin, and to conclude that it was manufactured, marketed or rendered under the control of the proprietor of the trade mark, who accepts responsibility for its quality. In that respect, art 2 of the directive makes no distinction between different categories of marks, for which reason similar criteria must be used to assess their distinctiveness in all cases<sup>12</sup>. f

40. The distinctive character must be analysed from the viewpoint of the average consumer of such types of products or services<sup>13</sup>, the consumer being deemed to be 'reasonably well informed and reasonably observant and circumspect'<sup>14</sup>.

41. In that context, it is necessary to take into account, for example, the particularity that, in certain sectors, common names or surnames are h

10 As appears to be the case—according to the view expressed by the United Kingdom government at the hearing—with regard to the supply of services such as those of the legal profession.

11 As, for example, in the case of three-dimensional forms deriving from the shape of the product.

12 See Philips Electronics NV v Remington Consumer Products Ltd Case C-299/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 634, [2002] ECR I-5475 (paras 47, 48). i

a assiduously used to designate a commercial origin, sometimes by way of trade mark. If that is the case, there is nothing to prevent the registration authorities from finding that the mark has no capacity to distinguish. Such a finding must be specific and must not be made in an all-embracing or abstract manner.

b 42. However, it is not possible, under art 3(1)(b) of the Trade Marks Directive, to take account of a general interest in order to make sure that certain very frequently occurring surnames are available to all present and potential operators.

c 43. As I have already stated<sup>15</sup>, the purpose of the absolute ground for refusal in that provision is to prohibit the registration of signs which are devoid of any real distinctive character, that is to say, those signs which the average consumer, who is reasonably well informed and reasonably observant and circumspect, does not identify as reliably indicating the commercial origin of the product. It is, of course, in the general interest to prevent certain operators from appropriating to themselves three-dimensional shapes which are useful from an aesthetic or technical point of view, or from monopolising certain signs apt to describe the product per se, its actual or supposed qualities and other characteristics, such as where it originates from. Subparagraphs (c) and (e) of art 3(1) of the Trade Marks Directive deal with those concerns.

d It is also appropriate to consider the similar general interest in keeping available, for use by all, signs which are customary in the current language or in the bona fide and established practices of the trade, which—under sub-para (d)—may not be registered.

e 44. However, it does not seem that extensive protection should be afforded to signs which, without being descriptive, are for other reasons devoid of any specific distinctive character. I do not believe that there is any general interest in maintaining in the public domain signs which are incapable of identifying the commercial origin of the goods or services which they designate.

f 45. Nor does the directive contain any provision to ensure that no relative advantage is granted to the first operator who applies for registration of a given surname.

g 46. Consequently, the potential distinctiveness of a surname depends on whether, in relation to the goods or services in respect of which registration is sought, the relevant consumer considers that the sign identifies those of one undertaking rather than those of another. The commonness of the surname is one of the factors which it is appropriate to take into consideration, once more in relation to certain goods or services, although it is not decisive.

The fourth question

h 47. By its fourth question, the national court wishes to determine whether, in order to ascertain, under art 3(1)(b) of the Trade Marks Directive, to what extent a sign comprising a surname is distinctive, it is appropriate to take account of the fact that the effects of registration of the trade mark are limited pursuant to art 6(1)(a).

i 48. The answer must be negative.

49. Nothing in the directive requires a less rigorous examination for the purposes of classification, having regard to the existence of provisions restricting the effects of the trade mark.

50. Although, as indicated in the order for reference<sup>16</sup>, in specifying the legal basis for the reasoning concerning the distinctiveness of a word sign, the Baby-Dry judgment refers to art 12 of Regulation 40/94, which has the same wording as art 6 of the directive, that judgment does not draw any practical inference whatsoever from that reference.

51. I have had occasion to point out that there is nothing in art 12 of Regulation 40/94 to suggest that the task of assessing the descriptiveness of a trade mark should be transferred from the Office at the time of registration to the courts responsible for ensuring that the rights conferred by the mark are exercised in practice. Rather the opposite: the long list of obstacles to registration in arts 4 and 7, and the extensive system of appeals available in the event of a refusal to register, suggest that examination for the purposes of registration is intended to be more than summary in nature. Nor, moreover, do I believe that approach to be appropriate from the point of view of judicial policy since, in disputes where art 12 is relied on, the proprietor of the trade mark will always enjoy an advantage, as a result of the inertia created by general acceptance of the effect of official records, and because of the inherent difficulty of delimiting the descriptive from that which is not descriptive<sup>17</sup>.

52. The foregoing has been confirmed by the Court of Justice very clearly in its judgment in Libertel Groep BV v Benelux-Merkenbureau<sup>18</sup>, in which it considered that art 6 of the Trade Marks Directive concerns the limits on the effects of a Community trade mark once it has been registered. Furthermore, it stated that the consequence of a minimal review of the grounds for refusal at the time when the application for registration is considered, on the basis that the risk that certain operators might appropriate certain signs which, owing to their very nature, ought to remain available, is neutralised by the limitation mentioned above, is to withdraw the assessment of the grounds for refusal from the competent authority at the time when the mark is registered in order to transfer it to the courts with responsibility for ensuring that the rights conferred by the trade mark can be exercised in practice. That approach is incompatible with the scheme of the directive, which is founded on an analysis prior to registration, not on an ex post facto review. There is nothing in the directive to suggest that art 6 leads to such a conclusion. On the contrary, the number and the detailed nature of the obstacles to registration set out in arts 2 and 3, and the wide range of remedies available in the event of refusal, suggest that the examination carried out at the time when registration is applied for must not be brief, but must be stringent and thorough in order to prevent trade marks from being improperly registered<sup>19</sup>.

53. Those considerations, relating to art 6(1)(b) of the Trade Marks Directive (or art 12(1) of Regulation 40/94) can perfectly well be applied to sub-para (a). The basic idea is that the provisions on limitation of the effects of trade marks do not affect the type of review carried out when the judgment is made as to whether or not the marks are subject to absolute grounds of refusal.

a 54. Consequently, the fact that the effects of a trade mark comprising a surname are restricted by virtue of art 6(1)(a) of the Trade Marks Directive has no impact whatsoever on the assessment of the distinctiveness of the mark in question under art 3(1)(b).

b The fifth question

55. The last question was submitted, as is apparent from the order for reference, only in the event of the previous question being answered in the affirmative. That not being the case, it need not be answered.

VII—CONCLUSION

c 56. In view of all the foregoing considerations, I propose that the Court of Justice give the following answers to the questions referred to it by the High Court of Justice (England and Wales), Chancery Division:

d (1) The distinctiveness, for the purposes of art 3(1) of First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 (to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks), of a sign comprising a surname depends on whether, in relation to the goods or services for which registration is sought, the relevant consumer considers that it identifies the goods and services of an undertaking as compared with those of others. The frequency of occurrence of the surname in question is one of the factors which may be taken into consideration, again in relation to certain goods or services, although it is not decisive.

e (2) The fact that the effects of a trade mark comprising a surname may be limited pursuant to art 6(1)(a) of the directive has no impact whatsoever on the appraisal of its distinctiveness under art 3(1)(b).

1. This reference for a preliminary ruling concerns the interpretation of art 3(1)(b) and art 6(1)(a) of the First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 (to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks) (OJ 1989 L40 p 1).

g 2. The reference was made in the course of proceedings between Nichols plc (Nichols), a company incorporated in the United Kingdom, and the Registrar of Trade Marks concerning the latter's refusal to register a common surname as a trade mark for certain products.

LEGAL BACKGROUND

h 3. Article 2 of Directive 89/104, entitled 'Signs of which a trade mark may consist', is worded as follows:

i 'A trade mark may consist of any sign capable of being represented graphically, particularly words, including personal names, designs, letters, numerals, the shape of goods or of their packaging, provided that such signs are capable of distinguishing the goods or services of one undertaking from those of other undertakings.'

4. Article 3 of that directive, entitled 'Grounds for refusal or invalidity', provides:

'1. The following shall not be registered or if registered shall be liable to be declared invalid:

- (a) signs which cannot constitute a trade mark;
- (b) trade marks which are devoid of any distinctive character ...'

5. Article 6, entitled 'Limitation of the effects of a trade mark' states:

'1. The trade mark shall not entitle the proprietor to prohibit a third party from using, in the course of trade,

- (a) his own name or address ...

provided he uses them in accordance with honest practices in industrial or commercial matters.'

THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND THE QUESTIONS FOR THE COURT OF JUSTICE

6. Nichols applied to the Registrar of Trade Marks for registration of the surname 'Nichols' as a trade mark for products including vending machines, and food and drink of the kind typically dispensed through such machines.

7. By decision of 11 May 2001, the Registrar of Trade Marks granted that application in respect of vending machines, but refused it in respect of all other products.

8. He found that the surname 'Nichols', including its phonetic equivalent 'Nicholls' and its singular form 'Nichol', is common in the United Kingdom, given the number of times it appears in the London telephone directory.

9. With regard to food and drink, that surname is therefore not of itself capable of communicating the fact that such goods originate from one and the same undertaking. In view of the nature of the business involved and the potential size of the market for those goods, the surname 'Nichols' could be used by other manufacturers and providers. The public are therefore unlikely to consider that there is only one trader operating under that surname in the market. A mark in the form of that surname is therefore devoid of any distinctive character in respect of food and drink products.

10. On the other hand, the market for vending machines is more specialised, with fewer people trading in it. The mark can therefore be registered in respect of those goods.

11. Nichols appealed against that decision to the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice of England and Wales.

12. That court states that the United Kingdom Trade Marks Registry takes the view that the registration of names, and particularly of common surnames, should be considered carefully to ensure that unfair advantage is not given to the first applicant for such a name. Broadly, the more common the surname, the less willing is the Registry to accept an application for registration without proof that that name has in fact become distinctive. The Trade Marks Registry also takes into account the number of goods and services, and the number of people with the same or a similar name, which might be affected by the registration.

13. The national court considers that the question arises whether a fairly common surname must be regarded as 'devoid of any distinctive character' until it has acquired a distinctive character through use.

14. It considers that it is proper to take account of the limitation of the effects of the mark which is provided for in art 6(1)(a) of Directive 89/104 and relates to a third party's use of its own name. In its view, the wider the potential limitation laid down in that provision, the less of an impost on the persons concerned the registration would be. It is therefore necessary to consider the extent to which the limitations laid down in art 6 of Directive 89/104 are relevant when considering the distinctive character of a mark of which registration is sought.

- a 15. In that regard, the national court raises the question whether art 6(1)(a) applies not only to the names of natural persons but also to company names. It is also uncertain as to the meaning of the expression 'honest practices' used in that provision.
- b 16. In those circumstances, the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice of England and Wales ([2002] EWHC 1424 (ChD), [2003] RPC 16) stayed the proceedings pending a preliminary ruling from the Court of Justice on the following questions:
- c '(1) In what circumstances, if any, must a trade mark (ie a "sign" which complies with the requirements of Article 2 of the Trade Marks Directive 89/104/EC) consisting of a single surname be refused registration as being in itself "devoid of any distinctive character" within the meaning of Article 3(1)(b) of the Directive?
- d (2) In particular (a) must or (b) may such a sign, before it has acquired distinctive character by use, be refused registration if it is a common surname in the Member State in which the trade mark is sought to be registered or if it is a common surname in one or more of the other Member States?
- e (3) If the answer to either Question 2(a) or (b) is in the affirmative, is it appropriate for national authorities to determine the matter by reference to the presumed expectations of an average customer in relation to the goods/services in question in the Member State, taking into account the commonness of the surname, the nature of the goods/services at issue, and the prevalence (or otherwise) of the use of surnames in the relevant trade?
- f (4) Is it of significance for the purpose of determining whether a surname is "devoid of any distinctive character" within Article 3(1)(b) of the Directive that the effects of registration of the trade mark are restricted under Article 6(1)(a)?
- g (5) If so, (a) is the word "person" in Article 6(1) of the Directive to be understood as including a corporation or a business and (b) what amounts to "honest practices in industrial or commercial matters"; in particular, does that expression apply where (i) the Defendant is not, in practice, deceiving the public by the use of his own name or (ii) the Defendant is merely causing unintentional confusion thereby?

THE FIRST FOUR QUESTIONS

- h 17. By its first four questions, which it is appropriate to consider together, the national court seeks essentially to ascertain what conditions apply to the assessment, in the context of art 3(1)(b) of Directive 89/104, of the distinctiveness or otherwise of a trade mark constituted by a surname, particularly where that surname is common, and whether the fact that the effects of registration of the trade mark are limited pursuant to art 6(1)(a) of the same directive has an impact on that assessment.

i Observations submitted to the court

18. Nichols submits that registration of a trade mark cannot be refused solely on the ground that it is a common surname. It considers that the criterion used in the main proceedings of the number of occurrences of a surname in the London telephone book is arbitrary. Surnames cannot be subjected to special treatment which is more severe than that applied to other signs which are capable of constituting a trade mark. Like all other signs, they should be registered if they enable the products or services for which registration is sought to be distinguished, according to their origin. In the assessment of distinctiveness, account should be taken of art 6(1)(a) of Directive 89/104. a

19. The Greek and French governments and the Commission of the European Communities also consider that surnames, even common ones, should be treated in the same way as other categories of signs, having regard to the products or services involved and the perception of the relevant public regarding the function of the trade mark as an indicator of origin. b

20. The United Kingdom government considers that it is highly unlikely that a common surname will denote only the goods or services of the undertaking that applies for registration of that surname as a trade mark. A trade mark which did not designate solely the products or services of a given undertaking could not be registered because it would not comply with art 3(1)(b) of Directive 89/104. In such a case, it would not serve to indicate origin. Account must be taken of the presumed expectations of an average consumer with regard to the trade mark. The factors to be taken into consideration might include the commonness of the surname, the number of undertakings supplying products or services of the type concerned and the prevalence or otherwise of the use of surnames in the relevant trade. c

21. The French and United Kingdom governments, and the Commission, consider that art 6(1)(a) of Directive 89/104 has no impact on the assessment of the distinctiveness carried out under art 3(1)(b) of the same directive. d

Findings of the court

22. Article 2 of Directive 89/104 contains a list, described as a 'list of examples' in the seventh recital in the preamble to that directive, of signs which may constitute a trade mark, provided that such signs are capable of distinguishing the goods or services of one undertaking from those of other undertakings, that is to say to fulfil the trade mark's function as an indicator of origin. That list expressly includes 'personal names'. e

23. According to art 3(1)(b) of Directive 89/104, the distinctive character of a mark must be assessed in relation to the goods or services in respect of which registration is applied for and in relation to the perception of the relevant consumers (see Philips Electronics NV v Remington Consumer Products Ltd Case C-299/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 634, [2002] ECR I-5475 (paras 59, 63) and Henkel KGaA Case C-218/01 (2003) Transcript (opinion), 14 January, (2004) Transcript (judgment), 12 February (para 50)). f

24. In that regard, the provision concerned draws no distinction between different categories of trade mark (see, to that effect, Linde AG v Deutsches Patent- und Markenamt Joined cases C-53/01 and C-55/01 [2004] IP&T 172, [2003] ECR I-3161 (para 42), and, regarding the identical provision in art 7(1)(b) of Council Regulation (EC) 40/94 (on the Community trade mark) (OJ 1994 L11 p 1), the order of 28 June 2004 in Glaverbel SA v Office for Harmonisation in the Internal Market (Trade Marks and Designs) (OHIM) Case C-445/02 P (2004) Transcript (order), 28 June (para 21)). g

25. The criteria for assessment of the distinctive character of trade marks constituted by a personal name are therefore the same as those applicable to the other categories of trade mark. h

26. Stricter general criteria of assessment based, for example, on: a predetermined number of persons with the same name, above which that name may be regarded as devoid of distinctive character; the number of i a undertakings providing products or services of the type covered by the application for registration; or the prevalence or otherwise of the use of surnames in the relevant trade, cannot be applied to such trade marks.

27. The distinctive character of a trade mark, in whatever category, must be the subject of a specific assessment.

b 28. In the context of that assessment, it may indeed appear, for example, that the perception of the relevant public is not necessarily the same for each of the categories and that, accordingly, it could prove more difficult to establish the distinctive character of trade marks in certain categories than that of those in other categories (see, in particular, the Henkel case (para 52), and, in relation to art 7(1)(b) of Regulation 40/94, Procter & Gamble Co v Office for Harmonisation in the Internal Market (Trade Marks and Designs) Joined cases C-468–472/01 P (2003) Transcript (opinion), 6 November, (2004) Transcript (judgment), 29 April (para 36) and the order in the Glaverbel case (para 23)).

c 29. However, such greater difficulty as might be encountered in the specific assessment of the distinctive character of certain trade marks cannot justify the assumption that such marks are a priori devoid of distinctive character or cannot acquire such character through use, pursuant to art 3(3) of Directive 89/104.

d 30. In the same way as a term used in everyday language, a common surname may serve the trade mark function of indicating origin and therefore distinguish the products or services concerned where it is not subject to a ground of refusal of registration other than the one referred to in art 3(1)(b) of Directive 89/104, such as, for example, the generic or descriptive character of the mark or the existence of an earlier right.

e 31. The registration of a trade mark constituted by a surname cannot be refused in order to ensure that no advantage is afforded to the first applicant since Directive 89/104 contains no provision to that effect, regardless, moreover, of the category to which the trade mark whose registration is sought belongs.

f 32. In any event, the fact that art 6(1)(a) of Directive 89/104 enables third parties to use their name in the course of trade has no impact on the assessment of the distinctiveness of the trade mark, which is carried out under art 3(1)(b) of the same directive.

g 33. Article 6(1)(a) of Directive 89/104 limits in a general way, for the benefit of operators who have a name identical or similar to the registered mark, the right granted by the mark after its registration, that is to say after the existence of the mark's distinctive character has been established. It cannot therefore be taken into account for the purposes of the specific assessment of the distinctive character of the trade mark before the trade mark is registered.

h 34. The answer to the first four questions must therefore be that, in the context of art 3(1)(b) of Directive 89/104, the assessment of the existence or otherwise of the distinctive character of a trade mark constituted by a surname, even a common one, must be carried out specifically, in accordance with the criteria applicable to any sign covered by art 2 of the said directive, in relation, first, to the products or services in respect of which registration is applied for and, second, to the perception of the relevant consumers. The fact that the effects of registration of the trade mark are limited by virtue of art 6(1)(a) of that directive has no impact on that assessment.

THE FIFTH QUESTION

35. An answer to the fifth question was sought only in the event of a positive answer being given to the fourth question. Since the fourth question has been answered in the negative, there is no need to answer the fifth. a

COSTS

36. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. The costs incurred in submitting observations to the court, other than the costs of those parties, are not recoverable. b

On those grounds, the Court of Justice (Second Chamber), rules as follows:

In the context of art 3(1)(b) of the First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 (to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks), the assessment of the existence or otherwise of the distinctive character of a trade mark constituted by a surname, even a common one, must be carried out specifically, in accordance with the criteria applicable to any sign covered by art 2 of that directive, in relation, first, to the products or services in respect of which registration is applied for and, second, to the perception of the relevant consumers. The fact that the effects of registration of the trade mark are limited by virtue of art 6(1)(a) of that directive has no impact on that assessment. c d The Regional Court of Appeal, The Hague, referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling pursuant to art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) nine questions on the interpretation of arts 2<sup>a</sup> and 3<sup>b</sup> of First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 (to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks). Those questions arose in proceedings between KPN and the Benelux Trade Mark Office (BTMO) concerning the latter's refusal to register as a trade mark the sign 'Postkantoor' applied for by KPN for various goods and services, including paper, advertising, insurance, postage stamps, telecommunications and technical information and advice. The word 'Postkantoor' may be translated as 'post office'. The BTMO refused registration on the basis that it possessed no distinctive character as provided for in art 6a(i)(a)<sup>c</sup> of the Uniform Benelux Law on Trademarks.

g Held – (1) Article 3 of Directive 89/104 was to be interpreted as meaning that a trade mark registration authority had to have regard, in addition to the mark as filed, to all the relevant facts and circumstances, before adopting a final decision on an application to register a trade mark. A court asked to review a decision on an application to register a trade mark also had to have regard to all the relevant facts and circumstances, subject to the limits on the exercise of its powers as defined by the relevant national legislation (see judgment paras 29, 36, 37, below).

h (2) The fact that a trade mark had been registered in a member state in respect of certain goods or services had no bearing on the examination by the trade mark registration authority of another member state of an application for registration of a similar mark in respect of goods or services similar to those in respect of which the first mark was registered. It was for the competent authority to have regard to the characteristics peculiar to the mark for which registration is sought and the goods or services in respect of which it was sought (see judgment paras 42–44, below).

b Article 3, so far as material, is set out at judgment para 8, below

c Article 6a is set out at judgment para 11, below

(3) Article 3(1)(c) precluded registration of a trade mark which consisted exclusively of signs or indications which might serve, in trade, to designate characteristics of the goods or services in respect of which registration was sought, and that was the case even when there were more usual signs or indications for designating the same characteristics and regardless of the number of competitors who might have an interest in using the signs or indications of which the mark consisted. Where the applicable national law provided that the exclusive right conferred by registration, by a competent authority in an area in which a number of officially recognised languages coexisted, of a word mark expressed in one of those languages extended automatically to its translation in the other languages, the authority had to ascertain as regards each of those translations whether the mark actually consisted exclusively of signs or indications which might serve, in trade, to designate characteristics of those goods or services (see judgment paras 53–61, below).

(4) Article 3(1) of the directive had to be interpreted as meaning that a mark which was descriptive of the characteristics of certain goods or services, but not of those of other goods or services for the purposes of art 3 could not be regarded as necessarily having distinctive character in relation to those other goods or services for the purposes of sub-para (b) of the provision. It was of no relevance that a mark was descriptive of the characteristics of certain goods or services under art 3(1)(c) of the directive when it came to assessing whether the same mark had distinctive character in relation to other goods or services for the purposes of art 3(1)(b) of the directive (see judgment paras 67–70, 74–76, 79, below).

(5) Article 3(1)(c) had to be interpreted as meaning that a mark consisting of a word composed of elements, each of which was descriptive of characteristics of the goods or services in respect of which registration was sought, was itself descriptive of the characteristics of those goods or services for the purposes of that provision, unless there was a perceptible difference between the word and the mere sum of its parts: that assumed either that because of the unusual nature of the combination in relation to the goods or services the word created an impression which was sufficiently far removed from that produced by the mere combination of meanings lent by the elements of which it was composed, with the result that the word was more than the sum of its parts, or that the word had become part of everyday language and had acquired its own meaning, with the result that it was now independent of its components. In the latter case, it was necessary to ascertain whether a word which had acquired its own meaning was not itself descriptive for the purposes of the same provision. For the purposes of determining whether art 3(1)(c) applied to such a mark, it was irrelevant whether or not there were synonyms capable of designating the same characteristics of the goods or services mentioned in the application for registration or that the characteristics of the goods or services which might be the subject of the description were commercially essential or merely ancillary (see judgment paras 93, 95, 97–100, 104, below).

(6) Directive 89/104 prevented a trade mark registration authority from registering a mark for certain goods or services on condition that they did not possess a particular characteristic. Such a practice would lead to legal uncertainty as to the extent of the protection afforded by the mark. Third parties—particularly competitors—would not, as a general rule, be aware that for given goods or services the protection conferred by the mark did not extend to those products or services having a particular characteristic, and might be a led to refrain from using the signs or indications of which the mark consisted and which were descriptive of that characteristic for the purpose of describing their own goods (see judgment paras 112, 114, 115, 117, below).

(7) The practice of a trade mark registration authority which concentrated solely on refusing to register manifestly inadmissible marks was incompatible with art 3 of the directive (see judgment paras 122, 123, 125, 126, below).

Reference

By judgment of 3 June 1999, received at the Court of Justice of the European Communities on 1 October 1999, the Gerechtshof te 's-Gravenhage (Regional Court of Appeal, The Hague) referred to the court for a preliminary ruling pursuant to art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) nine questions (set out at judgment para 18, below) on the interpretation of arts 2 and 3 of First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 (to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks) (OJ 1989 L40 p 1). Those questions were raised in proceedings between Koninklijke KPN Nederland NV (KPN) and the Benelux Merkenbureau (Benelux Trademark Office; the BTMO) concerning the latter's refusal to register as a trade mark the sign Postkantoor applied for by KPN for various goods and services. Written observations were submitted on behalf of: Koninklijke KPN Nederland NV, by K Limperg and T Cohen Jehoram, Advocaten; the Benelux-Merkenbureau, by JH Spoor and L De Gryse, Advocaten; the Commission of the European Communities, by K Banks and HMH Speyart, acting as agents. Oral observations were submitted by Koninklijke KPN Nederland NV, the Benelux-Merkenbureau and the Commission. The language of the case was Dutch. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General.

1. By order of 3 June 1999, the Gerechtshof te 's-Gravenhage (Regional Court of Appeal, The Hague, Netherlands) referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities ten questions<sup>2</sup> concerning the interpretation of arts 2 and 3 of First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 (to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks) (the Trade Marks Directive)<sup>3</sup>.

I—THE FACTS AND THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS

2. On 2 April 1997, Koninklijke KPN Nederland NV (KPN) lodged with the Benelux Trade Marks Office (the Benelux-Merkenbureau; 'Merkenbureau') an application for registration of 'Postkantoor' as a word sign for paper, card and products manufactured therefrom<sup>4</sup>, and a wide variety of services<sup>5</sup>. In Dutch, 'postkantoor' means 'post office'.

3. On 16 June 1997, the Merkenbureau informed KPN that it was provisionally refusing registration because the sign applied for did not have distinctive character, since it merely described the goods and services it was intended to identify.

4. KPN raised objections to the provisional refusal of the application and requested either that the refusal be withdrawn or that consultations be initiated with a view to disclaiming the protection afforded by the mark for the products and services which the sign described. The Merkenbureau saw no reason to review its decision and, by letter of 28 January 1998, it notified KPN that its decision to refuse the application was now final.

5. KPN brought an action forthwith before the Gerechtshof, seeking an order requiring the Merkenbureau to register the sign in respect of all the classes applied for or, at any rate, in respect of such classes as the court might determine in its judgment.

- a     6. By an interim decision dated 3 December 1998, the Gerechtshof notified the parties that it would be appropriate to refer to the Court of Justice, and to the Benelux Court, a number of questions concerning the interpretation of the Trade Marks Directive and the Uniform Benelux Law on trade marks (the Uniform Law)<sup>6</sup>. Finally, by order of 3 June 1999, the Gerechtshof stayed the proceedings and referred those questions, on which it had sought the views of the parties, to both courts.

II—THE QUESTIONS REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

7. The questions which the Gerechtshof has referred to the Court of Justice are worded as follows:

- c     ‘IV.(a) Must the Benelux Trademarks Office, which under the Protocol of 2 December 1992 amending the Uniform Benelux Law on Trademarks (Trb 1993, 12) is responsible for the assessment of the absolute grounds for refusal to register a trademark laid down in Article 3(1) in conjunction with Article 2 of First Council Directive 89/104/EEC of 21 December 1988 to approximate the laws of the Member States relating to trademarks (OJ 1989 L40, p 1) have regard not only to the sign as it appears in the application for registration but also to all the relevant facts and circumstances known to it, including those of which it was informed by the applicant (for example, the fact that, prior to the application, the applicant already used the sign widely as a trademark for the relevant products, or the fact that investigation shows that use of the sign for the goods and/or services mentioned in the application will not be of such a nature as to deceive the public)? ...

- e     V. Does the reply to the [first] question ... also apply to consideration by the Benelux Trademarks Office of the question whether its objections to registration of the application have been removed by the applicant, as well as to its decision to refuse registration in whole or in part, as provided for in Article 6a(4) of the UBL?<sup>7</sup>

- f     VI. Does the reply to Question IV(a) and (b) also apply to the judicial review to which Article 6b of the UBL refers? ...

- g     IX. In the light of the provisions of Article 6 quinquies (B)(2) of the Paris Convention, do the marks which under Article 3(1)(c) of the directive are not to be registered or, if registered, may be declared invalid, also include marks composed of signs or indications which may serve, in trade, to indicate the kind, quality, quantity, intended purpose, value, geographical origin or the time of production of the goods or of rendering of service or other characteristics of the goods or services, even if that configuration is not the (only or most) usual indication used? Does it make any difference in that connection whether there are many or only a few competitors who may have an interest in using such indications (see the judgment of the Benelux Court of Justice of 19 January 1981, NJ 1981, 294, in P Ferrero & Co SpA v Alfred Ritter Schokoladefabrik GmbH (Kinder))?

- h     Is it also relevant that under Article 13C of the UBL the right to a trademark expressed in one of the national or regional languages of the Benelux area extends automatically to its translation in another of those languages? ...

6 Uniform Benelux Law on trade marks of 19 March 1962, as amended (Nederlands Traktatenblad 1962, No 58, pp 11–39, and 1983, No 187, pp 2–10).

7 The Uniform Benelux Law on trade marks.

X.(a) In the assessment of the question whether a sign consisting of a (new) word made up of components which in themselves have no distinctive character with regard to the goods or services in respect of which the application is made answers the description given in Article 2 of the directive (and Article 1 of the UBL) of a mark, must a (new) word of that kind be taken to have in principle a distinctive character? a

X.(b) If not, must a word of that kind (leaving aside the fact that it may have acquired distinctive character through use, "inburgering") be taken to have in principle no distinctive character, it being otherwise only where, because of other circumstances, the combination is more than the sum of its parts? b

Is it relevant in that connection whether the sign is the only or an obvious term for indicating the relevant quality or (combination of) qualities, or whether there are synonyms which may reasonably also be used, or that the word indicates a commercially essential or rather an incidental quality of the product or service? c

Is it also relevant that, under Article 13C of the UBL, the right to a trademark expressed in one of the national or regional languages of the Benelux area extends automatically to its translation in another of those languages? ... d

XI. Does the mere fact that a descriptive sign is also lodged for registration as a mark for goods and/or services of which the sign is not descriptive warrant the conclusion that the sign thereby has distinctive character in relation to those goods and/or services (for example, the sign "Postkantoor" for furniture)? e

If not, in order to determine whether such a descriptive sign has distinctive character for such goods and/or services, must regard be had to the possibility that, in the light of its descriptive meaning or meanings, (a part of) the public will not perceive that sign as a distinctive sign for (all or some of) those goods or services? f

XII. In the assessment of the abovementioned questions, is significance to be attached to the fact that, since the Benelux countries have chosen to have applications for registration of trademarks examined by the Benelux Trademarks Office as a requirement prior to registration, the appraisal policy of the Office under Article 6a of the UBL, according to the common commentary of the Governments, "must be a cautious and restrained one whereby all concerns of commercial life must be taken into account and efforts must be focused on establishing solely which applications are manifestly inadmissible and rectifying or refusing them"? If so, under what rules does it fall to be determined whether an application is "manifestly inadmissible"? g

It is assumed that in invalidity proceedings (which may be initiated after registration of a sign) it is not necessary, in addition to reliance on the nullity of the sign lodged as a mark, for the sign to be "manifestly inadmissible". h

XIII. (a) Is it consistent with the scheme of the directive and the Paris Convention for a sign to be registered for specific goods or services subject to the limitation that the registration applies only to those goods and services in so far as they do not possess a specific quality or specific qualities (for example, registration of the sign "Postkantoor" for the services of direct-mail campaigns and the issue of postage stamps "provided they are not connected with a post office")? ... i

- a XVI. Is it also material to the answer to be given to the questions whether a corresponding sign for similar goods or services is registered as a trademark in another Member State?

III—THE LEGAL FRAMEWORK

b 1—The international protection of trade marks

8. Trade marks, like other forms of industrial property, have long enjoyed extensive international protection, which was initiated by the Paris Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property (the Paris Convention) of 20 March 1883<sup>8</sup>, to which all the member states are signatories<sup>9</sup>.

- c 9. As I pointed out in a previous opinion, the first provision of the convention establishes the Union for the protection of industrial property (art 1(1)), known as the Union of Paris. The Paris Convention constitutes a point of reference, which the laws of the signatory states and the agreements and treaties entered into by those states between themselves must respect (arts 25 and 19)<sup>10</sup>.

- d 10. The substantive provisions of the Paris Convention, which regulate the international protection of the different forms of industrial property (arts 1 to 11), contain a notable number of articles providing for the protection of trade marks, including art 6quinquies(B), pursuant to which:

‘Trademarks covered by this Article may be neither denied registration nor invalidated except in the following cases ...

- e 2. when they are devoid of any distinctive character, or consist exclusively of signs or indications which may serve, in trade, to designate the kind, quality, quantity, intended purpose, value, place of origin, of the goods, or the time of production, or have become customary in the current language or in the bona fide and established practices of the trade of the country where protection is claimed ...’

- f 11. Article 6quinquies(C)(1) of the convention provides that:

‘In determining whether a mark is eligible for protection, all the factual circumstances must be taken into consideration, particularly the length of time the mark has been in use.’

g 2—Trade marks in Community law

A—The Treaty establishing the European Community

12. Article 30 EC (formerly art 36 of the EC Treaty) provides:

‘The provisions of Articles 28 and 29 shall not preclude prohibitions or restrictions on imports, exports or goods in transit justified on grounds of ... the protection of industrial and commercial property. Such

8 As regards trade marks (UN Treaty Series No 11851 vol 828 pp 305–388), the convention was extended by the two Madrid Agreements of 1891, one concerning the repression of false and deceptive indications of source on goods and the other concerning the international registration of marks; by the Trade Mark Law Treaty of 1994; and by the Nice Agreement, cited in footnote 4.

i 9 The Netherlands has been a state party to the Convention since 7 July 1884.

10 See the opinion of 18 January 2001 in Merz & Krell GmbH & Co v Deutsches Patent- und Markenamt Case C-517/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 441, [2001] ECR I-6959, and in particular point 6 thereof. Article 2(1) of the Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights, annexed to the Agreement establishing the World Trade Organisation (Marrakesh, 15 April 1994; TS 12 (1996); Cm 3045) (OJ 1994 L336 pp 214 to 223), provides that, in respect of, inter alia, trade marks, member states shall comply with arts 1 to 12, and art 19, of the Paris Convention.

prohibitions or restrictions shall not, however, constitute a means of arbitrary discrimination or a disguised restriction on trade between Member States.’ a

B—The Trade Marks Directive

13. With a view to the establishment and functioning of the internal market, the Trade Marks Directive is aimed at approximating the laws of the member states relating to trade marks. However, it is only aimed at partial approximation, meaning that the role of the Community legislature is limited to trade marks acquired by registration, leaving member states free to fix the provisions of procedure concerning the registration, revocation and invalidity of trade marks so acquired<sup>11</sup>. b

14. Article 2 sets out the signs of which a trade mark may consist: c

‘A trade mark may consist of any sign capable of being represented graphically, particularly words, including personal names, designs, letters, numerals, the shape of goods or of their packaging, provided that such signs are capable of distinguishing the goods or services of one undertaking from those of other undertakings.’ d

15. Article 3 of the Trade Marks Directive lists the cases in which a trade mark registration may be refused or, where appropriate, declared invalid:

‘1. The following shall not be registered or if registered shall be liable to be declared invalid—(a) signs which cannot constitute a trade mark; (b) trade marks which are devoid of any distinctive character; (c) trade marks which consist exclusively of signs or indications which may serve, in trade, to designate the kind, quality, quantity, intended purpose, value, geographical origin, or the time of production of the goods or of rendering of the service, or other characteristics of the goods or service; (d) trade marks which consist exclusively of signs or indications which have become customary in the current language or in the bona fide and established practices of the trade ...’ e

3. A trade mark shall not be refused registration or be declared invalid in accordance with paragraph 1(b), (c) or (d) if, before the date of application for registration and following the use which has been made of it, it has acquired a distinctive character. Any Member State may in addition provide that this provision shall also apply where the distinctive character was acquired after the date of application for registration or after the date of registration.’ f

16. Article 5 governs the rights of the proprietors of trade marks in the following manner: g

‘1. The registered trade mark shall confer on the proprietor exclusive rights therein. The proprietor shall be entitled to prevent all third parties not having his consent from using in the course of trade—(a) any sign which is identical with the trade mark in relation to goods or services which are identical with those for which the trade mark is registered; (b) any sign where, because of its identity with, or similarity to, the trade mark and the identity or similarity of the goods or services covered by the trade h a mark and the sign, there exists a likelihood of confusion on the part of the public, which includes the likelihood of association between the sign and the trade mark.

2. Any Member State may also provide that the proprietor shall be entitled to prevent all third parties not having his consent from using in the course of trade any sign which is identical with, or similar to, the trade mark in relation to goods or services which are not similar to those for which the trade mark is registered, where the latter has a reputation in the Member State and where use of that sign without due cause takes unfair advantage of, or is detrimental to, the distinctive character or the repute of the trade mark ...'

c 17. Article 6 limits the rights conferred by ownership of a trade mark, stipulating that:

'1. The trade mark shall not entitle the proprietor to prohibit a third party from using, in the course of trade ... (b) indications concerning the kind, quality, quantity, intended purpose, value, geographical origin, the time of production of goods or of rendering of the service, or other characteristics of goods or services ...'

C—The Community trade mark regulation

e 18. On 20 December 1993, the Council adopted Council Regulation (EC) 40/94 (on the Community trade mark) (the Trade Marks Regulation)<sup>12</sup>, in order, as I pointed out in the opinion referred to above, that the internal market could enjoy conditions similar to those in a national market and, in particular, conditions which, from a legal perspective, 'enable undertakings to adapt their activities to the scale of the Community, whether in manufacturing and distributing goods or in providing services'<sup>13</sup>. The aim was to create 'trade marks ... which are governed by a uniform Community law directly applicable in all Member States'<sup>14</sup>. This aim is to be pursued but does not purport to replace the laws of the member states on trade marks<sup>15</sup>.

f 19. The Trade Marks Regulation adopts the same approach as and uses identical wording to the Trade Marks Directive, in that it lists the signs of which a Community trade mark may consist (art 4) and then goes on to set out the grounds for refusal of registration (arts 7 and 8). Like the directive, it stipulates the rights conferred by a Community trade mark (art 9) and the limitations of the effects of such a trade mark (art 12).

3—Trade marks in the Benelux Economic Union

h 20. With the aim of promoting the free movement of goods between their respective territories, the three member states of the Benelux Economic Union signed a convention on trade marks on 19 March 1962<sup>16</sup>, under which they were each required to transpose into their national legal systems the accompanying Uniform Law.

i 21. The convention, which entered into force on 1 July 1969, created a new administrative body, the Benelux-Merkenbureau, which is situated in the

13 First recital in the preamble to the regulation.

Hague and is responsible for enforcing the Uniform Law and its implementing provisions. The courts of the three Benelux states are responsible for interpreting the legislation, and the Benelux Court has jurisdiction to give preliminary rulings<sup>17</sup>. a

22. With a view to transposing the Trade Marks Directive into Benelux law, and to supplementing it with the relevant provisions governing the Community trade mark, on 2 December 1992, Belgium, Luxembourg and the Netherlands signed a protocol aimed at amending the Uniform Benelux Law<sup>18</sup>. Under art 8, the protocol and the amendments it inserted into the Uniform Law entered into force on 1 January 1996. b

23. The final paragraph of point I(6) of the common commentary of the governments in question regarding the protocol states that: c

‘the appraisal policy of the Benelux-Merkenbureau ... must be a cautious and restrained one, which takes account of all commercial concerns and is focused on rectifying or refusing evidently inadmissible applications. Needless to say, the examination must remain within the boundaries laid down in Benelux case law, in particular that of the Benelux Court.’ d

24. In accordance with art 1 of the Uniform Benelux Law:

‘The following may be registered as individual marks: names, designs, imprints, stamps, letters, numerals, the shape of goods or their packaging, and any other signs which serve to distinguish the goods of an undertaking. e

However, shapes which result from the nature of the goods themselves, or which affect the substantial value of the goods, or which give rise to a technical result may not be registered as trade marks.’

25. Article 6a provides:

‘1. The Benelux-Merkenbureau shall refuse registration where, in its view: (a) the sign applied for does not satisfy the description in Article 1 of a mark, in particular where it is devoid of any distinctive character within the meaning of Article 6 quinquies (B)(2) of the Paris Convention ... f

2. Refusal of registration must relate to the whole of a sign constituting a mark. It may be limited to one or more of the goods for which the mark is intended. g

3. The Benelux Trade Mark Office shall inform the applicant forthwith in writing of its intention to refuse registration wholly or in part, stating the reasons therefor, and shall afford the applicant the possibility of replying within such period as may be laid down in the implementing regulations. g

4. If the objections of the Benelux Trade Mark Office to registration are not lifted within the period laid down, registration shall be refused in whole or in part. The office shall forthwith inform the applicant in writing of such refusal, stating the reasons therefor and informing him of his right of action against the decision under Article 6b.’ h

17 See art 10. Established by a treaty dated 31 March 1965 and inaugurated on 1 January 1974, the judicial role fulfilled by the Benelux Court of Justice is the same as that which is assigned to the Court of Justice of the European Communities at a Community level; namely, the interpretation of provisions of uniform Benelux law by means of replies to questions referred for preliminary rulings by the three member states. Advocate General Jacobs remarked on this similarity of roles in the opinion he delivered on 29 April 1997 in Parfums Christian Dior SA v Evora BV Case C-337/95 [1997] ECR I-6013 (paras 13, 26). i a 26. Article 6b provides that:

‘Within two months of the notification mentioned in Article 6a(4), the applicant may apply to the Hof van Beroep [Court of Appeal] te Brussel, the Gerechtshof te ‘s-Gravenhage, or the Cour d’appel [Court of Appeal] de Luxembourg for an order for registration.’

b 27. Article 13C provides that the exclusive right to a trade mark expressed in one of the national or regional languages of the Benelux territory ‘extends to its translation in another of those languages’.

IV—ANALYSIS OF THE QUESTIONS REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

c 1—Introduction

28. It is worrying that a court of recognised competence should harbour so many doubts concerning the application of Community trade mark provisions. There appears to be a significant distortion within the system, since it is difficult to believe that the work of the European Union legislature could be so lacking in this area, or that those who are responsible for its implementation should fail to understand their role. Regardless of the reason, the Court of Justice is required to supplement and facilitate the work of others within the interpretative role conferred on it under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty).

2—Criteria for interpretation

e 29. In the opinion I delivered in the Merz & Krell case I noted the special structure of Community trade mark law<sup>19</sup>, which, rather like an onion, is made up of different layers which sit one on top of the other. The first, purely internal, layer corresponds to the Community Trade Marks Regulation. The second comprises the laws of the member states, which have been harmonised pursuant to the Trade Marks Directive. The third and final layer consists of the international trade mark obligations entered into by all the member states.

f 30. The present case sees the insertion of another layer between the last two, which corresponds to the uniform Benelux legislation on this type of industrial property. The three member states of that economic association unified their respective trade mark laws, but, in addition, they harmonised those same laws with the laws of the other member states of the European Union by adapting the Uniform Law to the Trade Marks Directive, and naturally they did so in compliance with their commitments under the Paris Convention.

g 31. Therefore, the court is required to provide an integrated interpretation of the provisions of the Trade Marks Directive referred to in the Gerechtshof’s questions, and in doing so the court must have regard to the whole body of Community trade mark law.

h 32. When performing that task, it is important not to lose sight of the raison d’être of trade mark law, which is to guarantee the identity of the origin of the product or service identified by the sign to the consumer or end-user, by enabling him to distinguish that product or service from products or services having a different origin, thereby contributing to the establishment of a genuine system of competition in the internal market<sup>20</sup>. In order to achieve that goal, the trade mark owner is granted an assortment of rights and powers which must be considered in the light of the latter objective. The rights of advantage which ownership of a trade mark confers on its owner exist so that consumers will be able to distinguish the marked product or service from products or services of different origins. As such, they may also be subject to restrictions, including restrictions deriving from the fact that it is in the public interest to ensure that certain names remain as widely available as possible (the requirement of availability). a

20 See the judgments in SA CNL-SUCAL NV v HAG GF AG Case C-10/89 [1990] ECR I-3711 (para 14) (the HAG II case), and in Loendersloot (t/a F Loendersloot Internationale Expeditie) v George Ballantine & Son Ltd Case C-349/95 [1997] ECR I-6227 (para 24).

33. In short, the relationship between the rights conferred by ownership of a registered trade mark and the trade mark itself is instrumental. For that reason, in order to determine the precise scope of the exclusive right granted to a trade mark owner, regard must be had to the essential function of the trade mark<sup>21</sup>. c

3—The nature of the assessment of distinctive character (questions IV(a), V, VI, XI, XIII(a) and XVI)

34. By these questions the national court seeks to understand the nature of the judicial assessment of whether a sign is capable of constituting a trade mark. d

35. First of all (questions IV(a), V and VI), the Gerechtshof wishes to know, in detail, if the assessment of whether a sign is capable of constituting a trade mark must be carried out in the abstract or, alternatively, by reference to the specific circumstances of each case. In that regard, the Gerechtshof points out that, prior to lodging its application, the applicant had already used the sign on a large scale as a trade mark for the products in question, and that it appeared on inquiry that, vis-à-vis the goods and services which it was intended to identify, the sign would not be liable to mislead the public. e

36. By way of a preliminary point, the facets of the Gerechtshof's questions which relate to the individual procedural stages under current Benelux law, namely, the initial appraisal carried out by the trade mark office (question IV(a)), the assessment—by the same body—of the applicant's objections (question V), and the subsequent judicial assessment (question VI), must be disregarded. The Trade Marks Directive contains no provisions governing the regulation of the registration procedure, stating instead that member states are free to organise that procedure as they see fit<sup>22</sup>. The court's reply must, therefore, be restricted to the assessment carried out by 'the competent authorities in accordance with domestic law'. f

37. Additionally, and for similar reasons, no special significance should be attached to the fact that question IV(a) refers only to 'the absolute grounds for refusal ... as laid down in art 3(1) in conjunction with art 2 of ... [the] Directive'. Although it is correct that, under the Community law scheme, the first circumstance mentioned by the national court is required to be assessed in the context of the absolute grounds for refusal, the second circumstance—which relates to the likelihood of error or confusion—must be assessed in the context of the relative grounds listed in art 4. Since—and I must reiterate this—the Trade Marks Directive is neutral in relation to the member states' procedural options, there is nothing to preclude a national legal system from stipulating that both matters must be assessed simultaneously. The court's reply cannot disregard that fact. h a 38. On that basis, it can be concluded that an assessment of the conditions which must be met in order for a sign to be eligible for protection by registration as a trade mark must—essentially—be specific in nature, in the sense that a variety of factual circumstances must be taken into consideration, as quite clearly follows from the absolute rule laid down in art 6quinquies(C)(1) of the Paris Convention<sup>23</sup>.

b 39. Under art 3(1)(a) of the Trade Marks Directive, in conjunction with art 2, during the relevant procedural phase the competent authority is required to have regard not only to whether the sign applied for is capable of distinguishing the goods or services in question, but also to whether it is capable of being represented graphically. Where, as in the main proceedings, the sign in question is a word, it is difficult to imagine that that would not be the case<sup>24</sup>.
c This is the only assessment which may be somewhat abstract in nature.

40. The authority is then required to establish whether the sign meets the conditions laid down in art 3(1)(b), (c) and (d), namely that it must distinguish the goods or services in question, and that it must not be descriptive of or generic to those goods or services. Each condition is independent of the others
d and requires a separate assessment, although, in practice, the same sign may frequently fail to meet more than one condition<sup>25</sup>. It is also necessary to assess whether a sign, despite being devoid of any distinctive character for the purposes of art 3(1)(b), (c) and (d), has acquired such character through use, as laid down in art 3(3).

It follows from art 3(3) that signs which meet the conditions laid down in e sub-para (b), (c) and (d) have 'distinctive character'. It is regrettable that the legislature created such ambiguity, as a result of which it is necessary to consider whether a sign is 'capable of distinguishing' or has a potentially distinctive character (art 2), whether it has a definite distinctive character (art 3(1)(b)), or whether it has a distinctive character as a category (art 3(3)), f thereby adding to the already considerable difficulties involved in conceptual delimitation.

The competent authority must also ensure that the sign in respect of which registration is sought is not liable to deceive the public as to the nature, quality or geographical origin of the product or service (art 3(1)(g)), and that it is not likely to cause confusion with other, earlier trade marks (art 4(1)(b)). The g factual assessment does not end there, since the Trade Marks Directive provides that signs which are contrary to public policy or to accepted principles of morality are to be refused registration or are liable to be declared invalid (art 3(1)(f)).

41. It is almost impossible to imagine that an assessment of each of the above conditions could be carried out in the abstract, in particular the condition as to h the distinctive character of a sign recognised as a category of goods or services. Indeed, signs distinguish, are descriptive or are generic by reference to the specific goods or services which they are intended to designate, and in relation to which protection is sought<sup>26</sup>.

i 24 The same cannot be said of sensory phenomena, such as smells, which are not capable of being represented graphically (in that connection, see the opinion I delivered in Sieckmann v Deutsches Patent- und Markenamt Case C-273/00 [2004] All ER (EC) 253, [2002] ECR I-11737).

25 As the Commission rightly notes in its written observations, a descriptive sign will generally be devoid of distinctive character for the purposes of art 3(1)(b).

26 On the likelihood of confusion, see SABEL BV v Puma AG, Rudolf Dassler Sport Case C-251/95 [1997] ECR I-6191 (para 22).

The limitation of protection to one or a few categories of goods or services, together with the limitation created by the territorial area in which the trade mark will take effect, mean that the assessment of distinctive character should be conducted from the point of view of the average consumer of the same types of goods or services in the territory in respect of which registration is applied for<sup>27</sup>, such a consumer being presumed to be 'reasonably well-informed and reasonably observant and circumspect'<sup>28</sup>.

Despite a recent judgment of the court<sup>29</sup>, it is my view that the linguistic factor must also be assessed only by reference to the average consumer specifically characterised above. In other words, it is necessary to have regard not so much to whether that consumer speaks the language in which the sign is formulated as to whether, irrespective of the language or languages of the territory concerned, the consumer taken as a reference can reasonably be expected to perceive in the sign a meaning such as to enable it to qualify under art 3(1)(b), (c) and (d)<sup>30</sup>.

42. In short, it is appropriate to reply to the referring court that, when assessing whether a sign is eligible for registration as a trade mark, the competent authority must have regard not only to the sign as per the application for registration but to all the other relevant circumstances, including the possibility that the sign has acquired distinctive character through use, and the likelihood of error or confusion perceived from the point of view of an average consumer, bearing in mind at all times the goods or services identified by the sign.

43. The referring court also asks whether the mere fact that a descriptive sign has been lodged for registration as a trade mark for goods or services in respect of which it is not descriptive is sufficient for a finding that the sign has distinctive character. If that is not the case, the national court goes on to ask whether any importance should be attached to the fact that, specifically on account of the sign's descriptive character, the public does not perceive the sign as being capable of distinguishing all, or any of, the relevant goods or services (question XI).

44. As I indicated above, each of the conditions stipulated in art 3(1)(b), (c) and (d) of the Trade Marks Directive requires a separate assessment. Accordingly, the fact that a sign is not descriptive does not necessarily mean that it has distinctive character, either in a broad sense (in other words, as a category of sign which meets all the conditions of art 3(1)(b), (c) and (d)) or, still less, in a strict sense (ex art 3(1)(b)). Moreover, as I have also pointed out, signs are distinctive, descriptive or generic only by reference to the goods or services being identified. Descriptiveness, like the other attributes in question,

27 See Windsurfing Chiemsee Produktions- und Vertriebs GmbH (WSC) v Boots- und Segelzubehör Walter Huber Joined cases C-108/97 and C-109/97 [2000] Ch 523, [1999] ECR I-2779 (para 29).

28 See, inter alia, Gut Springenheide GmbH v Oberkreisdirektor des Kreises Steinfurt—Amt für Lebensmittelüberwachung Case C-210/96 [1998] ECR I-4657 (paras 30–32).

29 See Procter & Gamble Co v Office of Harmonisation in the Internal Market (Trade Marks and Designs) Case C-383/99 P [2002] All ER (EC) 29, [2001] ECR I-6251 (para 42) (the Baby-Dry case), in which it was held without any explanation that an assessment only needed to be carried out from the point of view of an English-speaking consumer.

30 Thus, for example, a sign intended to identify computing goods or services must be assessed not merely by reference to the language of the territory but also by reference to certain English terminology with which operators and consumers in that sector are assumed to be familiar. The same applies to foreign terms which have become part of the shared global lexicon and which frequently acquire a separate meaning that does not necessarily correspond to their meaning in the original language. Consider the words 'light', 'premium', and perhaps even 'baby' or 'dry'.

a is a purely relative quality and, therefore, under the Trade Marks Directive the scenario to which the Gerechtshof refers in the alternative cannot arise.

45. The Netherlands court also inquires whether a system under which it is permissible to register a sign, limiting protection to goods and services which do not possess a specific characteristic, is consistent with the Trade Marks Directive (question XIII(a)).

b This question concerns the so-called 'disclaimer' mechanism, which is recognised under Benelux trade mark law and by means of which an applicant may disclaim the protection afforded by a trade mark for certain goods which either possess, or are devoid of, a particular characteristic.

c I can find nothing in the wording of the Trade Marks Directive to preclude national authorities from administering their registration system on the basis of such disclaimers which, in any event, by merely specifying the goods or services to which protection applies, do not affect the primary purpose of enabling consumers to identify the undertaking of origin. Nor is my opinion changed by the Nice Agreement<sup>31</sup>, whose classification system is, in any event, not mandatory.

d 46. Finally, the Gerechtshof wishes to know whether the fact that a corresponding sign has been registered in another member state for similar goods or services is material to the assessment of the sign (question XVI).

e 47. The Trade Marks Directive seeks to approximate the laws of the member states, without unifying them. National courts are therefore required to interpret domestic law in the light of the wording and purpose of the directive in order to achieve the result pursued by the latter and thereby comply with the third paragraph of art 249 EC<sup>32</sup> (formerly art 189 of the EC Treaty), referring questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling where appropriate.

f There is, however, no hierarchical relationship between the Court of Justice and the national courts, nor between the national courts themselves. Nor is there any requirement that those courts must reach the same conclusions, save that they apply the same principles of interpretation. Therefore, the practices of one member state are not binding on the authorities of another member state. Nevertheless, in the interests of prudence and mutual trust, the basis for which is the pursuit of the above-mentioned objective, those practices—and, in particular, the reasoning on which they are based—constitute a useful indication to which the competent authority may refer in its assessment of whether a sign has distinctive character.

4—Descriptive marks (question IX(a))

h 48. Article 3(1)(c) of the Trade Marks Directive prohibits marks which consist exclusively of signs which may serve, in trade, to designate the kind, quality, quantity, intended purpose, value, geographical origin, or the time of production of the goods or of rendering of the service, or other characteristics of the goods.

i 49. In connection with such signs or indications, which may be described succinctly as 'descriptive', the Gerechtshof seeks guidance from the court regarding.

31 Cited in footnote 4, above.

32 On the question of the harmonisation of trade marks, see the judgment in Bayerische Motorenwerke AG (BMW) v Deenik Case C-63/97 [1999] All ER (EC) 235, [1999] ECR I-905 (para 22).

—The scope for prohibiting or permitting signs or names which describe the service or product in question, but which are not the only ones to do so, nor the ones which are used most regularly. a

—The bearing which the number of competitors who may have an interest in using the indications might have on the assessment of whether the indications are descriptive in character, in addition to the relevance to that assessment of the fact that, under domestic law, the right to a trade mark expressed in one of the national or regional languages of the Benelux area automatically extends to its translation in the other Benelux languages. b

50. According to the parties, the Gerechtshof seeks guidance in relation to descriptive marks because it is uncertain as to whether the case law of the Benelux Court which preceded the amendment of the Uniform Law to comply with the Trade Marks Directive Kinder<sup>33</sup> and Juicy Fruit<sup>34</sup> is still applicable<sup>35</sup>. Such a question may not be raised before this court. It is not for the Court of Justice either to review the national laws of the member states or of regional unions such as the Benelux Union or, indeed, to review the case law of their courts. As regards references for preliminary rulings, the court's task is to provide a correct interpretation of Community law. Accordingly, it is not appropriate to analyse the Uniform Law as it stood prior to its adaptation to the Trade Marks Directive or the interpretation of the Law delivered by the competent courts. Instead, the task to be performed entails determining the scope of art 3(1)(c) of the Trade Marks Directive in relation to descriptive trade marks. c

51. Article 3(1)(c) precludes so-called descriptive trade marks on the basis that that type of representation of signs and products lacks the capacity to distinguish, the reason being that where the kind, quality, quantity or other characteristics of an object are designated, it is the object itself which is being described. It is precisely because such signs fail to individualise the goods or services to which they relate that no one is permitted to register them in order to distinguish their goods and services from those of other persons. e

However, in assessing whether or not a sign is descriptive, regard may also be had to certain public-interest considerations which are different in nature.

52. As the Commission of the European Communities rightly points out in its observations, the question posed by the referring court relates to the question whether the so-called 'requirement of availability' principle of German law (Freihaltebedürfnis) applies within the context of the Trade Marks Directive. According to that proposition, in addition to the impediments associated with a lack of distinctive character, there are also other public-interest considerations which militate in favour of limiting the registration of certain signs so that they may be used freely by all operators. g

34 Judgment of the Benelux Court of Justice of 5 October 1982 in Wrigley v Benzon Case A 81/4, Jurisprudence Cour de Justice Benelux, 1980–1982, vol 3, p 20.

35 Pursuant to that case law, in order to determine whether a sign is descriptive the following must be taken into consideration: (a) whether the words of which the mark is composed are the only ones which are appropriate to designate the product or, alternatively, whether there are synonyms which could be used; (b) whether, from a commercial perspective, the words designate an essential attribute of the product or merely an incidental characteristic; (c) the nature of the product and the definition of the target consumer; and (d) the level of repute which the mark enjoys. Signs which, while not classed as descriptive, are evocative of the product or service in question may be registered as trade marks. i a    53. The Court of Justice explained the extent to which those considerations apply to the Trade Marks Directive in the Windsurfing Chiemsee case.

54. In that case, the court held that art 3(1)(c) of the Trade Marks Directive pursues an aim which is in the public interest, namely that descriptive signs may be freely used by all, including as collective marks or as part of complex or graphic marks. Article 3(1)(c) therefore prevents such signs from being reserved to one undertaking alone because they have been registered as trade marks<sup>36</sup>.

b    55. As regards indications of geographical origin, the court held that it is in the public interest that they remain available, because they may be an indication of the characteristics of the goods concerned, and may also give rise to a favourable response<sup>37</sup>. As a result of that proviso, which relates to 'indications which may serve to designate the geographical origin', the competent authority is required to assess whether a geographical name, in respect of which application for registration as a trade mark is made, designates a place which is currently associated in the mind of the relevant class of persons with the category of goods concerned (as with geographical locations which are already well-known for those goods), or whether it is reasonable to assume that such an association may be established in the future<sup>38</sup>.

e    57. The Court of Justice thus held that underlying art 3(1)(c) there is a requirement that any assessment is guided by the fact that it is in the public interest to keep certain signs available but that it is not necessary for that requirement of availability to be real, current or serious as had been held under German case law. Such an assessment is not, however, possible in relation to art 3(3) of the Trade Marks Directive, since this article does not permit any differentiation as regards distinctiveness by reference to the perceived importance of keeping the geographical name available for use by other undertakings<sup>40</sup>.

f    58. I must also point out that, while the Baby-Dry judgment does not expressly contradict that case law, it does not restate it either. Although the Baby-Dry case concerned the interpretation of the Community Trade Mark Regulation, as opposed to the Trade Marks Directive, the two pieces of legislation are intended to be applied uniformly.

g    Therefore, at para 37 of the Baby-Dry case, the court held that the purpose of prohibiting registration of purely descriptive signs or indications as trade marks is to prevent protection being afforded to signs or indications which, because they are no different from the usual way of designating the relevant goods or services, or their characteristics, are not able to fulfil the function of identifying the undertaking that markets them and are thus devoid of the distinctive character needed for that function.

h    59. That recent judgment thus fails to refer to the public interest there is in availability. It is the case that in the Baby-Dry case, unlike in the Windsurfing

i    36 See the Windsurfing Chiemsee case (para 25).

38 See footnote above (paras 29–31).

39 This can be inferred from the wording of para 26 of the judgment in the Windsurfing Chiemsee case (more particularly), and from the general wording of para 35.

40 Judgment in the Windsurfing Chiemsee case (paras 35, 48).

Chiemsee case, the issue was not specifically debated<sup>41</sup>, but it is also the case that the appellant raised the issue at that time, claiming that the reasoning of the Court of First Instance of the European Communities amounted to an acceptance that Community law does recognise, to some extent, the requirement of availability and that the Court of Justice avoided the issue and delivered a judgment in general terms. There is, therefore, some uncertainty as to whether the proposition applies to Community trade mark law, which it is for the court to dispel by either approving or overruling expressis verbis its earlier case law.

60. In light of that uncertainty, it would be desirable, when assessing whether a sign is descriptive, to continue to bear in mind the possibility that there may be public-interest considerations aimed at retaining a certain degree of availability, as was found in the Windsurfing Chiemsee case<sup>42</sup>.

61. Recently, it has become fashionable—particularly among groups whose impartiality is questionable—to assert that, contrary to the view hitherto held, trade mark law does not create any monopoly in relation to the signs which are its object. It is said, on the one hand, that the exclusive right thereby created may be exercised only in relation to the goods and products designated and that, in any event, the descriptive terms forming part of a mark may continue to be used freely.

To my mind, that reasoning is fallacious. First, monopolies are always relative, whether to a product, to a territory, or to a moment in time. A trade mark does not monopolise a term but specifically the use of that term as a trade mark, and, furthermore, it does not impose any limitation as to time. Second, a trade mark creates a privilege which enables an operator to register a sign in order to designate its goods or services. That privilege becomes all the more excessive when it concerns expressions in everyday use. It is fair and natural that a public authority should be able to reward, with a higher level of protection, signs which demonstrate ingenuity or imagination<sup>43</sup>, and that it should require other signs, which merely reflect aspects or attributes of the products in question, to satisfy more rigorous conditions in order to be eligible for registration. Nor do I think it appropriate for economic development and the promotion of commercial initiatives that established operators should be able to register for their own benefit all the descriptive combinations imaginable, or the most effective such combinations, to the detriment of new operators, who are obliged to use invented names which are more difficult to remember and to establish.

For those reasons, in the absence of a specific statement by the court, it is my view that the rule in the Windsurfing Chiemsee case still applies, and that Community trade mark law does, to a certain extent, recognise the requirement of availability.

62. The Gerechtshof also inquires whether the fact that, under domestic law, the right to a trade mark expressed in one of the national or regional languages a of the Benelux area automatically extends to its translation in the other Benelux languages has any bearing on the assessment of whether the indications are descriptive in character.

b 63. When implementing the Trade Marks Directive, national authorities must ensure that its provisions are complied with in the territories over which they have sovereignty. If a particular territory has implemented a system of trade mark registration which covers several linguistic regions, it would be in keeping with the aims of the directive for an assessment of the distinctive character of a sign to be carried out in relation to each of the languages spoken.

c 5—Composite word marks (question X(a) and (b))

d 64. The Netherlands court wishes to know whether it is possible for a sign made up of various components, each of which is devoid of distinctive character, to have distinctive character itself, or whether such a sign has distinctive character only where the combination is more than the sum of its parts. In addition, the Netherlands court asks whether, for those purposes, it is relevant that there are synonyms, or that the sign indicates an essential or an incidental attribute.

65. It is first of all appropriate to note that a combination of components, each of which is devoid of distinctive character, can have distinctive character, provided that it amounts to more than just a mere sum of its parts.

e 66. It is therefore necessary to determine when a combination creates a sign which is distinct from the mere sum of its parts.

f 67. That very issue was central to the Baby-Dry case. The court held that, as regards trade marks composed of words, descriptiveness must be determined not only in relation to each word taken separately but also in relation to the whole which they form. Any perceptible difference between the combination of words submitted for registration and the terms used in the common parlance of the relevant class of consumers to designate the goods or services or their essential characteristics is apt to confer distinctive character on the word combination, enabling it to be registered as a trade mark<sup>44</sup>.

g Going on to assess the word combination, Baby-Dry, itself, the court held that, from the point of view of an English-speaking consumer, the word combination was composed of words which, despite being descriptive in themselves, were juxtaposed in an unusual manner, with the result that it was not a familiar expression in the English language, either for designating the products in question or for describing their essential characteristics. Accordingly, the word combination was capable of bestowing distinctive power and could not be refused registration<sup>45</sup>.

h 68. That judgment gives rise to a number of difficulties.

First of all—as I have already indicated—it casts doubt on the applicability of the precepts laid down barely two and a half years earlier in the Windsurfing Chiemsee case concerning recognition of the requirement of availability.

i Second—as I have also pointed out—it presupposes that the mother tongue of the average consumer concerned must be English, while the advantage of the disputed word combination was precisely the fact that it conveyed a highly descriptive message to a multi-linguistic public who could, nevertheless, be assumed to understand the rudiments of the lingua franca of our time.

44 Judgment in the Baby-Dry case (para 40).

45 See footnote above (paras 42–44).

Third, the judgment contains an assessment of factual matters, such as the perception of the descriptiveness of a word combination by likely consumers, which is not within the jurisdiction of an appeal court and which the court was not equipped to perform, since no expert evidence on the subject had been submitted<sup>46</sup>.

69. Nor do I agree with the test which was proposed in order to determine whether a word combination made up of descriptive components has distinctive character. The court held that 'any perceptible difference' between the terms usually used to designate the product, or its essential characteristics, and the combination of words in question was sufficient for that purpose.

If that, purely minimum, test is not tempered by the 'requirement of availability' approach, to which the judgment in question did not refer, I do not believe that it is capable of ensuring that trade marks are not essentially descriptive in nature.

70. However, what is at issue is a very recent decision, which was, moreover, adopted by the court in plenary session, for which reason it will probably be of no avail to seek a reversal of precedent. Suffice it therefore to propose that, for the purposes of art 3(1)(c), a difference will be regarded as perceptible if it affects important components of either the form of the sign or its meaning. As regards form, a perceptible difference arises where, as a result of the unusual or imaginative nature of the word combination, the neologism itself is more important than the sum of the terms of which it is composed. As regards meaning, a difference will be perceptible provided that whatever is evoked by the composite sign is not identical to the sum of that which is suggested by the descriptive components.

71. That view is consistent with the one I proposed in relation to art 3(1)(e) of the Trade Marks Directive in Philips Electronics NV v Remington Consumer Products Ltd Case C-299/99<sup>47</sup>. Article 3(1)(e) precludes the registration of 'signs which consist exclusively of [certain shapes]', while art 3(1)(c) does likewise in relation to 'trade marks which consist exclusively of signs or indications which may serve ... to designate'. Although the two provisions have different purposes, the similarity of the wording indicates that a uniform approach to the two cases should be adopted.

72. On that occasion, I took the view that, for the purposes of art 3(1)(e), second indent, 'purely functional shape' is to be understood as any shape whose essential characteristics are attributable to the achievement of a technical result. I adjusted my interpretation referring to 'essential characteristics' in order to clarify that a shape only containing one arbitrary element which, from a functional point of view, is minor, such as its colour, does not escape the prohibition.

<sup>46</sup> Without wishing to get involved in a lengthy marketing discussion, it seems clear that ordinary consumers of disposable nappies would be people of parenting age. Furthermore, according to the judgment, they must also speak English as their mother tongue. Indeed, the court, unsupported by any external proof, decided to offer its own opinion of the descriptive character of the word combination in question, despite the fact that only one of the members of the court was a native English speaker and that all of them appeared to have left that happy stage behind them. In addition, by holding that Baby-Dry is an unusual juxtaposition of an expression that is unfamiliar in the English language, the court adopted an excessively academic view. The court should instead have considered whether the construction was capable of provoking a semantic response, such as 'This product keeps my baby dry'. Finally, had the court used as a reference point a European consumer of the age indicated, who might have known both words, then it would have been in a position to conclude that the chosen word order corresponds to that used by speakers of Romance languages.

a Nor does art 3(1)(c) permit any difference whatsoever to qualify, allowing instead only those which are relevant to the description.

73. As regards the prohibition on the registration of functional shapes as trade marks, I concluded that, although it only served to prevent a slight risk that trade mark rights might unduly encroach on the field of patents, the public interest should not have to tolerate such a risk, since operators are able to protect their products by the addition of arbitrary features.

b 74. A similar line of argument also applies to this case. The prohibition of descriptive marks means that everyone is able freely to use signs which designate goods and services, or the essential characteristics thereof. While it is true that art 6(1) of the Trade Marks Directive precludes the proprietor of a trade mark from preventing the use of such indications by third parties, it is also true that permitting the registration of descriptive marks unfairly precludes the use of such indications as trade marks by a section of operators, and maintains the advantage initially acquired over a resource that is very likely to be exhausted, such as, in relation to the goods they designate, descriptive terms with positive associations. I see no reason why Community law should tolerate such a risk of stagnation when operators could easily resort to solutions that are imaginative or original.

75. It follows from the above that considerations relating to the existence of synonyms or the essential, or incidental, nature of the descriptive element of a sign are immaterial to the assessment of distinctive character.

e 76. The Gerechtshof wishes to know whether the fact that the protection conferred on a trade mark expressed in one of the national or regional languages of the Benelux area extends to its translation in the other Benelux languages has any bearing on the assessment of distinctive character in relation to a sign composed of descriptive components.

f 77. As I stated above<sup>48</sup>, if a particular territory has implemented a system of trade mark registration which covers several linguistic regions, it would be in keeping with the aims of the Trade Marks Directive for an assessment of the distinctive character of a sign to be carried out in relation to each of the languages spoken.

6—Peculiarities of Benelux law

g 78. By question XII(a), the national court seeks guidance concerning the significance to be attached to the appraisal policy which, under Benelux law, the Merkenbureau is obliged to follow, particularly in relation to the rules governing 'evidently inadmissible applications', and with regard to the common commentary of the governments of the Benelux area concerning the amendment of the Uniform Law on Trade Marks<sup>49</sup>.

h 79. This question clearly requires an interpretation of current Benelux legal practice, rather than Community law, and that is not within the jurisdiction of the Court of Justice. The question must therefore be held inadmissible.

CONCLUSION

i 80. In the light of the above, I propose that the Court of Justice should reply to the questions referred for a preliminary ruling by the Gerechtshof te 's-Gravenhage as follows:

(1) In assessing whether a sign is eligible for registration as a trade mark, the competent authority must, under First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 (to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks), have regard not only to the sign as per the application for registration but to all the other relevant circumstances, including the possibility that the sign has acquired distinctive character through use, and the likelihood of error or confusion perceived from the point of view of an average consumer, bearing in mind at all times the goods or services identified by the sign. a

(2) The fact that a sign is not descriptive does not necessarily mean that it has distinctive character. Signs are distinctive, descriptive or generic only by reference to the goods or services which they identify. b

(3) The directive does not preclude a national system under which applicants may disclaim the protection afforded by a trade mark in respect of certain goods which either possess, or are devoid of, a particular characteristic. c

(4) Article 3(1)(c) of the directive does not merely prohibit the registration as trade marks of descriptive signs which are currently associated, in the relevant sectors, with the category of goods in question; instead, it also applies to signs which may, in all reasonable likelihood, be used in those sectors in the future. d

(5) If a particular territory, to which the directive applies, has implemented a system of trade mark registration which covers several linguistic regions, it is in keeping with the aims of the directive for an assessment of the distinctive character of a sign to be carried out in relation to each of the languages spoken. e

(6) As regards trade marks composed of words, descriptive character must be assessed not only in relation to each term taken separately but also in relation to the whole which they form. Any perceptible difference between the meaning conveyed by the combination of words submitted for registration and the terms used in everyday language by the relevant group of consumers to designate the product or service in question, or the essential characteristics thereof, will be apt to confer distinctive character on the word combination. For those purposes, a difference will be regarded as perceptible where it affects important aspects of the form or meaning of the sign. f

12 February 2004. The COURT OF JUSTICE (Sixth Chamber) delivered the following judgment.

1. By judgment of 3 June 1999, received at the Court of Justice of the European Communities on 1 October 1999, the Gerechtshof te 's-Gravenhage (Regional Court of Appeal, the Hague) referred to the court for a preliminary ruling pursuant to art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) nine questions on the interpretation of arts 2 and 3 of First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 (to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks) (OJ 1989 L40 p 1; the directive). h

2. Those questions were raised in proceedings between Koninklijke KPN Nederland NV (KPN) and the Benelux Merkenbureau (Benelux Trademark Office; the BTMO) concerning the latter's refusal to register as a trade mark the sign 'Postkantoor' applied for by KPN for various goods and services. i

a LEGAL BACKGROUND

3. The purpose of the directive—according to the first recital in its preamble—is to approximate the trade mark laws of the member states so as to remove the disparities which may impede the free movement of goods and freedom to provide services and may distort competition within the common market.

4. However, as the third recital in its preamble makes clear, the directive does not aim for full-scale approximation of the trade mark laws of the member states and is limited to bringing about an approximation of those national provisions of law which most directly affect the functioning of the internal market.

5. The seventh recital in the preamble to the directive states that attainment of the objectives at which the approximation of the trade mark laws of the member states is aiming requires that the conditions for obtaining and continuing to hold a registered trade mark are, in general, identical in all member states and that the grounds for refusal or invalidity concerning the trade mark itself, for example, the absence of any distinctive character, are to be listed in an exhaustive manner, even if some of these grounds are listed as an option for the member states, which will therefore be able to maintain or introduce those grounds in their legislation.

6. The 12th recital in the preamble to the directive states that all member states of the Community are bound by the Paris Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property of 20 March 1883, as last revised at Stockholm on 14 July 1967 (UN Treaty Series No 11847 vol 828 pp 305–388) and that it is necessary that the provisions of the directive be entirely consistent with those of the Paris Convention.

7. Article 2 of the directive, entitled ‘Signs of which a trade mark may consist’, provides as follows:

‘A trade mark may consist of any sign capable of being represented graphically, particularly words, including personal names, designs, letters, numerals, the shape of goods or of their packaging, provided that such signs are capable of distinguishing the goods or services of one undertaking from those of other undertakings.’

8. Article 3 of the directive, which lists the grounds for refusal or invalidity, provides at paras (1) and (3):

‘1. The following shall not be registered or if registered shall be liable to be declared invalid—

(a) signs which cannot constitute a trade mark;

(b) trade marks which are devoid of any distinctive character;

(c) trade marks which consist exclusively of signs or indications which may serve, in trade, to designate the kind, quality, quantity, intended purpose, value, geographical origin, or the time of production of the goods or of rendering of the service, or other characteristics of the goods or service;

(d) trade marks which consist exclusively of signs or indications which have become customary in the current language or in the bona fide and established practices of the trade ...

(g) trade marks which are of such a nature as to deceive the public, for instance as to the nature, quality or geographical origin of the goods or service ... a

3. A trade mark shall not be refused registration or be declared invalid in accordance with paragraph 1(b), (c) or (d) if, before the date of application for registration and following the use which has been made of it, it has acquired a distinctive character. Any Member State may in addition provide that this provision shall also apply where the distinctive character was acquired after the date of application for registration or after the date of registration.' b

9. The Uniform Benelux Law on trade marks was amended, with effect from 1 January 1996, by the Protocol of 2 December 1992 amending that law (Nederlands Traktatenblad 1993, no 12, the UBL), in order to incorporate the directive into the laws of the three Benelux States. c

10. Article 1 of the UBL provides:

'The following may be registered as individual marks: names, designs, imprints, stamps, letters, numerals, the shape of goods or their packaging, and any other signs which serve to distinguish the goods of an undertaking.' d

However, shapes which result from the nature of the goods themselves, or which affect the substantial value of the goods, or which give rise to a technical result may not be registered as trade marks.' e

11. Article 6a of the UBL provides as follows:

'1. The Benelux Trade Mark Office shall refuse registration where it considers that:

(a) the sign filed does not constitute a trade mark within the meaning of Article 1, in particular because it is devoid of any distinctive character, as provided for in Article 6 quinquies B(2) of the Paris Convention; f

(b) the filing relates to a trade mark referred to in Article 4(1) and (2).

2. The refusal to register must relate to the sign that constitutes the trade mark in its entirety. It may be confined to one or more of the goods for which the mark is intended to be used.

3. The Benelux Office shall inform the applicant without delay and in writing of its intention to refuse registration in whole or in part, shall state the grounds and shall allow him a right to respond within a period of time to be laid down in an implementing regulation. g

4. If the objections of the Benelux Office to registration have not been removed within the period granted, registration of the filing shall be refused in whole or in part. The Benelux Office shall notify the applicant without delay and in writing, stating the grounds for refusal and advising of the possibility of review of the decision set out in Article 6b.' h

12. Article 6b of the UBL provides:

'The applicant may, within two months following notification under Article 6a(4), file at the Cour d'Appel, Brussels, the Gerechtshof at The Hague or the Cour d'Appel, Luxembourg, an application for an order that the filing be registered. The applicant's address, that of his representative, or the postal address given upon filing shall determine which court has territorial jurisdiction.' i

- a 13. Article 13C(1) of the UBL provides:

'The exclusive right to a trade mark expressed in one of the national or regional languages of the Benelux territory extends automatically to its translation in another of those languages.'

THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND THE QUESTIONS REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

- c 14. On 2 April 1997, KPN lodged with the BTMO an application for registration of 'Postkantoor' (which may be translated as 'post office') as a trade mark in respect of certain goods and services falling within classes 16, 35 to 39, 41 and 42 of the Nice Agreement concerning the International Classification of Goods and Services for the Purposes of the Registration of Marks (Nice, 15 June 1957; Cmnd 3466), as revised and amended (the Nice Agreement), classes which include paper, advertising, insurance, postage-stamps, construction, telecommunications, transport, education and technical information and advice.

- d 15. By letter of 16 June 1997, the BTMO informed KPN that it was provisionally refusing registration on the ground that 'the Postkantoor sign is exclusively descriptive of the goods and services mentioned in Classes 16, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 41 and 42 in relation to a post office' and that '[it] therefore ... has no distinctive character as provided for in Article 6a(i)(a) of the Uniform Benelux Law on Trademarks'.

- e 16. By letter of 15 December 1997, KPN raised an objection to the refusal but the latter was definitively confirmed by a letter from the BTMO of 28 January 1998.

- f 17. On 30 March 1998 KPN brought proceedings before the Gerechtshof te 's-Gravenhage, which held that the answer to certain questions, which concerned the interpretation of the UBL, called for a referral to the Benelux Court of Justice and that other questions, concerning the interpretation of the directive, should be referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities.

- g 18. It was in those circumstances that the Gerechtshof te 's-Gravenhage decided to stay the proceedings and refer the following nine questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

- h '(1) Must the Benelux Trademarks Office, which under the Protocol of 2 December 1992 amending the Uniform Benelux Law on Trademarks (Trb 1993, 12) is responsible for the assessment of the absolute grounds for refusal to register a trademark laid down in Article 3(1) in conjunction with Article 2 of First Council Directive 89/104/EEC of 21 December 1988 to approximate the laws of the Member States relating to trademarks (OJ 1989 L40, p 1) have regard not only to the sign as it appears in the application for registration but also to all the relevant facts and circumstances known to it, including those of which it was informed by the applicant (for example, the fact that, prior to the application, the applicant already used the sign widely as a trademark for the relevant products, or the fact that investigation shows that use of the sign for the goods and/or services mentioned in the application will not be of such a nature as to deceive the public)?

- i (2) Does the reply to the [first] question ... also apply to consideration by the Benelux Trademarks Office of the question whether its objections to registration of the application have been removed by the applicant, as well as to its decision to refuse registration in whole or in part, as provided for in Article 6a(4) of the UBL? a

(3) Does the reply to the [first] question ... also apply to the judicial review to which Article 6b of the UBL refers?

(4) In the light of the provisions of Article 6 quinquies (B)(2) of the Paris Convention, do the marks which under Article 3(1)(c) of the directive are not to be registered or, if registered, may be declared invalid, also include marks composed of signs or indications which may serve, in trade, to indicate the kind, quality, quantity, intended purpose, value, geographical origin or the time of production of the goods or of rendering of service or other characteristics of the goods or services, even if that configuration is not the (only or most) usual indication used? Does it make any difference in that connection whether there are many or only a few competitors who may have an interest in using such indications (see the judgment of the Benelux Court of Justice of 19 January 1981, NJ 1981, 294, in P Ferrero & Co SpA v Alfred Ritter Schokoladefabrik GmbH (Kinder))? b

Is it also relevant that under Article 13C of the UBL the right to a trademark expressed in one of the national or regional languages of the Benelux area extends automatically to its translation in another of those languages? d

(5)(a) In the assessment of the question whether a sign consisting of a (new) word made up of components which in themselves have no distinctive character with regard to the goods or services in respect of which the application is made answers the description given in Article 2 of the directive (and Article 1 of the UBL) of a mark, must a (new) word of that kind be taken to have in principle a distinctive character? e

(b) If not, must a word of that kind (leaving aside the fact that it may have acquired distinctive character through use, "inburgering") be taken to have in principle no distinctive character, it being otherwise only where, because of other circumstances, the combination is more than the sum of its parts? f

Is it relevant in that connection whether the sign is the only or an obvious term for indicating the relevant quality or (combination of) qualities, or whether there are synonyms which may reasonably also be used, or that the word indicates a commercially essential or rather an incidental quality of the product or service? g

(6) Does the mere fact that a descriptive sign is also lodged for registration as a mark for goods and/or services of which the sign is not descriptive warrant the conclusion that the sign thereby has distinctive character in relation to those goods and/or services (for example, the sign "Postkantoor" for furniture)? i

If not, in order to determine whether such a descriptive sign has distinctive character for such goods and/or services, must regard be had to the possibility that, in the light of its descriptive meaning or meanings, (a part of) the public will not perceive that sign as a distinctive sign for (all or some of) those goods or services?

a (7) In the assessment of the abovementioned questions, is significance to be attached to the fact that, since the Benelux countries have chosen to have applications for registration of trademarks examined by the Benelux Trademarks Office as a requirement prior to registration, the appraisal policy of the Office under Article 6a of the UBL, according to the common commentary of the Governments, “must be a cautious and restrained one whereby all concerns of commercial life must be taken into account and efforts must be focused on establishing solely which applications are manifestly inadmissible and rectifying or refusing them”? If so, under what rules does it fall to be determined whether an application is “manifestly inadmissible”?

c It is assumed that in invalidity proceedings (which may be initiated after registration of a sign) it is not necessary, in addition to reliance on the nullity of the sign lodged as a mark, for the sign to be “manifestly inadmissible”.

d (8) Is it consistent with the scheme of the directive and the Paris Convention for a sign to be registered for specific goods or services subject to the limitation that the registration applies only to those goods and services in so far as they do not possess a specific quality or specific qualities (for example, registration of the sign “Postkantoor” for the services of direct-mail campaigns and the issue of postage stamps “provided they are not connected with a post office”)?

e (9) Is it also material to the answer to be given to the questions whether a corresponding sign for similar goods or services is registered as a trademark in another Member State?

THE FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD QUESTIONS

f 19. By the first question, the national court asks essentially whether art 3 of the directive is to be interpreted as meaning that a trade mark registration authority must have regard, in addition to the mark as filed, to all the relevant facts and circumstances known to it. By the second and third questions, which it is appropriate to examine together, it asks at which stage of the procedure before it should the competent authority have regard to all the relevant facts and circumstances and, where application is made to a court for review, whether the court must also have regard to them.

Observations submitted to the court

h 20. KPN submits that when the BTMO examines whether a mark should be registered, it must not base its assessment exclusively on the mark but may take into account certain facts which are a matter of common knowledge and information produced by the applicant. However, it must confine itself to the relevant facts and circumstances known to it at the time when the application is filed.

i 21. KPN maintains that the BTMO should apply the same criteria for both the provisional assessment and the final assessment of an application for registration but should nevertheless be able to take into account, at the time of the final assessment, relevant facts which have been drawn to its attention since the provisional assessment.

22. Finally, KPN suggests that the court asked to review a decision of the BTMO must examine the same facts as those relied on by the latter.

23. The BTMO maintains that it is required to have regard to all the facts and circumstances known to it and which are relevant to the question whether the mark, as filed, is able to fulfil its function of being distinctive with regard to the goods and services in respect of which registration is sought. It cannot therefore take account merely of information provided to it by the applicant or which is common knowledge, bearing in mind that if it wishes to rely on matters which are not known to the applicant it must give the latter the opportunity to comment, in accordance with the principle that the rights of the defence must be observed.

24. Furthermore, the obligation to take into account all relevant facts and circumstances applies at every stage of the procedure before it.

25. Finally, the BTMO submits, in essence, that a court asked to review one of its decisions must assess the merits of the application on the basis of all the facts and circumstances which were known to the BTMO at the time of the final refusal, and cannot take into account new facts raised for the first time before the court.

26. The Commission of the European Communities submits that it is inconceivable that either the mark applied for, or the question whether one of the grounds for refusal set out in art 3 of the directive applies to it, should be assessed in the abstract.

27. On the one hand, for each trade mark—particularly word marks—the answer to that question is dependent on the meaning of the mark, which in turn is dependent on the use to which the mark is put in economic and social intercourse, in particular as regards the public at which the mark is aimed. On the other hand, protection is never claimed in absolute terms but rather in respect of certain goods or services which must be specified in the application for registration. The ability of the mark to distinguish the goods or services of one undertaking from those of other undertakings must always be assessed in the light of the goods or services in respect of which registration of the mark is sought.

28. Finally, although member states are quite free to lay down procedural rules in the matter of trade marks, compliance with the substantive rules prescribed by the directive should not be made dependent on the stage of the procedure concerned. Therefore, the obligation to have regard to actual circumstances in the assessment of the application for registration applies both before the competent authority and before the court.

The court's reply

29. As regards the question whether a competent authority must have regard to all the relevant facts and circumstances when examining a trade mark application, it is appropriate to point out, first, that the 12th recital in the preamble to the directive states that 'all Member States of the Community are bound by the Paris Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property' and that 'it is necessary that the provisions of this Directive are entirely consistent with those of the Paris Convention'.

30. Article 6quinquiesC(1) of the Paris Convention provides that 'in determining whether a mark is eligible for protection, all the factual circumstances must be taken into consideration, particularly the length of time the mark has been in use'.

31. Second, when the competent authority examines a trade mark application and, for that purpose, must determine, inter alia, whether or not the mark is devoid of any distinctive character, whether or not it is descriptive of the characteristics of the goods or services concerned and whether or not it has become generic, it cannot carry out the examination in the abstract.

- a 32. In the course of that examination, it is for the competent authority to have regard to the characteristics peculiar to the mark for which registration is sought, including the type of mark (word mark, figurative mark, etc) and, in the case of a word mark, its meaning, in order to ascertain whether or not any of the grounds for refusal set out in art 3 of the directive apply to the mark.
- b 33. Moreover, since registration of a mark is always sought in respect of the goods or services described in the application for registration, the question whether or not any of the grounds for refusal set out in art 3 of the directive apply to the mark must be assessed specifically by reference to those goods or services.
- c 34. A trade mark's distinctiveness within the meaning of art 3(1)(b) of the directive must be assessed, first, by reference to those goods or services and, second, by reference to the perception of them by the relevant public, which consists of average consumers of the goods or services in question, who are reasonably well informed and reasonably observant and circumspect (see, inter alia, Linde AG v Deutsches Patent- und Markenamt Joined cases C-53/01 to C-55/01 [2004] IP&T 172, [2003] ECR I-3161 (para 41), and Libertel Groep BV v Benelux Merkenbureau Case C-104/01 [2004] IP&T 187, [2003] ECR I-3793 (paras 46, 75)).
- d 35. In its assessment, the competent authority has regard to all the relevant facts and circumstances, including, where appropriate, the results of any study submitted by the applicant seeking to establish, for example, that the mark is not devoid of any distinctive character or is not misleading.
- e 36. As to the stage of the examination procedure before the competent authority at which account must be taken of all the relevant facts and circumstances and, where national law provides for the possibility of review by a court of a decision of that authority, whether that court must also have regard to the relevant facts and circumstances, the competent authority must have regard to all the relevant facts and circumstances before adopting a final decision on an application to register a trade mark. A court asked to review a decision on an application for a trade mark registration must also have regard to all the relevant facts and circumstances, subject to the limits on the exercise of its powers as defined by the relevant national legislation.
- f 37. The answer to the first, second and third questions must therefore be that art 3 of the directive is to be interpreted as meaning that a trade mark registration authority must have regard, in addition to the mark as filed, to all the relevant facts and circumstances. It must have regard to all the relevant facts and circumstances before adopting a final decision on an application to register a trade mark. A court asked to review a decision on an application to register a trade mark must also have regard to all the relevant facts and circumstances,
- g 38. By the ninth question, which it is appropriate to examine in second place, the referring court asks whether the fact that a trade mark has been registered in a member state in respect of certain goods or services has any effect on the examination by the trade mark registration authority in another member state of an application for registration of a similar mark in respect of goods or services which are similar to those in respect of which the first mark was registered.

THE NINTH QUESTION

- i 38. By the ninth question, which it is appropriate to examine in second place, the referring court asks whether the fact that a trade mark has been registered in a member state in respect of certain goods or services has any effect on the examination by the trade mark registration authority in another member state of an application for registration of a similar mark in respect of goods or services which are similar to those in respect of which the first mark was registered.

39. KPN submits that where a mark is registered in respect of certain goods or services in a member state the consequence is not that the same or a similar mark will in all circumstances also have to be registered for the same goods and services in other member states. A particular mark will not necessarily have the same intrinsic distinctive character in every member state. In each member state the extent to which the mark in question has distinctive character in the perception of the relevant public in that member state concerned will have to be determined.

40. The BTMO contends that it cannot take into account, for the purposes of its examination of an application for registration of a mark, not only that mark but marks filed in other member states. In addition, a mark, although originally devoid of distinctive character, may have been registered in another member state because there it has acquired distinctiveness through use and the applicant has gained recognition of that. Finally, a mark does not acquire distinctive character because another mark which is equally devoid of distinctive character has been registered in error. Errors of assessment are inevitable but should not have to be replicated on the basis of a misinterpretation of general principles of law such as the protection of a legitimate expectation or legal certainty.

41. The Commission submits that where a final registration has been made in a member state following a review of the grounds for refusal, that may provide some guidance for the competent authorities of other member states when they carry out a review pursuant to art 3(1)(b) to (d) of the directive. However, as regards word marks, such a registration is relevant only if the word concerned is a word in one of the languages of the trade mark law in question. In any event, such a registration is purely indicative and cannot function as a substitute for the assessment which the competent authorities of other member states must undertake on the basis of the specific circumstances of each case, taking account of the protection of interested parties in those member states.

42. As stated in para 32 of this judgment, it is for the competent authority to have regard to the characteristics peculiar to the mark for which registration is sought in order to ascertain whether or not any of the grounds for refusal set out in art 3 of the directive apply. Furthermore, as recalled in para 33 of the present judgment, registration of a mark is always sought in respect of the goods or services described in the application for registration.

43. Therefore, the fact that a mark has been registered in one member state in respect of certain goods and services cannot have any bearing on whether or not any of the grounds for refusal set out in art 3 of the directive apply to a similar mark, registration of which is applied for in a second member state in respect of similar goods or services.

44. The answer to the ninth question must therefore be that the fact that a trade mark has been registered in a member state in respect of certain goods or services has no bearing on the examination by the trade mark registration authority of another member state of an application for registration of a similar mark in respect of goods or services similar to those in respect of which the first mark was registered.

THE FOURTH QUESTION

45. By the first part of the fourth question, which it is appropriate to consider in third place, the national court asks whether art 3(1)(c) of the directive

- a precludes registration of a mark composed exclusively of signs or indications which may serve, in trade, to designate characteristics of the goods or services in respect of which registration is sought, when there are more usual indications for designating the same characteristics. It also asks whether the fact that there are many or few competitors who may have an interest in using the signs or indications of which the mark is composed has any bearing on the answer to that question. By the second part of the fourth question, it asks what the consequences are for the application of art 3(1)(c) of the directive of a national rule which provides that the exclusive right conferred by registration, by a competent authority in an area in which a number of officially recognised languages coexist, of a mark expressed in one of those languages extends automatically to its translation in the other languages.
- b

Observations submitted to the court

46. In KPN's submission, it is not unusual for a duly registered mark to have something allusive or descriptive about it. Such a mark cannot, however, be refused registration even if it immediately brings to mind, for a particular section of the public, characteristics of the goods in respect of which it is registered. Signs which, at the time of filing, are not a customary indication of a particular quality of the goods but are only allusive are not signs of the kind referred to by art 3(1)(c) of the directive.
- d

47. KPN adds that it is important to know whether competitors have any other options, since the greater the number of other possibilities, the lower the risk will be of a competitor being restricted in its use of an allusive sign as a distinctive sign.
- e

48. The BTMO contends that the ground for refusal stated in art 3(1)(c) of the directive applies where a mark consists exclusively of signs or indications which may serve, in trade, to designate characteristics of the goods or services in respect of which registration is sought and that it is irrelevant that there is scope for designating the same characteristics other than by the use of those signs or indications. That analysis is borne out by the judgment in Windsurfing Chiemsee Produktions- und Vertriebs GmbH (WSC) v Boots- und Segelzubehör Walter Huber Joined cases C-108/97 and C-109/97 [2000] Ch 523, [1999] ECR I-2779.
- f

49. The BTMO also contends that the question as to whether many or few competitors wish to use the signs or indications in question is not a determining factor when art 3(1)(c) of the directive is applied.
- g

50. Finally, under Benelux trade mark law, Benelux territory is one and indivisible, so that if a sign is descriptive in one only of the Benelux states or in one only of the Benelux languages or is devoid of distinctive character there for another reason, its registration as a mark must be refused throughout the Benelux territory.
- h

51. Relying on the Windsurfing Chiemsee case, the Commission maintains that the purpose of the prohibition on descriptive marks set out in art 3(1)(c) of the directive is to ensure that signs which are descriptive of the characteristics of the goods may be freely used by all. In that regard, it is not necessary for there to be an actual or definite risk of a monopoly being created for such marks to be prohibited. Furthermore, whether signs or indications capable of being used to describe the characteristics of the goods have synonyms has no bearing on the issue.
- i

52. Finally, the Commission submits that it is also immaterial whether few or many competitors may be affected by any monopoly created as a result of registration of a mark consisting exclusively of such signs or indications.

53. So far as the first part of the question is concerned, it is appropriate to recall that, under art 3(1)(c) of the directive, marks consisting exclusively of signs or indications which may serve, in trade, to designate characteristics of the goods or services in respect of which registration is sought are not to be registered.

54. As the court has already held (the Windsurfing Chiemsee case (para 25), the Linde case (para 73) and the Libertel case (para 52)), art 3(1)(c) of the directive pursues an aim which is in the public interest, namely that such signs or indications may be freely used by all. Article 3(1)(c) therefore prevents such signs and indications from being reserved to one undertaking alone because they have been registered as trade marks.

55. That public interest requires that all signs or indications which may serve to designate characteristics of the goods or services in respect of which registration is sought remain freely available to all undertakings in order that they may use them when describing the same characteristics of their own goods. Therefore, marks consisting exclusively of such signs or indications are not eligible for registration unless art 3(3) of the directive applies.

56. In those circumstances, the competent authority must, under art 3(1)(c) of the directive, determine whether a trade mark for which registration is sought currently represents, in the mind of the relevant class of persons, a description of the characteristics of the goods or services concerned or whether it is reasonable to assume that that might be the case in the future (see to that effect the Windsurfing Chiemsee case (para 31)). If, at the end of that assessment, the competent authority reaches the conclusion that that is the case, it must refuse, on the basis of that provision, to register the mark.

57. It is irrelevant whether there are other, more usual, signs or indications for designating the same characteristics of the goods or services referred to in the application for registration than those of which the mark concerned consists. Although art 3(1)(c) of the directive provides that, if the ground for refusal set out there is to apply, the mark must consist 'exclusively' of signs or indications which may serve to designate characteristics of the goods or services concerned, it does not require that those signs or indications should be the only way of designating such characteristics.

58. Similarly, whether the number of competitors who may have an interest in using the signs or indications of which the mark consists is large or small is not decisive. Any operator at present offering, as well as any operator who might in the future offer, goods or services which compete with those in respect of which registration is sought must be able freely to use the signs or indications which may serve to describe characteristics of its goods or services.

59. So far as the second part of the fourth question is concerned, where, as in the case before the national court, the applicable national law provides that the exclusive right, conferred where a competent authority in an area in which a number of officially recognised languages coexist registers a word mark expressed in one of those languages, extends automatically to its translation in the other languages, such a provision in fact allows a number of different marks to be registered.

60. Therefore, the authority must ascertain as regards each of those translations whether the mark does not consist exclusively of signs or indications which may serve, in trade, to designate characteristics of the goods or services in respect of which registration is sought.

- a* 61. The answer to the fourth question must therefore be that art 3(1)(c) of the directive precludes registration of a trade mark which consists exclusively of signs or indications which may serve, in trade, to designate characteristics of the goods or services in respect of which registration is sought, and that is the case even when there are more usual signs or indications for designating the same characteristics and regardless of the number of competitors who may
- b* have an interest in using the signs or indications of which the mark consists. Where the applicable national law provides that the exclusive right conferred by registration, by a competent authority in an area in which a number of officially recognised languages coexist, of a word mark expressed in one of those languages extends automatically to its translation in the other languages,
- c* the authority must ascertain as regards each of those translations whether the mark actually consists exclusively of signs or indications which may serve, in trade, to designate characteristics of those goods or services.

THE SIXTH QUESTION

- d* 62. By the first part of the sixth question, which it is appropriate to examine in fourth place, the national court asks, essentially, whether art 3(1) of the directive must be interpreted as meaning that a trade mark which is descriptive, for the purposes of sub-para (c) of that provision, of the characteristics of certain goods or services, but not of those of other goods or services, must be regarded as necessarily having distinctive character in relation to those other goods or services for the purposes of sub-para (b) of the provision. If that is
- e* not the case, the national court asks, by the second part of the question, if, for the purpose of determining whether such a mark is devoid of any distinctive character in relation to certain goods or services of which it is not descriptive, account must be taken of the possibility that the public will not perceive that mark as distinctive for those goods or services because it is descriptive of
- f* characteristics of other goods or services.

Observations submitted to the court

- g* 63. KPN submits, first, that if by 'descriptive sign' the national court means a word in everyday language, then where such a word is filed as a mark for goods or services of which it is not descriptive, the conditions set out in arts 1 and 3 of the directive are fulfilled as regards the mark's distinctive character. Second, the distinctive character of a mark must be assessed in relation to the goods or services in respect of which the application has been filed and not in relation to goods or services which might have some connection with the goods or services in respect of which registration of the mark is sought.

- h* 64. In the BTMO's submission, a mark like 'Postkantoor' may serve inter alia to indicate the intended purpose of the goods or services, for example furniture intended to be used in a post office. In those circumstances, the fact that the mark may be perceived by the relevant public as an indication relating to one characteristic of the goods or services concerned, notably their intended purpose, renders the mark ineligible for registration under art 3(1)(c) of the directive.

- i* 65. However, even if the public were not to perceive 'Postkantoor' for particular goods or services as an indication under art 3(1)(c) of the directive, it would remain incapable of serving as a mark by virtue of that provision. The provision is concerned not so much with the way in which the mark is currently perceived by the relevant public as with whether it may serve in trade to designate the characteristics or circumstances to which it alludes. In addition, it is appropriate to have regard to the perception which it may reasonably be assumed the relevant sectors of the public will have of the mark in the future. a

66. The Commission submits, first, that whether a mark has distinctive character is dependent both on the goods or services for which protection is sought and on the perception which the average consumer, reasonably well informed and reasonably observant and circumspect, has of those goods or services. Second, the grounds for refusal set out in paras (b) and (c) of art 3(1) of the directive must be assessed separately, in spite of the overlapping which may appear in practice. In those circumstances, the fact that a mark is not exclusively descriptive of those goods or services is not sufficient to conclude that it has distinctive character in respect of those goods or services. b

The court's reply

67. As regards the first part of the question, it is clear from art 3(1) of the directive that each of the grounds for refusal listed in that provision is independent of the others and calls for a separate examination (see, inter alia, the Linde case (para 67)). That is true in particular of the grounds for refusal listed in paras (b), (c) and (d) of art 3(1), although there is a clear overlap between the scope of the respective provisions (see to that effect Merz & Krell GmbH & Co v Deutsches Patent- und Markenamt Case C-517/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 441, [2001] ECR I-6959 (paras 35, 36)). d

68. Furthermore, according to the court's case law, the various grounds for refusing registration set out in art 3 of the directive must be interpreted in the light of the public interest underlying each of them (see in particular Philips Electronics NV v Remington Consumer Products Ltd Case C-299/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 634, [2002] ECR I-5475 (para 77), the Linde case (para 71) and the Libertel case (para 51)). e

69. It follows that the fact that a mark does not fall within one of those grounds does not mean that it cannot fall within another (see to that effect the Linde case (para 68)). f

70. In particular, it is thus not open to the competent authority to conclude that a mark is not devoid of any distinctive character in relation to certain goods or services purely on the ground that it is not descriptive of them. g

71. Second, as has been observed in para 34 of this judgment, whether a mark has distinctive character for the purposes of art 3(1)(b) of the directive must be assessed by reference to the goods or services described in the application for registration.

72. Further, under art 13 of the directive— h

‘where grounds for refusal of registration ... exist in respect of only some of the goods or services for which that trade mark has been applied for ..., refusal of registration ... shall cover those goods or services only.’

73. It follows that, where registration of a mark is sought in respect of various goods or services, the competent authority must check, in relation to each of the goods or services claimed, that none of the grounds for refusal listed in art 3(1) of the directive applies to the mark and may reach different conclusions depending upon the goods or services in question. i

74. Therefore, it is not open to the competent authority to conclude that a mark is not devoid of any distinctive character in relation to certain goods or a services purely on the ground that it is descriptive of the characteristics of other goods or services, even where registration is sought in respect of those goods or services as a whole.

b 75. As regards the second part of the question, whether a mark has distinctive character must be assessed, as has been observed in para 34 of this judgment, first, by reference to the goods or services in respect of which registration of the mark has been sought, and, second, by reference to the way in which it is perceived by the relevant public, which consists of average consumers of those goods or services, reasonably well informed and reasonably observant and circumspect.

c 76. It follows that if, on completion of the examination of a trade mark application, the competent authority finds, in the light of all the relevant facts and circumstances, that the average consumer of certain goods or services, reasonably well informed and reasonably attentive, perceives a mark as devoid of any distinctive character with regard to those goods or services, it must refuse to register the mark for those goods or services pursuant to art 3(1)(b) of the directive.

d 77. However, it is of no relevance that the average consumer of other goods or services, reasonably well informed and reasonably observant, perceives the same mark as descriptive of the characteristics of those other goods or services for the purposes of art 3(1)(c) of the directive.

e 78. It does not follow from either art 3 of the directive or from any other provisions thereof that the fact that a mark is descriptive of certain goods or services is a ground for refusing to register that mark for other goods or services. As is stated in the seventh recital in the preamble to the directive, grounds for refusal concerning the trade mark itself are listed exhaustively.

f 79. The answer to the sixth question must therefore be that art 3(1) of the directive must be interpreted as meaning that a mark which is descriptive of the characteristics of certain goods or services but not of those of other goods or services for the purposes of art 3(1)(c) of the directive cannot be regarded as necessarily having distinctive character in relation to those other goods or services for the purposes of sub-para (b) of the provision. It is of no relevance that a mark is descriptive of the characteristics of certain goods or services under art 3(1)(c) of the directive when it comes to assessing whether the same mark has distinctive character in relation to other goods or services for the purposes of art 3(1)(b) of the directive.

THE FIFTH QUESTION

h 80. As a preliminary point, it is appropriate to observe, first, that the purpose of art 2 of the directive is to define the types of signs of which a trade mark may consist (Sieckmann v Deutsches Patent- und Markenamt Case C-273/00 [2004] All ER (EC) 253, [2002] ECR I-11737 (para 43)), irrespective of the goods or services for which protection might be sought (see to that effect Sieckmann's case (paras 43–55), the Libertel case (paras 22–42) and Shield Mark BV v Kist (t/s Memex) Case C-283/01 [2004] All ER (EC) 277 (paras 34–41)). It provides that a trade mark may consist inter alia of 'words' and 'letters', provided that they are capable of distinguishing the goods or services of one undertaking from those of other undertakings.

i 81. In view of that provision, there is no reason to find that a word like 'Postkantoor' is not, in respect of certain goods or services, capable of fulfilling the essential function of a trade mark, which is to guarantee the identity of the origin of the marked goods or services to the consumer or end user by enabling him, without any possibility of confusion, to distinguish the goods or services from others which have another origin (see, in particular, Canon Kabushiki Kaisha v Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Inc (formerly Pathé Communications Corp) Case C-39/97 [1998] All ER (EC) 934, [1998] ECR I-5507 (para 28), the Merz & Krell case (para 22), and the Libertel case (para 62)). Accordingly, an interpretation of art 2 of the directive appears not to be useful for the purposes of deciding the present case. a

82. It follows, however, from the wording of the fifth question that the national court is in fact asking whether a mark for which registration is sought in respect of certain goods or services falls within any ground of refusal. Thus, the question must be taken to mean that the national court is seeking an interpretation of art 3(1) of the directive. b

83. Second, as is clear from para 15 of the present judgment, in the main proceedings the BTMO relied on the ground that the Postkantoor sign 'is exclusively descriptive of the goods and services [in question] in relation to a post office' in order to conclude that 'Postkantoor' was not distinctive. c

84. Thus, the national court's assumption that 'Postkantoor' may be devoid of distinctive character arises from the finding that the mark is descriptive of characteristics of the goods and services concerned, given that it is composed exclusively of elements which are themselves descriptive of those characteristics. d

85. In that regard, and as has been pointed out in para 67 of this judgment, although each of the grounds for refusal listed in art 3(1) of the directive is independent of the others and calls for separate examination, there is a clear overlap between the scope of each of the grounds for refusal set out in sub-paras (b), (c) and (d) of that provision respectively. e

86. In particular, a word mark which is descriptive of characteristics of goods or services for the purposes of art 3(1)(c) of the directive is, on that account, necessarily devoid of any distinctive character with regard to the same goods or services within the meaning of art 3(1)(b) of the directive. A mark may none the less be devoid of any distinctive character in relation to goods or services for reasons other than the fact that it may be descriptive. f

87. Therefore, in order to give a useful answer to the national court, the fifth question (which it is appropriate to examine in fifth place) must be construed as asking in essence whether art 3(1)(c) of the directive is to be interpreted as meaning that a mark consisting of a word composed of elements, each of which is descriptive of characteristics of the goods or services in respect of which registration is sought, may be regarded as not itself descriptive of the characteristics of those goods or services and, if so, in what circumstances. In that respect, it asks if it is of any importance whether there are synonyms for the word or that the characteristics of the goods or services capable of being described by the word are commercially essential or merely ancillary. g

Observations submitted to the court

88. KPN claims that when the components of a mark are devoid of any distinctive character in relation to the goods or services for which registration is sought, the mark will more often than not also be devoid of any such character. However, if the components of the mark are not devoid of all distinctive character but merely allude to the goods or services concerned, so that they could theoretically be used in trade to allude to certain of their qualities, the mark could none the less be distinctive in relation to those goods or services. i a 89. In the BTMO's submission, each mark, whether or not it is composite, must satisfy the conditions laid down by arts 2 and 3(1)(b) to (d) of the directive. A new combination of words, each of which is devoid of distinctive character, will not be distinctive merely because it is new.

b 90. The BTMO contends that, most frequently, the issue is whether a combination of words, each of which is merely descriptive of characteristics of the goods concerned, nevertheless manages to acquire sufficient distinctiveness for the mark consisting of that combination of words not to be descriptive for the purpose of art 3(1)(c) of the directive. In that connection, if the combination is merely the sum of two components which, being descriptive, are not distinctive, the combination, although new in the strict sense, will usually not be regarded as distinctive.

c 91. Finally, the fact that there are synonyms for a mark which is by definition descriptive is not a key factor in any decision about the mark's validity.

d 92. The Commission submits that a mark composed of elements, each of which is devoid of distinctive character in relation to the goods or services referred to in the application, is also, as a general rule, except where distinctiveness has been acquired through use, itself devoid of any distinctive character, unless related circumstances, such as a graphic or semantic alteration of the combination of those elements, give the mark an additional attribute such as to render it capable, as a whole, of distinguishing the goods or services of one undertaking from those of other undertakings. Such an assessment should, however, always be based on the specific circumstances of each case.

f 93. Article 3(1)(c) of the directive provides that marks consisting exclusively of signs or indications which may serve, in trade, to designate the kind, quality, quantity, intended purpose, value, geographical origin, or the time of production of the goods or of rendering of the service, or other characteristics of the goods or service, are not to be registered.

94. As has been pointed out in para 68 of this judgment, the various grounds for refusing registration set out in art 3 of the directive must be interpreted in the light of the public interest underlying each of them.

g 95. It follows from paras 54 and 55 of the present judgment that art 3(1)(c) of the directive pursues an aim which is in the public interest, namely that descriptive signs or indications descriptive of the characteristics of the goods or services in respect of which registration is applied for may be freely used by all. Article 3(1)(c) therefore prevents such signs and indications from being reserved to one undertaking alone because they have been registered as trade marks.

h 96. If a mark, such as that at issue in the main proceedings, which consists of a word produced by a combination of elements, is to be regarded as descriptive for the purpose of art 3(1)(c) of the directive, it is not sufficient that each of its components may be found to be descriptive. The word itself must be found to be so.

i 97. It is not necessary that the signs and indications composing the mark that are referred to in art 3(1)(c) of the directive actually be in use at the time of the application for registration in a way that is descriptive of goods or services such as those in relation to which the application is filed, or of characteristics of those goods or services. It is sufficient, as the wording of that provisions itself indicates, that those signs and indications could be used for such purposes. A word must therefore be refused registration under that provision if at least one of its possible meanings designates a characteristic of the goods or services concerned (see to that effect, in relation to the identical provisions of art 7(1)(c) of Council Regulation (EC) 40/94 (on the Community trade mark) (OJ 1994 L11 p 1), Wm Wrigley Jr Co v Office of Harmonisation in the Internal Market (Trade Marks and Designs) Case C-191/01P [2004] All ER (EC) 1040 (para 32)).

98. As a general rule, a mere combination of elements, each of which is descriptive of characteristics of the goods or services in respect of which registration is sought, itself remains descriptive of those characteristics for the purposes of art 3(1)(c) of the directive. Merely bringing those elements together without introducing any unusual variations, in particular as to syntax or meaning, cannot result in anything other than a mark consisting exclusively of signs or indications which may serve, in trade, to designate characteristics of the goods or services concerned.

99. However, such a combination may not be descriptive within the meaning of art 3(1)(c) of the directive, provided that it creates an impression which is sufficiently far removed from that produced by the simple combination of those elements. In the case of a word mark, which is intended to be heard as much as to be read, that condition must be satisfied as regards both the aural and the visual impression produced by the mark.

100. Thus, a mark consisting of a word composed of elements, each of which is descriptive of characteristics of the goods or services in respect of which registration is sought, is itself descriptive of those characteristics for the purposes of art 3(1)(c) of the directive, unless there is a perceptible difference between the word and the mere sum of its parts: that assumes either that, because of the unusual nature of the combination in relation to the goods or services, the word creates an impression which is sufficiently far removed from that produced by the mere combination of meanings lent by the elements of which it is composed, with the result that the word is more than the sum of its parts, or that the word has become part of everyday language and has acquired its own meaning, with the result that it is now independent of its components. In the second case, it is necessary to ascertain whether a word which has acquired its own meaning is not itself descriptive for the purpose of the same provision.

101. Furthermore, for the reason given in para 57 of this judgment, it is irrelevant for the purposes of determining whether the ground for refusal set out in art 3(1)(c) of the directive applies to such a mark whether or not there are synonyms permitting the same characteristics of the goods or services to be designated.

102. It is also irrelevant whether the characteristics of the goods or services which may be the subject of the description are commercially essential or merely ancillary. The wording of art 3(1)(c) of the directive does not draw any distinction by reference to the characteristics which may be designated by the signs or indications of which the mark consists. In fact, in the light of the public interest underlying the provision, any undertaking must be able freely to use such signs and indications to describe any characteristic whatsoever of its own goods, irrespective of how significant the characteristic may be commercially.

103. Finally, the court has already responded, in paras 59 and 60 of this judgment, to the question concerning the effect on the interpretation of art 3(1)(c) of the directive of a national provision such as art 13C(1) of the UBL.

104. The answer to the fifth question must therefore be that art 3(1)(c) of the directive must be interpreted as meaning that a mark consisting of a word

- a* composed of elements, each of which is descriptive of characteristics of the goods or services in respect of which registration is sought, is itself descriptive of the characteristics of those goods or services for the purposes of that provision, unless there is a perceptible difference between the word and the mere sum of its parts: that assumes either that because of the unusual nature of the combination in relation to the goods or services the word creates an impression which is sufficiently far removed from that produced by the mere combination of meanings lent by the elements of which it is composed, with the result that the word is more than the sum of its parts, or that the word has become part of everyday language and has acquired its own meaning, with the result that it is now independent of its components. In the latter case, it is necessary to ascertain whether a word which has acquired its own meaning
- b* is not itself descriptive for the purposes of the same provision. For the purposes of determining whether art 3(1)(c) of the directive applies to such a mark, it is irrelevant whether or not there are synonyms capable of designating the same characteristics of the goods or services mentioned in the application for registration or that the characteristics of the goods or services which may
- c* be the subject of the description are commercially essential or merely ancillary.

THE EIGHTH QUESTION

105. By the eighth question, to be examined in sixth place, the national court asks essentially whether the directive or the Paris Convention prevents a trade mark registration authority from registering a mark for certain goods or services subject to the condition that they do not possess a particular characteristic.
- e*

106. The national court explains in that regard that the question seeks to ascertain whether 'Postkantoor' could be registered, for example, for services such as direct-mail campaigns or the issue of postage stamps 'provided they are not connected with a post office'.

Observations submitted to the court

107. KPN submits that the question is not regulated by the directive and thus does not fall within the court's jurisdiction. In the alternative, it maintains that such limitations are permissible and that exclusions may be accepted or even required when the application is filed.
- g*

108. The BTMO contends that under the directive, although procedural issues are a matter for the member states, the conditions for obtaining and continuing to hold a trade mark are, in general, identical in all of them. Those conditions include the obligation to draw up the registration in accordance with internationally accepted standards, in particular the classification provided
- h* for in the Nice Agreement.

109. Under the Nice Agreement there is no provision for registration of the absence of a particular characteristic which cannot be objectively defined as a sub-category of a list of goods or services.

110. The Commission argues, first, that the court has no jurisdiction to adjudicate on the compatibility of a provision of national law with the Paris Convention. Second, relying on Regulation 40/94, it submits that art 3(1)(c) of the directive does not prevent marks which are descriptive of certain goods or services from being refused in relation to some of the goods or services listed in the application for registration, a practice which is also followed by the Office for Harmonisation in the Internal Market Trade Marks and Designs (OHIM).
- i*

111. The Nice Agreement divides goods and services into classes in order to facilitate the registration of trade marks. Each class brings together various goods or services.

112. Although an undertaking may apply for registration of a mark in respect of all the goods or services falling within such a class, nothing in the directive prohibits it from seeking registration solely in respect of only some of those goods or services.

113. Likewise, when registration of a mark is sought in respect of an entire class within the Nice Agreement, the competent authority may, pursuant to art 13 of the directive, register the mark only in respect of some of the goods or services belonging to that class, if, for example, the mark is devoid of any distinctive character in relation to other goods or services mentioned in the application.

114. By contrast, where registration is applied for in respect of particular goods or services, it cannot be permitted that the competent authority registers the mark only in so far as the goods or services concerned do not possess a particular characteristic.

115. Such a practice would lead to legal uncertainty as to the extent of the protection afforded by the mark. Third parties—particularly competitors—would not, as a general rule, be aware that for given goods or services the protection conferred by the mark did not extend to those products or services having a particular characteristic, and they might thus be led to refrain from using the signs or indications of which the mark consists and which are descriptive of that characteristic for the purpose of describing their own goods.

116. Since the directive precludes such a practice, there is no need to examine the request for an interpretation of the Paris Convention.

117. In those circumstances, the answer to the eighth question must be that the directive prevents a trade mark registration authority from registering a mark for certain goods or services on condition that they do not possess a particular characteristic.

THE SEVENTH QUESTION

118. By the seventh question, which must be considered last, the national court asks whether the practice of a trade mark registration authority which concentrates solely on refusing to register 'manifestly inadmissible' marks is precluded by art 3 of the directive.

Observations submitted to the court

119. In KPN's submission, by providing in art 3(1) that marks can either not be registered or can be declared invalid once registered, the directive expressly allows the member states to register marks liable subsequently to be declared invalid. It follows that the member states are free to provide that, at the stage of registration, only 'manifestly inadmissible' marks are to be refused. It is also open to them to determine which marks are to be regarded as 'manifestly inadmissible' and which are not to be regarded as such. Putting this test into practice may entail registering a mark even where there is reasonable doubt as to whether it has sufficient distinctive character. However, in invalidity proceedings in respect of a registered mark, the criteria set out in arts 1 to 3 of the directive must be strictly adhered to.

120. The BTMO and the Commission argue, by contrast, that since the directive entered into force the Benelux states are no longer able to rely either a on their governments' common commentary or on the earlier case law of the Benelux Court of Justice, which is rendered inoperative by the directive, but must rely on the wording, the purpose and the scope of art 3 of the directive. That provision does not draw any distinction between inadmissible applications and 'manifestly inadmissible' applications.

b The court's reply

121. It is clear from the last paragraph of point I.6 of the preamble to the Protocol of 2 December 1992 amending the UBL that 'the appraisal policy of the [BTMO] ... must be a cautious and restrained one, which takes account of all commercial concerns and is focused on rectifying or refusing manifestly inadmissible applications' and that 'the examination must remain within the boundaries laid down in Benelux case law, in particular that of the Benelux Court of Justice'.

c 122. In that regard, it is appropriate to observe that although the third recital in the preamble to the directive states that the full-scale approximation of the trade mark laws of the member states does not appear necessary at present, the seventh recital makes clear that the conditions for obtaining and continuing to hold a registered trade mark are, in general, identical in all the member states and that, to that end, the grounds for refusal of registration concerning the trade mark itself are listed exhaustively in the directive.

d 123. In addition, the scheme of the directive is founded on review prior to registration, even though it also makes provision for ex post facto review. The examination of the grounds for refusal listed in art 3 of the directive in particular, which takes place when registration is applied for, must be thorough and full in order to ensure that trade marks are not improperly registered (see to that effect the Libertel case (para 59)).

e 124. Therefore, the competent authority within a member state must refuse to register any mark caught by one of the grounds for refusal laid down by the directive, in particular in art 3.

f 125. Article 3 does not distinguish between marks which cannot be registered and those which 'manifestly' cannot be registered. Consequently, the competent authority cannot register marks caught by one of the grounds for refusal listed in that article on the ground that the marks are not 'manifestly inadmissible'.

g 126. The answer to the seventh question must therefore be that the practice of a trade mark registration authority which concentrates solely on refusing to register 'manifestly inadmissible' marks is incompatible with art 3 of the directive.

h COSTS

127. The costs incurred by the Commission, which has submitted observations to the court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court.

i On those grounds, the Court of Justice (Sixth Chamber), in answer to the questions referred to it by the Gerechtshof te 's-Gravenhage by judgment of 3 June 1999, hereby rules:

(1) Article 3 of First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 (to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks) is to be interpreted as meaning that a trade mark registration authority must have regard, in addition to the mark as filed, to all the relevant facts and circumstances. It must have regard to all the relevant facts and circumstances before adopting a final decision on an application to register a trade mark. A court asked to review a decision on an application to register a trade mark must also have regard to all the relevant facts and circumstances, subject to the limits on the exercise of its powers as defined by the relevant national legislation. a

(2) The fact that a trade mark has been registered in a member state in respect of certain goods or services has no bearing on the examination by the trade mark registration authority of another member state of an application for registration of a similar mark in respect of goods or services similar to those in respect of which the first mark was registered. b

(3) Article 3(1)(c) of Directive 89/104 precludes registration of a trade mark which consists exclusively of signs or indications which may serve, in trade, to designate characteristics of the goods or services in respect of which registration is sought, and that is the case even when there are more usual signs or indications for designating the same characteristics and regardless of the number of competitors who may have an interest in using the signs or indications of which the mark consists. Where the applicable national law provides that the exclusive right conferred by registration, by a competent authority in an area in which a number of officially recognised languages coexist, of a word mark expressed in one of those languages extends automatically to its translation in the other languages, the authority must ascertain as regards each of those translations whether the mark actually consists exclusively of signs or indications which may serve, in trade, to designate characteristics of those goods or services. c

(4) Article 3(1) of Directive 89/104 must be interpreted as meaning that a mark which is descriptive of the characteristics of certain goods or services but not of those of other goods or services for the purposes of art 3(1)(c) of Directive 89/104 cannot be regarded as necessarily having distinctive character in relation to those other goods or services for the purposes of sub-para (b) of the provision. It is of no relevance that a mark is descriptive of the characteristics of certain goods or services under art 3(1)(c) of Directive 89/104 when it comes to assessing whether the same mark has distinctive character in relation to other goods or services for the purposes of art 3(1)(b) of the directive. d

(5) Article 3(1)(c) of Directive 89/104 must be interpreted as meaning that a mark consisting of a word composed of elements, each of which is descriptive of characteristics of the goods or services in respect of which registration is sought, is itself descriptive of the characteristics of those goods or services for the purposes of that provision, unless there is a perceptible difference between the word and the mere sum of its parts: that assumes either that because of the unusual nature of the combination in relation to the goods or services the word creates an impression which is sufficiently far removed from that produced by the mere combination of meanings lent by the elements of which it is composed, with the result that the word is more than the sum of its parts, or that the word has become part of everyday language and has acquired its own meaning, with the result that it is now independent of its components. e

In the latter case, it is necessary to ascertain whether a word which has acquired its own meaning is not itself descriptive for the purposes of the same provision. For the purposes of determining whether art 3(1)(c) of Directive 89/104 applies to such a mark, it is irrelevant whether or not there are synonyms capable of designating the same characteristics of the goods or f

b (7) The practice of a trade mark registration authority which concentrates solely on refusing to register 'manifestly inadmissible' marks is incompatible with art 3 of Directive 89/104.

COURT OF JUSTICE OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES

JUDGES RODRÍGUEZ IGLESIAS (PRESIDENT), WATHELET (RAPPORTEUR), SCHINTGEN, CWA TIMMERMANS (PRESIDENTS OF CHAMBERS), EDWARD, LA PERGOLA, JANN, MACKEN, COLNERIC, VON BAHR AND CUNHA RODRIGUES
ADVOCATE GENERAL RUIZ-JARABO COLOMER

10 SEPTEMBER, 22 OCTOBER 2002, 13 MAY 2003

European Community – Freedom of movement – Services – Medical care – Sickness insurance – System providing benefits in kind – Local sickness funds concluding agreements with treatment providers – Reimbursement of medical expenses incurred in respect of treatment by provider in another member state with which no agreement concluded conditional on prior authorisation – Whether requirement as to prior authorisation compatible with Community provisions on freedom to provide services – Articles 49, 50 EC (formerly EC Treaty, arts 59, 60).

In the Netherlands, a system of sickness insurance prescribed by legislation provided for the grant of benefits in kind. Persons coming within the scope of the scheme were entitled to free medical treatment and, where entitlement to a benefit was sought, an insured person was to apply to a treatment provider with whom the local sickness fund had concluded an agreement. Where an insured person sought treatment from a provider established outside the Netherlands that had not concluded an agreement with the relevant sickness fund, prior authorisation had to be obtained. Such prior authorisation was granted by the sickness fund where the treatment was medically necessary and where it could not be provided in the Netherlands without undue delay. Two sets of proceedings had come before the national court in the main proceedings concerning patients who had obtained treatment outside of the Netherlands without prior authorisation and whose subsequent requests for reimbursement for that treatment had been refused. The first patient had undergone dental treatment while on holiday in Germany, without recourse to any hospital facilities. The second patient had sought authorisation for an arthroscopy to be performed in Belgium, where that examination could be carried out much sooner than it could in the Netherlands. However, before that request had been rejected, the examination had already been carried out in Belgium, as had treatment, which had been provided partly in hospital and partly elsewhere. The national court decided to stay the proceedings and refer to the Court of Justice of the European Communities questions for

- a preliminary ruling pursuant to art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) concerning whether the freedom to provide services, guaranteed by arts 49 and 50 EC<sup>a</sup> (formerly arts 59 and 60 of the EC Treaty), precluded the making of reimbursement of medical expenses incurred in respect of treatment dispensed in another member state by a treatment provider with which no agreement had been concluded subject to prior authorisation of the sickness insurance fund.

Held – Legislation which made the assumption of the costs of medical treatment received by an insured person in another member state from a person or establishment with whom the insured person's sickness fund had not concluded an agreement conditional upon prior authorisation by the sickness fund, to be granted where such action was necessary for the insured person's health care, constituted a barrier to the freedom to provide services for the purposes of arts 49 and 50 EC, both for insured persons and for treatment providers. However, that barrier might be justified by the objective of maintaining a high quality, balanced medical and hospital service open to all, in so far as it contributed to the attainment of a high level of health protection. Further, although aims of purely economic nature could not justify a barrier to the fundamental principle of freedom to provide services, in so far as it might have consequences for the overall level of public-health protection, the risk of seriously undermining the financial balance of the social security system might also constitute per se an overriding reason in the general interest capable of justifying a barrier of that kind (see judgment paras 40, 44, 45, 67, 72, 73, 109, below).

- (i) Such legislation was not precluded by 49 and 50 EC in so far as it related to the assumption of the costs of hospital medical services, provided that prior authorisation was refused only where treatment which was the same or equally effective for the patient might be obtained without undue delay in an establishment which had concluded an agreement with the fund. For such services, a scheme requiring prior administrative authorisation was justified by way of derogation from the fundamental freedom to provide services on the basis that it was both necessary and reasonable to ensure that there was sufficient and permanent access to a balanced range of high-quality hospital treatment in the state concerned, and because it assisted in meeting a desire to control costs and to prevent wastage of financial, technical and human resources. However, such a scheme had to be based on objective, non-discriminatory criteria which were known in advance, in such a way as to circumscribe the exercise of the national authorities' discretion, so that it was not used arbitrarily. Further, such a scheme had likewise to be based on a procedural system that was easily accessible and capable of ensuring that a request for authorisation would be dealt with objectively and impartially within a reasonable time, and refusals to grant authorisation had also to be capable of being challenged in judicial or quasi-judicial proceedings. A condition as to the necessity of the treatment would be justified provided that that condition was construed to the effect that authorisation to receive treatment in another member state might be refused on that ground only if treatment which was the same or equally effective for the patient might be obtained without undue delay from an establishment with which the insured person's sickness fund had an agreement. In determining whether that proviso was satisfied, the national

authorities were to have regard to all the circumstances of each specific case and were to take due account not only of the patient's medical condition at the time when authorisation was sought and, where appropriate, the degree of pain or the nature of the patient's disability, which might, for example, make it impossible or extremely difficult to carry out a professional activity, but also of his or her medical history (see judgment paras 78–81, 85, 89, 90, 109, below). a

(ii) Such legislation was precluded by arts 49 and 50 EC in so far as it related to the assumption of the costs of non-hospital medical services. There was nothing to indicate that removal of the system of prior authorisation for non-hospital medical services would give rise to patients travelling to other members states in such large numbers, despite linguistic barriers, geographic distance, the cost of staying abroad and lack of information about the kind of care provided there, that the financial balance of the Netherlands social security system would be jeopardised. Care was generally provided near to the place where the patient resided, in a cultural environment that was familiar to him and which allowed him to build up a relationship of trust with the doctor treating him. Disregarding emergencies, the most obvious cases of patients travelling abroad were in border areas or where specific conditions were to be treated. It was specifically in those areas or in respect of those conditions that the Netherlands sickness funds had tended to set up a system of agreements with foreign doctors. In any event, it remained for the member states alone to determine the extent of the sickness cover available to insured persons and, where an insured person received treatment in another member state without prior authorisation, reimbursement of the cost of that treatment might only be claimed within the limits of cover provided by the sickness insurance scheme in the member state of affiliation. Furthermore, removal of the requirement as to prior authorisation would not undermine the essential characteristic of the national sickness insurance scheme, because achievement of the fundamental freedoms guaranteed by the Treaty inevitably required member states to make some adjustments to the national systems of social security such that it did not follow that sovereign powers would be undermined in that field, and because a medical service did not cease to be a provision of services simply because it was paid for by a national health service or by a system providing benefits in kind. In that latter regard, a medical service provided in one member state and paid for by the patient did not cease to fall within the scope of the freedom to provide service merely because reimbursement of the costs of the treatment involved was applied for under another member state's sickness insurance legislation. It was the requirement for prior authorisation that constituted the barrier to a patient's ability to go to the medical service provider of his or her choice in another member state. Thus, there was no need to draw a distinction between whether the patient paid the costs incurred and subsequently applied for reimbursement, or whether the sickness fund of the national budget paid the provider directly (see judgment paras 95, 96, 98, 102, 103, 108, 109, below). b

By order of 6 October 1999, the Centrale Raad van Beroep (Higher Social Security Court), Netherlands, referred, under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty), to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling three questions (set out at judgment para 32, below) on the interpretation of art 59 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, art 49 EC)

1. By the three questions which it has referred under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty), the Centrale Raad van Beroep, Netherlands, seeks to ascertain, essentially, whether arts 59 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, art 49 EC) and 60 of the EC Treaty (now art 50 EC) preclude legislation enacted by a member state in the area of compulsory sickness insurance providing only benefits in kind which makes reimbursement of medical expenses in respect of treatment, where it is necessary, dispensed in another member state by a medical practitioner or hospital with whom or which no agreement has been concluded subject to prior authorisation of the sickness insurance fund.

a I—THE FACTS OF THE TWO DISPUTES IN THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS

b 2. Ms Müller-Fauré was dissatisfied with Netherlands dental surgeons, so she took advantage of a holiday in Germany to visit the dentist without having obtained the authorisation of her sickness insurance fund. Between 20 October and 18 November 1994, six crowns and a precision implant in the upper jaw were inserted. Her treatment included fillings, radiography and anaesthesia. On returning to the Netherlands, she applied to her sickness insurance fund, the mutual insurance company Onderlinge Waarborgmaatschappij OZ Zorgverzekeringen UA, (hereinafter OZ Zorgverzekeringen), seeking reimbursement of the costs of the treatment, which amounted to DEM 7,444.59 (€3,806.35). Since most of the treatment carried out in Germany is not covered by the compulsory sickness insurance and are therefore not eligible for reimbursement, the dispute concerns, in actual fact NLG 465.05 (€211.03). On the basis of the opinion of its advisory dental surgeon, the fund rejected the application in May 1995.

d 3. The Appeals Committee of the Board responsible for supervision and administration of the sickness insurance funds (Commissie voor beroepszaken van de Ziekenfondsradaad) considered, in February 1996, that the decision to reject the application was correct. It took the view that the compulsory sickness insurance fund is characterised by the provision of benefits in kind, which means that insured persons are entitled to receive treatment. It is only in exceptional cases that they may apply for reimbursement, but in the case of e Ms Müller-Fauré that was not possible since the treatment was not urgent for the purpose of art 22 of Council Regulation (EEC) 1408/71<sup>2</sup>. Moreover, in order to obtain the treatment she sought, the patient had no need to resort to a dental surgeon who had no contractual arrangements with OZ Zorgverzekeringen.

f 4. The court before which proceedings were brought at first instance upheld that view and considered that the extent of the treatment performed and the fact that it spanned a period of several weeks clearly indicated that it was not urgent.

B—The proceedings relating to Ms van Riet

g 5. On 5 April 1993, Ms van Riet's doctor requested, on behalf of his patient, that the medical adviser of her sickness insurance company Onderlinge Waarborgmaatschappij ZAO Zorgverzekeringen (ZAO Zorgverzekeringen) should authorise her to have an arthroscopy, chargeable to ZAO, in Belgium, where it could be performed much sooner than in the Netherlands. That request was rejected by letters of 24 June and 5 July 1993 on the ground h that such treatment could be provided in the Netherlands.

Without waiting for the response, Ms van Riet had the arthroscopy and an ulnar reduction performed in a sports medicine clinic in Belgium. The insurance company refused to reimburse the cost, which amounted to BEF 93,792 (€2,325.04)

i 6. On 23 September 1994, the Appeals Committee of the Board responsible for supervision of the management and administration of the sickness

2 On the application of social security schemes to employed persons, to self-employed persons and to members of their families moving within the Community (OJ English Sp Edn 1971 (II) p 416), as worded in Council Regulation (EEC) 2001/83 (amending and updating Regulation 1408/71 and Regulation 574/72) (OJ 1983 L230 p 6).

insurance funds upheld the decision to refuse reimbursement of the cost of the treatment. It found that the necessary and appropriate medical treatment was available in the Netherlands, within reasonable time, so that no emergency treatment for the purpose of art 22 of Regulation 1408/71 was involved. a

The Rechtbank declared the appellant's appeal unfounded on the ground that her complaint did not call to be treated in Belgium. b

II—THE QUESTIONS REFERRED TO THE COURT

7. In the order for reference, the Centrale Raad van Beroep states that the compulsory sickness insurance covers practically all of the medical care provided to Ms van Riet in Belgium. That statement is true only in respect of a limited portion of the dental work carried out on Ms Müller-Fauré in Germany, since the remainder is not eligible for reimbursement. c

According to the case law of the Centrale Raad van Beroep, the insured person must have obtained authorisation from the sickness insurance fund before treatment commences. The cost of the medical care provided abroad cannot be reimbursed unless, for particular reasons, refusal of the sickness insurance fund infringes a general principle of law. That was not the case with respect either to Ms Müller-Fauré, who took the opportunity to visit the dentist while she was on holiday, or to Ms van Riet, who did not wait until the fund replied to her request when there was no medical or other reason why she could not wait until her application was dealt with. d

Furthermore, even if Ms Müller-Fauré had sought authorisation and Ms van Riet had awaited a response, the insurance funds would not have granted authorisation, since it is not evident that their treatment abroad was necessary. The lack of confidence in national medical practitioners is not sufficient reason, nor is the waiting time in the Netherlands for the arthroscopy unacceptably long. e

8. Finally, the Centrale Raad van Beroep wonders whether the contested decisions infringe arts 49 and 50 EC. It therefore stayed proceedings in the two cases and referred the following three questions to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling: f

'(1) Are Articles 59 and 60 of the EC Treaty (now Articles 49 and 50 EC) to be interpreted as meaning that in principle a provision such as Article 9(4) of the Ziekenfondswet [Law on Health Insurance], read in conjunction with Article 1 of the Regeling hulp in het buitenland ziekenfondsverzekering [Regulation on health care abroad under the sickness insurance rules], is incompatible therewith in so far as it stipulates that in order to assert his entitlement to benefits a person insured with a health insurance fund requires the prior authorisation of that fund to seek treatment from a person or establishment outside the Netherlands with whom or which the health insurance fund has not concluded an agreement? g

(2) If so, do the objectives of the Netherlands system of benefits in kind referred to above [to ensure balanced medical and hospital services open to all, the survival of the system of benefits in kind and control of the financial equilibrium by supervising the costs] constitute an overriding reason in the general interest capable of justifying a restriction on the fundamental principle of freedom to provide services? h

(3) Does the question whether the treatment as a whole or only a proportion thereof involved in-patient care affect the answers to these questions?' i a III—NATIONAL LEGAL FRAMEWORK REGARDING COMPULSORY SICKNESS INSURANCE<sup>3</sup>

9. In the Netherlands, workers and persons regarded as such whose income does not exceed a certain amount are covered by compulsory insurance under the Law on Sickness Funds which covers ordinary health care.

b 10. Under art 8 of that Law, such funds are under an obligation to ensure that insured persons can exercise their right to obtain services. It is a system which provides only for health-care benefits in kind, so that beneficiaries are not entitled to the reimbursement of sickness costs which they may incur, but to the provision of free treatment<sup>4</sup>.

c 11. Under art 3 of the Royal Decree on sickness insurance benefits in kind (Verstrekingenbesluit Ziekenfondsverzekering) of 4 January 1966, as amended by the Royal Decree of 16 January 1997, health care is to include, inter alia, assistance by a general medical practitioner and a specialist 'to such extent as is regarded as normal within professional circles'. The decisive factor for present purposes is what the medical profession in the Netherlands regards as normal. In general, treatment is not recognised as normal where it is not provided or recommended because it has not been sufficiently endorsed by international or national scientific research. What matters is the extent to which a particular treatment is described as the appropriate professional procedure since, if it has a valid scientific basis, it is defined as a benefit within the meaning of the Law on Sickness Funds<sup>5</sup>.

d As regards dental care, the benefits to which insured persons are entitled are governed by art 7(2). In 1994, the government decided to abolish almost in its entirety entitlement of persons over 18 years of age to dental treatment under the compulsory sickness insurance system<sup>6</sup>. It appears that, for the time being, only an annual screening check-up and any necessary radiography are covered.

e 12. Article 9 of the Law on Sickness Funds governs claims for entitlement to care and provides, so far as is relevant:

f '1. ... an insured person wishing to claim entitlement to a benefit shall apply to a person or an establishment with whom or with which the sickness fund with which he is registered has entered into an agreement for that purpose ...

g 2. The insured person may choose from among the persons and establishments mentioned in paragraph 1, subject to the provisions of paragraph 5 and the provisions regarding conveyance by ambulance ...

4. A sickness fund may, by way of derogation from paragraphs 1 and 2 hereof, authorise an insured person, for the purpose of claiming

h 3 After giving a very brief description of the Netherlands compulsory sickness insurance scheme, the Centrale Raad van Beroep refers, for further information, to para II.1 of the order of the Arrondissementsrechtbank te Roermond referring a number of questions for a preliminary ruling in Geraets-Smits v Stichting Ziekenfonds VGZ, Peerbooms v Stichting CZ Groep Zorgverzekeringen Case C-157/99 [2003] All ER (EC) 481, [2001] ECR I-5473 in which judgment was delivered on 12 July 2001. For my part, I have taken, so far as relevant, the account of Netherlands legislation which I set out in chapter I of the opinion which I delivered in that case on 18 May 2000.

i 4 During the hearing before the Court of Justice, both sickness funds laid great emphasis on the fact that the legislation does not confer on insured persons any right to reimbursement of medical costs which they may incur.

5 In Geraets-Smits case, the court laid down how that requirement was to be interpreted where an insured person applies for authorisation to obtain medical treatment in another member state at a hospital with which no agreement has been concluded.

6 A year later, the government reintroduced partial financing for dentures because certain elderly persons could not afford them.

entitlement to a benefit, to apply to another person or establishment in the Netherlands where this is necessary for his health care. The Minister may determine the cases and circumstances in which an insured person may be granted authorisation, in claiming entitlement to a benefit, to apply to a person or an establishment outside the Netherlands.’ a

13. The requirement of obtaining such authorisation is contained in art 1 of the regulation on health care abroad under the sickness insurance rules of 30 June 1988<sup>7</sup>, which provides: b

No special conditions have been laid down for insured persons who wish to be treated by medical practitioners or health-care institutions established abroad with whom or which their funds have not entered into an agreement for the provision of health care, so that they must obtain prior authorisation from their sickness fund in exactly the same way as they have to in order to be treated by a medical practitioner or health-care institution established in the Netherlands with whom or which the fund has not concluded a health-care agreement.’<sup>8</sup> d

14. In order to offer benefits in kind to insured persons, sickness funds must, under art 44(1) of the Law on Sickness Funds, conclude agreements with persons and establishments offering one or more forms of care. Article 44(3) thereof defines the content of such agreements, which are to include the nature and extent of the obligations and rights of the parties, the quality and effectiveness of the care, the cost and supervision of compliance with the terms of the agreement. The insurance fund may terminate the agreement if the person or establishment concerned fails to comply with its terms. e

IV—THE PROVISIONS OF THE TREATY ON FREEDOM TO PROVIDE SERVICES f

15. Article 49 EC provides:

‘Within the framework of the provisions set out below, restrictions on freedom to provide services within the Community shall be prohibited in respect of nationals of Member States who are established in a State of the Community other than that of the person for whom the services are intended.’ g

Under art 50 EC:

‘Services shall be considered to be “services” within the meaning of this Treaty where they are normally provided for remuneration, insofar as they are not governed by the provisions relating to freedom of movement for goods, capital and persons. h

“Services” shall in particular include ...

(d) activities of the professions.’ i

V—PROCEDURE BEFORE THE COURT

16. In the initial stages of these proceedings, written observations were submitted, within the period for the purpose by art 20 of the EC Statute of the

VI—THE OBSERVATIONS OF THE PARTIES TO THESE PROCEEDINGS

20. The views of those parties which have submitted observations, other than those of the appellants in the two sets of main proceedings, Belgium and the Commission, are largely the same except in a number of distinct aspects which I shall discuss below.

g 21. Ms Müller-Fauré takes the view that the requirement of prior authorisation is contrary to arts 49 and 50 EC and cannot be justified on the ground that the same services may be obtained in the Netherlands and Germany and that the costs and quality are the same. Ms van Riet states that, in order to confirm, by means of an arthroscopy, the diagnosis that an ulnar reduction was necessary, she would have to wait between 10 and 14 weeks. She would then have to wait a further six to eight months for her operation. In order to avoid that inconvenience, she attended a clinic in Belgium, where she waited only four weeks for the exploratory examination and one week for the operation, and the total cost came to less than two-thirds of what it would have been in the Netherlands.

i 22. OZ Zorgverzekeringen maintains that the requirement of prior authorisation before seeking the services of a non-contracted provider, whether in the Netherlands or abroad, is an inherent part of the system of benefits in kind. Should it be deemed a barrier to freedom to provide services, it would still be justified by the need to guarantee affordable, high-quality health care and by the equality of insured persons in respect of entitlement to benefits. It is not necessary to make a distinction as to whether it is a medical practitioner or a hospital providing those services. a

23. The Belgian government submits that the authorisation requirement is contrary to arts 49 and 50 EC. Moreover, a finding that it is not necessary to seek treatment abroad because a medical practitioner with whom an agreement has been concluded is able to provide it within the country amounts to discrimination. The special nature of the system of sickness insurance, that is the fact that it only provides benefits in kind, is not an overriding reason in the general interest capable of justifying a barrier of that kind. b

24. The views of the other 11 member states may be classified into two groups. The first group, which comprises Denmark, Germany, Ireland, Sweden, United Kingdom, Norway and Iceland, is of the view that public health-care benefits provided free-of-charge to insured persons are not services within the meaning of art 50 EC, either because they lack the element of remuneration<sup>9</sup> or because those concerned, the doctor and the patient, cannot influence either the content or the price of the benefit. c

Those belonging to the second group, composed of Spain, Finland, Italy and the Netherlands, defend the view that the judgment in Kohll v Union des Caisses de Maladie<sup>10</sup>, which concerned a sickness insurance system which reimburses part of the cost of treatment, cannot be applied to those which provide only benefits in kind, and there is no need, in that regard, to distinguish between care provided by a medical practitioner and that provided in a hospital. d

Whether it is considered that those are services or that Kohll's case also applies to a sickness insurance system such as that of the Netherlands, all the above states, without exception, submit that the requirement of prior authorisation is not contrary to arts 49 and 50 EC because it is justified. e

25. In the first observations submitted by the Commission, it maintained that hospital and medical benefits are services within the meaning of the Treaty, including in those member states which operate a public health system<sup>11</sup> which is totally separate on the one hand from medical practitioners who practise their profession privately and privately-funded hospitals on the other. Under the sickness insurance system of the Netherlands, the benefits in kind, the agreements and the requirement of prior authorisation are indissociable parts of a single scheme. However, to make the grant of authorisation subject to the condition that the patient requires a benefit which a contracted establishment cannot provide without undue delay constitutes direct discrimination on the basis of place of establishment inasmuch as it favours non-contracted Netherlands service-providers to the detriment of those based in the other member states. f

The Commission claims that neither protection of the quality of health-care nor keeping costs under control by the sickness funds is sufficient reason to justify the barrier to the freedom to provide services which prior authorisation g

<sup>9</sup> A view which I share, as I made clear in the opinion I delivered in Geraets-Smits case. See, in particular, paras 35 to 49 in which I examine in detail the characteristics of the Netherlands compulsory sickness insurance scheme and I state that the health-care benefits in kind which it provides to insured persons lack the element of remuneration and are not therefore services within the meaning of art 50 EC. i

<sup>11</sup> The Commission acknowledges that, in some member states, there exist public health-care systems in which health-care providers are not members of a liberal profession, whose remuneration is not for medical care and hospitals do not pursue a commercial activity. At the hearing it gave as examples Denmark, Spain, Ireland and the United Kingdom.

- a constitutes. It differentiates, in the context of hospital care, between care provided on admission from those provided as outpatient care and assimilates the latter to the care dispensed by medical practitioners in their surgeries. It concludes that it is very unlikely that the phenomenon of patients travelling to other member states in search of non-hospital treatment will become sufficiently significant to affect seriously a national social security system
- b providing benefits in kind.

26. In the document submitted at the request of the court following delivery of the judgment in Geraets-Smits' case, the Commission acknowledges that there are certain dental services the particular nature of which could cause them to be caught by the overriding reasons examined in the above-mentioned
- c judgment concerning treatment at hospital, so that it urges the court to clarify its position in that regard.

VII—THE CASE LAW OF THE COURT OF JUSTICE ON FREEDOM TO PROVIDE SERVICES IN THE CONTEXT OF PRIOR AUTHORISATION REQUIRED BY THE SICKNESS INSURANCE FUND TO RECEIVE TREATMENT IN ANOTHER MEMBER STATE

- d A—Surgery visit to a medical practitioner and the prior authorisation requirement in a sickness insurance system which reimburses cost of treatment

27. On 28 April 1998, the Court of Justice delivered its judgment in Kohll's case<sup>12</sup>. The questions had been referred by the Cour de Cassation (Court of Cassation), Luxembourg, in the course of proceedings brought by Mr Kohll
- e against the decision of his sickness fund refusing to give authorisation for his daughter to be treated by an orthodontist in Germany, on the ground that the treatment was not urgent and could be provided in Luxembourg.

28. With regard to the application of the freedom to provide services to treatment provided by an orthodontist established in another member state, outwith any hospital infrastructure, the court stated that, since the service was
- f provided for remuneration, it was a service within the meaning of art 50 EC.

29. As to restrictive effects, while the Luxembourg rules did not deprive insured persons of the possibility of approaching a provider of services established in another member state, they did make reimbursement of the costs subject to prior authorisation, while reimbursement of those incurred in the state of insurance was not subject to the same requirement. It therefore
- g decided that such rules deterred insured persons from approaching providers of medical services established in another member state and therefore constituted for them and their patients a barrier to freedom to provide services<sup>13</sup>.

30. Several grounds were put forward by way of justification for the rules in question, namely maintenance of the financial balance of the social security
- h system and protection of public health, which included the need to guarantee the quality of medical services and the aim of providing a balanced medical and hospital service open to everyone.

31. With regard to the first ground, since the Luxembourg social security institution took on the same financial burden whether an insured person

The court on the same day also delivered Decker v Caisse de Maladie des Employés Privés Case C-120/95 [1998] All ER (EC) 673, [1998] ECR I-1831, on which I will not comment because the facts of the case concerned the purchase of spectacles and thus fell within the scope of the free movement of goods. See my opinion of 18 May 2000 in Geraets-Smits' case for the views of the numerous authors who have commented on those two judgments.

13 See Luisi v Ministero del Tesoro Joined cases 286/82 and 26/83 [1984] ECR 377 (para 16) and Bachmann v Belgian State Case C-204/90 [1994] STC 855, [1992] ECR I-249 (para 31).

approached a Luxembourg orthodontist or one established in another member state, the court took the view that reimbursement of the costs of dental treatment provided in other member states at the rate applied in the state of insurance had no significant effect on the financing of the social security system.

32. As regards the protection of public health, according to paras 45 and 46 of Kohll's case, while member states may fix limits to freedom to provide services on grounds of public health, that right does not permit them to exclude the public health sector, as a sector of economic activity, from the scope of the fundamental principle of freedom of movement<sup>14</sup>. In any event, as the conditions for taking up and pursuing the profession of doctor and dentist have been the subject of several co-ordinating and harmonising directives<sup>15</sup>, doctors and dentists established in other member states must be afforded all guarantees equivalent to those accorded to doctors and dentists established on national territory, for the purposes of freedom to provide services, so that rules such as those applicable in Luxembourg were not justified on grounds of public health in order to protect the quality of medical services provided in other member states.

Next, it was accepted in the judgment that the objective of maintaining a balanced medical and hospital service open to all, while intrinsically linked to the method of financing the social security system, may also fall within the derogations on grounds of public health provided for in art 46 EC (formerly art 56 of the EC Treaty), since it contributes to the attainment of a high level of health protection. In that regard, that article permits member states to restrict the freedom to provide medical and hospital services in so far as the maintenance of a treatment facility or medical service on national territory is essential for the public health and even the survival of the population.

Since it was not shown that the Luxembourg rules were necessary in order to attain those two objectives, the court held that they were not justified on grounds of public health.

B—Treatment provided in a hospital and the prior authorisation requirement in a sickness insurance system which provides exclusively benefits in kind

33. On 12 July 2001, the court delivered the judgment in Geraets-Smits' case<sup>16</sup>, in which it was called upon to consider, at the request of a Netherlands court, the Arrondissementsrechtbank ter Roermond, the same provision as is in issue in the present case, namely art 9(4) of the Law on Sickness Funds, read in conjunction with art 1 of the regulation on health care abroad under the compulsory sickness insurance rules.

34. In one of the two cases before the Rechtbank, the sickness insurance fund had refused to reimburse Ms Smits, who was suffering from Parkinson's disease, the cost of specific, multidisciplinary treatment she had undergone, a without authorisation, in a clinic in Germany. The reasons for the refusal consisted in the fact that the specific clinical method was not normal treatment within professional circles and was therefore not one of the benefits covered and that satisfactory and adequate treatment was available in the Netherlands at an establishment with which there were contractual arrangements, so that the treatment undergone in Germany was not necessary.

b In the other case, the sickness insurance fund refused Mr Peerbooms, who had fallen into a coma following a road accident, reimbursement for the treatment undergone in a clinic in Austria, consisting in special intensive therapy using neurostimulation, a technique which, in the Netherlands, is used only experimentally at two medical centres on patients under the age of 25 years, which Mr Peerbooms was not. The refusal was based, first, on the fact
c that, owing to the experimental nature of therapy using neurostimulation and the absence of scientific evidence of its effectiveness, that type of treatment was not regarded as normal within professional circles, so that it was not a treatment which was covered. Second, on the consideration that, since satisfactory and adequate treatment was available without undue delay in the d Netherlands at an establishment with which the sickness insurance fund had contractual arrangements, the treatment undergone in Austria was not necessary.

35. The court did not accept the view of the majority of the member states which argued that sickness insurance systems providing exclusively benefits in kind did not fall within the scope of arts 49 and 50 EC. It ruled that not even
e the fact that medical treatment provided at a hospital was financed directly by the sickness insurance funds on the basis of agreements and pre-set scales of fees could remove such treatment from the sphere of services.

36. Next, it held that the Netherlands rules deter insured persons from applying to providers of medical services established in a member state other than that in which they are insured and thus constitute, both for insured f persons and service providers, a barrier to freedom to provide services.

37. In paras 76 et seq, the judgment examines the prior authorisation requirement to which the Netherlands legislation subjects the assumption of the costs of treatment provided in another member state by a non-contracted hospital and finds the measure both necessary and reasonable for a number of g reasons. First, because the number of hospitals, their geographical distribution, the mode of their organisation and the equipment with which they are provided, and even the nature of the medical services which they are able to offer, are all matters for which planning must be possible. Secondly, because such planning, in a contract-based system such as that of the Netherlands, seeks to achieve the aim of ensuring that there is sufficient and permanent
h access to a balanced range of high-quality hospital treatment within the state and to control costs and to prevent any wastage which would be all the more damaging inasmuch as the hospital sector generates considerable costs and must satisfy increasing needs, while the financial resources which may be made available for health care are not unlimited, whatever the mode of funding i applied<sup>17</sup>.

VIII—EXAMINATION OF THE QUESTIONS REFERRED TO THE COURT

38. As has been pointed out above, the court found in Kohll's case that, in the case of treatment carried out by a medical practitioner at his surgery, chargeable to a reimbursement sickness insurance, the barrier to freedom to provide services which the prior authorisation from the sickness fund constitutes was not justified. However, in the judgment in Geraets-Smits' case, which concerned treatment provided in a hospital, chargeable to a system of benefits in kind, the court found, without drawing a distinction between whether the system was one of reimbursement or provided only benefits in kind, that a restriction on one of the fundamental freedoms under the Treaty could be justified by overriding reasons in the general interest.

At this stage, it still remains to be ascertained whether such prior authorisation is permissible where what a person insured under a system of benefits in kind seeks is medical attention which does not require admission into hospital<sup>18</sup>.

39. The Centrale Raad van Beroep itself came to that conclusion in the letter it sent to the Court of Justice in which, first, it pointed out that Geraets-Smits' case, which concerned principally treatment offered after admission to hospital, did not enable it to reply to the questions arising in the case brought by Ms Müller-Fauré, where treatment had been dispensed in the specialist's surgery. However, although Ms van Riet had shown herself in favour of maintaining the reference, the Netherlands court acknowledges that, in the light of the above-mentioned judgment, there is no need to answer the questions but it nevertheless requests the Court of Justice to clarify the concept of without undue delay employed in para 103.

A—Questions (1) and (2)

40. Those questions are practically identical to those referred by the Arrondissementsrechtbank te Roermond in Geraets-Smits' case, namely questions (1)(a) and (2). It is, none the less, appropriate to reformulate them in view of the fact that the court has already dealt with the requirement of prior authorisation where care is provided in hospital.

Thus, the national court must be understood to be now seeking to ascertain whether arts 49 and 50 EC preclude rules of a member state setting up a system of benefits in kind requiring insured persons to obtain prior authorisation from their fund before travelling to another member state if they wish to be seen by a medical practitioner with whom the fund does not have contractual arrangements, bearing in mind that authorisation is granted only if treatment is necessary for the insured person, which implies that appropriate treatment which may be provided without undue delay by a contracted medical practitioner is not available within the country.

41. The court has already held, in Geraets-Smits' case, that the requirement that insured persons obtain authorisation from the sickness fund in order to exercise their entitlement to benefits, at a hospital in another member state, constituted a barrier to freedom to provide services. I am of the view that the restriction on the insured person is of the same order of magnitude where what is involved is a consultation with a medical practitioner.

a 42. Indeed, art 49 EC precludes the application of any national rules which have the effect of making the provision of services between member states more difficult than the provision of services purely within one member state<sup>19</sup>. Although the Netherlands legislation at issue does not deprive insured persons of the possibility of using a provider of services established in another member state, in practice it makes assumption by the fund of the cost of the benefit subject to prior authorisation, which is moreover refused where the above-mentioned requirement is not satisfied.

b As was shown with regard to care provided in hospitals in para 67 et seq in Geraets-Smits' case, since only few medical practitioners established in other member states are contracted to Netherlands sickness funds, in the majority of cases the assumption of the cost of consulting a medical practitioner established in another member state is subject to prior authorisation, which would be refused if the above-mentioned requirement is not satisfied. On the other hand, a visit to a contracted doctor established within the territory and responsible for dispensing most of the health care to insured persons under the Netherlands Law on sickness funds is not only free of charge to the patient, it is also not subject to prior authorisation.

c 43. Therefore, as the court held in the aforementioned judgment, the Netherlands rule at issue is not only a deterrent to insured persons, it also prevents them applying to medical practitioners established in the other member state, so that it constitutes, for both the former and the latter, a barrier to freedom to provide services<sup>20</sup>.

d 44. The court has already acknowledged, with regard to the provision of cross-border medical care, that there exists a number of overriding reasons in the general interest which, where they are fulfilled, are capable of justifying restrictions on the freedom to provide services irrespective of whether it is provided as outpatient care under a system of sickness insurance which reimburses part of the benefits<sup>21</sup> or provided in hospital under a system of benefits in kind<sup>22</sup>.

e An analysis of the case law reveals three reasons: one consists in avoiding the risk of seriously undermining the financial balance of the social security system; another is the objective of maintaining a balanced medical and hospital service open to all, which may also fall within the derogations on grounds of public health under art 46 EC, in so far as it contributes to the attainment of a high level of health protection; and the final reason is maintenance of a treatment facility or medical service on national territory, which is essential for the public health and even the survival of the population.

f 45. It is therefore necessary to determine whether the barrier to freedom to provide health services which is constituted by the requirement, set by the Netherlands compulsory sickness insurance funds, to obtain prior authorisation before consulting a non-contracted medical practitioner is justified by any of those three reasons bearing in mind that it is settled case law that national rules must not exceed what is objectively necessary for achieving the objective pursued and that such a result must not be achievable by less restrictive means<sup>23</sup>. Furthermore, discriminatory rules can only be justified on the general-interest grounds referred to in art 46 EC, to which art 55 EC (formerly art 66 of the EC Treaty) refers, and which do not include economic aims<sup>24</sup>.

46. As I said in the opinion I submitted in Geraets-Smits' case, the Netherlands compulsory sickness system is characterised, first, by the fact that treatment is free for insured persons who, in order to obtain the health-care benefits they require, must use one of the medical practitioners or health-care institutions with whom or which their fund has concluded an agreement so that, if they decide to use non-contracted providers, they are required to pay any costs they incur, without entitlement to reimbursement; and, secondly, by the fact that sickness funds, which have a statutory duty to obtain for insured persons appropriate treatment, operate by concluding with health-care institutions and independent medical practitioners agreements in which they determine in advance the extent and quality of the benefits to be provided, and the financial contribution the fund will make, which, for medical practitioners, consists in the payment of a fixed flat-rate amount, and, for each hospital, in the payment of an attendance charge, which is intended to finance the institution rather than to cover the real cost of hospital accommodation on each occasion.

The national court which has made the reference to the court acknowledges that the system of benefits in kind, organised by the Netherlands sickness funds by means of agreements, serves to safeguard the quality of care for insured persons and to control costs.

47. As pointed out in para 76 of Geraets-Smits' case, unlike the services provided by practitioners in their surgeries or at the patient's home, those provided in a hospital take place within an infrastructure with, undoubtedly, certain very distinct characteristics, since the number of hospitals, their geographical distribution, the mode of their organisation and the equipment with which they are provided, and the nature of the medical services which they are able to offer, must all be planned for.

I am nevertheless of the opinion that, with regard to a system of sickness insurance which is structurally organised to provide only benefits in kind, whether by providing itself with its own hospitals and contracted staff or, as in the Netherlands, by concluding agreements with medical practitioners and hospitals, the distinction between care provided by medical practitioners in their surgeries and those provided in hospital is blurred.

48. In the Netherlands, there are approximately 30 sickness funds, with defined territorial scope. Persons entitled to compulsory insurance must register with the fund operating in the municipal district in which they reside. The number of agreements which they regularly conclude with general practitioners and with medical practitioners with various specialisms varies according to the need for health care calculated by the area in which they operate and the number of patients registered in a given period.

a 49. Furthermore, the charges which funds agree each year with medical practitioners, which differ according to the specialism concerned, largely depend on the number of patients registered with them. The charges are calculated by means of an arithmetical formula whereby one amount<sup>25</sup>, representing average income, is added to another, representing the average cost of running a practice<sup>26</sup>, the sum of which is divided by a factor representing the workload (on the basis, for example, of 2,350 patients a year, in the case of a general practitioner). In respect of 2000, that calculation produced the result that a general practitioner received from the sickness insurance fund with which he had concluded an agreement the amount of NLG 133, known as a subscription charge<sup>27</sup>, for every insured person who chose to be treated at his surgery, irrespective of the number of patients he actually saw, and regardless of the fact that some may have needed to be seen more often than others and some may not have needed to be seen at all at any time during the year<sup>28</sup>. It would appear that contracted dentists also receive from the sickness fund payment at a flat rate per patient<sup>29</sup>.

d Provision is thus made in advance for the financing of all the health care patients may need in the course of a year, as out-patients for general practitioners, specialists and dentists, in order to ensure that the funds do not in principle have to bear any additional expenditure. In those circumstances, the use by insured persons of non-contracted providers can have a significant impact on the funding of the system, since it represents an additional financial burden for the fund in every case, and consequently risks seriously undermining the financial balance of the system.

e 50. The fact is that, if there are only a few patients every year who follow the course of action taken by Ms Müller-Fauré, it is difficult to prove that reimbursing their costs has a significant impact on the management of the budget of the sickness funds.

f Indeed, the Commission argues that there is no question of a risk of seriously undermining the financial balance of the social security system inasmuch as, because of the language barrier or difficulties in travelling, in the final analysis the number of patients going to other member states to see a doctor are very few<sup>30</sup>.

g 51. I cannot agree. The Commission knows very well that there is a relatively large number of doctors benefiting from freedom of establishment in order to practise in member states other than their own. If a patient visits such a doctor

h 26 There are guidelines for calculating the cost of running each profession's establishments. Account is taken of the costs of accommodation, transport, assistant staff, telephone, area covered, instruments and so forth. They are adjusted in accordance with new requirements, such as, for example, installing computers in surgeries.

27 That charge amounts to NLG 157 per insured person over 64 years of age.

28 The system of remunerations for contracted practitioners who provide their services within the context of the compulsory sickness insurance system is markedly different from the system governing private practice, where there is no system of subscription charges, there being a charge for each visit instead.

i 29 See chapter 5 of the publication produced by the Ministerie van Volksgezondheid, Welzijn en Sport-NL, May 2001, entitled 'Health Care, Health Policies and Health Care reforms in the Netherlands': 'General practitioners and dentists receive capitation payments for their sickness fund insured, but usually fee for services from their private insured clients.'

30 At the hearing, the Netherlands government informed the court that, even all the disadvantages listed by the Commission and despite the mandatory nature of the prior authorisation requirement, some 14,000 insured persons received treatment abroad in 2001.

who speaks the patient's language, there is no longer a language barrier. Likewise, language borders in Europe are far from being coterminous with the territorial limits of the states and, across broad border areas, people often use the language of the neighbouring country. I would point out as examples Belgium and the Netherlands, Luxembourg and Germany, Italy and Austria, Sweden and Finland, Spain and Portugal, or countries which share a language, such as Ireland and the United Kingdom or Austria and Germany. a

Neither is distance a deterrent factor, in particular, in view of the progress in communications within Europe, the trend in second-home ownership in another member state and the ease and frequency with which a sizeable proportion of the population travels to other countries on holiday. b

52. There is another reason why I believe there would be a relatively high number of patients who, if they could be certain of being reimbursed, would choose to travel to another member state in order to see a specialist. They would be those who, having the means to afford it, would not wish to wait a relatively long time before being seen by a doctor. The patient seeks, with legitimate eagerness, to do everything in his power to look after himself. Let us bear in mind that, as far back as the eighteenth century, Molière was aware of that human tendency since Argan, the main character in his comedy Le malade imaginaire, sought to marry his daughter Angélique, irrespective of her wishes, to a doctor in order to ensure for himself treatment for any complaint from which he might ail<sup>31</sup>. c

53. It must be borne in mind, when maintaining the financial balance of the system, that the functioning of a system of benefits in kind is characterised also by the important role played by general practitioners, who are responsible for providing patients with primary care, referring them, where necessary, to the relevant specialist, whom patients cannot consult directly. If insured persons were able to sidestep that prior stage and go on their own initiative to a specialist in another member state, while the sickness fund remained obliged to reimburse them, a large part would be lost of the efficiency brought to the system by that method of controlling unnecessary use of medical services, in particular in preventing specialists' waiting rooms being filled with patients who prescribe such a consultation for themselves without even knowing which specialist should deal with their complaint. Thus, that aspect of the general practitioner's work, intended to contain costs and monitor the proper matching of means to needs, fulfils, within the system of contracted services, a function similar to that of the prior authorisation from the fund prior to consulting a non-contracted practitioner. d

54. Furthermore, so far as concerns the desire to maintain a broad range of medical care which is balanced and open to all, it is clear that the interest of practitioners in concluding agreements with the sickness funds is in direct relation to the number of patients which they might be allocated and in respect of whom they collect charges every year. If insured persons, instead of going to contracted practitioners, were to go to non-contracted doctors, whether within the country or abroad, the funds would be unable to guarantee a number of insured persons per doctor. There would be a risk that many such practitioners would lose interest in undertaking to make themselves available e

- a to a definite extent and guarantee the quality and price of their services by concluding agreements with the funds which manage the compulsory sickness insurance, preferring instead to treat private patients, who would certainly be fewer but from whom they receive higher fees. Thus, despite the efforts of the funds to make plans for the provision of health care, staffing and funding, it would not be possible to guarantee insured persons stable and open access to medical practitioners, including a wide range of specialists, at affordable cost, so that the continuity of the system of benefits in kind, in its present form, would be seriously jeopardised. It must be borne in mind that, as the court has consistently held, Community law does not detract from the powers of the member states to organise their social security systems<sup>32</sup>, so that in the absence of harmonisation at Community level, it is for national legislation to determine the conditions for entitlement to benefits<sup>33</sup>.
- b

55. It is true that social security systems of benefits in kind are burdened with the problem of waiting lists, arising from the ever-widening discrepancy between supply and demand in health care, both with regard to admission to hospital and to seeing a doctor<sup>34</sup>. Faced with that situation, prior authorisation from funds before seeking treatment from non-contracted sources is a mechanism which enables them to establish priorities for various forms of treatment, manage the available resources and ensure, in practice, health care in accordance with the needs which may arise at any time. If patients on doctors' waiting lists had free access to the non-contracted services market and were entitled to reimbursement, it would destroy the fundamental principle of equality, between insured persons, of access to health care to the detriment of those who, because they lack the means or because they trust in the fairness of the system, await their turn, with the result that the essence of a system of sickness insurance of benefits in kind would be lost, becoming a de facto reimbursement system.

- f In that context, the fact that it turns out that the cost of the actual treatment which an insured persons such as Ms van Riet has obtained in another member state was less than that which the fund would have had to pay in the state of membership is irrelevant, since the adverse consequences of such a course of action for the system cannot be assessed on the basis of just one isolated case<sup>35</sup>.

56. Likewise, where patients travel regularly and systematically to other member states in search of medical treatment, the risk arises, in particular, for smaller countries, that funds stop managing to maintain an acceptable level of professional competence in the treatment of rare or very complex conditions.
- g

57. Moreover, by being indissociably linked to the system of sickness benefits in kind, prior authorisation is an ideal means for allowing insured persons to

34 This is not a problem which affects only sickness insurance systems providing benefits in kind: one need only note the number of days patients are made to wait in Luxembourg, a state which provides only for reimbursement of part of the costs of treatment incurred by insured persons, before seeing a general practitioner or the number of weeks before managing to see a specialist.

35 Dubouis 'La libre circulation des patients hospitaliers, une liberté sous conditions' (2001) 37(4) Revue de droit sanitaire et social (RDSS), 721 to 726, in particular p 726: '... on peut se demander s'il est pleinement légitime d'accorder au patient qui se déplace le droit de choisir entre le régime de son État d'origine et celui de l'État dans lequel il se fait soigner les éléments qui lui sont les plus favorables.'

know, sufficiently in advance, whether the treatment they seek is covered, enabling the fund to keep control over costs and the use of resources. a

If Ms Müller-Fauré had sought prior authorisation, she would have learnt that, of the services which she was going to seek from the dentist in Germany, only an infinitesimal part was covered by her social security system in the Netherlands. At the same time, the fund could have determined whether the state of the patient's dentition required treatment from a non-contracted dentist or whether it was preferable that the patient should see a contracted dentist, bearing in mind that covered dental treatment is provided on the basis of capitation payments. b

58. Belgium, where the sickness insurance reimburses part of the costs of treatment, objects to prior authorisation of funds, ruled out under Kohll's case, being justified where systems of benefits in kind are concerned, inasmuch as the freedom to provide services cannot depend on the special nature of the social security system. c

I understand that point of view but I do not share it. I am aware of the difficulty of reconciling that fundamental freedom under the Treaty with the idiosyncrasies of the sickness insurance systems of 15 countries, most of which grant benefits in kind. However, it must be borne in mind that the member states have never had the intention of harmonising their laws in this field and have confined themselves to co-ordinating them by means of Regulation 1408/71 in order to achieve the objectives required under art 42 EC (formerly art 51 of the EC Treaty). Although it is true that, when organising their social security systems, the member states must comply with Community law<sup>36</sup>, that obligation cannot require them to abandon the principles and philosophy which has traditionally governed their sickness insurance, nor require them to undergo restructuring on a scale such as to enable them to reimburse those of their insured persons who choose to go to the doctor in another member state<sup>37</sup>. d

59. Finally, the necessity of the treatment which the patient proposes to follow, by going to a non-contracted provider, as a condition for the granting of prior authorisation by the sickness insurance fund, was examined in detail in paras 103 to 107 of the judgment in Geraets-Smits' case. In my opinion, the same reasoning applies in the present case, and should be declared justified in accordance with art 49 EC, provided that the condition is construed to the effect that authorisation may be refused on that ground only if the same or equally effective treatment for the patient can be obtained without undue delay from a medical practitioner with which the insured person's sickness insurance fund has contractual arrangements<sup>38</sup>. e

<sup>37</sup> We have yet to see how insured persons would react since, instead of enjoying free health care, they would have to pay for it in advance and wait for a time before being reimbursed part of the actual cost. g

<sup>38</sup> That is the view taken in respect of hospital treatment by the Arrondissementsrechtbank te Rotterdam, which had referred the question in that case, when it ruled on the merits of the main proceedings, on 3 October 2001, just two-and-a-half months after receiving the court's answer. It dismissed Ms Geraets-Smits' application on the ground that it had not been proven either clinically or scientifically that the specific, multidisciplinary treatment provided in Germany was any better than the care available in the Netherlands and because the patient could have been seen in her own country at a hospital having contractual arrangements with her sickness fund. Mr Peerboom's application suffered the same fate, the court having found that the special intensive therapy by means of neurostimulation cannot be regarded as normal within professional circles, inasmuch as it has not been sufficiently researched or recognised by international medical science. In coming to h a Interpreted thus, such a condition results, in the context of prior authorisation, in an adequate, balanced and permanent supply of high-quality outpatient treatment being maintained within the national territory and provides financial stability to the sickness insurance system.

b 60. Just as with treatment in hospital, were many persons insured under a system of benefits in kind decide to travel to other member states to see a medical practitioner, when there is sufficient supply in the country under contractual arrangements providing adequate identical or equivalent services, the outflow of patients would put at risk the very principle of having contractual arrangements, all the planning and rationalisation carried out by the funds, the balance in the supply of medical care and the management of resources in accordance with priorities<sup>39</sup>.

c However, once it is clear that the benefits covered by the national insurance system cannot be provided by a contracted practitioner, it is not acceptable that national practitioners not having any contractual arrangements with the insured person's sickness insurance fund be given priority over doctors established in other member states since, once such benefits are ex hypothesi d provided outside the planning framework established by national legislation, such priority would exceed what is necessary for meeting the overriding requirements capable of justifying a barrier to the principle of freedom to provide services.

e 61. I am fully aware that the interpretation which I am proposing not only runs counter to the view of states whose sickness insurance systems reimburse part of the costs incurred by insured persons, the only one of which to have submitted its views being Belgium, but also has the drawback that it challenges the views of extreme supporters of the liberalisation of health services in the member states. It does, however, at least have the advantage of offering a clear and unambiguous solution to the problem raised, avoiding dilemmas such as f that faced by the Commission, which acknowledges that the special nature of certain dental services would justify invoking the general-interest reasons considered in Geraets-Smits' case.

g In answer to the question I put to it in that respect, the Commission explained that it meant very expensive dental treatment which required the services of highly specialised practitioners, since the availability of such services requires planning. It further acknowledged that there are no absolute means of differentiating between hospital and outpatient care: where a patient is admitted, the authorisation requirement is justified, whereas if the service is provided at a surgery, that requirement must be considered on a case-by-case basis.

h I am not alone in thinking that the Commission's proposal, however adequate it may appear in the light of the principle of proportionality, would i that conclusion, the court relied on an expert opinion of 1994 on stimulation programmes, the report by a committee of the Health Authority and a pilot study. See the judgments in the 'National Decisions' database of the court, reference QP/03935-P1-A and QP/03935-P1-B.

not work in practice<sup>40</sup> since, first, it would introduce an element of uncertainty a for the users of the system contrary to the principle of legal certainty and, secondly, if prior authorisation is justifiable on the ground that insurance funds need to plan for the supply of medical services, I think it is obvious that the most expensive or complex services should not be the only services which must be planned for. <sup>41</sup> That is not to take account of the fact that the funds ought to consider beforehand, in respect of each outpatient service, whether it is such as b to require prior authorisation, thus introducing an additional obstacle into the procedure for obtaining health care.

62. In view of all the foregoing considerations, I am of opinion that arts 49 and 50 EC do not preclude legislation of a member state, setting up a social security system which provides for sickness benefits in kind, requiring insured persons to obtain prior authorisation from their sickness insurance fund in c order to travel to another member state, if they wish to be treated by a non-contracted practitioner, and making the grant of such authorisation subject to the condition that the treatment is necessary for the person concerned, provided it is understood that it can be refused only if the same or d equally effective treatment can be obtained without undue delay from a practitioner having a contractual arrangement with the insured person's sickness insurance fund.

B—The third question

63. The judgment in Geraets-Smits' case already analysed exhaustively the requirement of prior authorisation to obtain, in another member state, services e provided in hospitals. There is therefore no need to answer the third question referred to the court which sought to ascertain whether in order to answer the two preceding questions, it was necessary to make a distinction according to whether the care was provided, in whole or in part, at hospital.

C—The clarification sought by the Centrale Raad van Beroep regarding the meaning of without undue delay used in para 103 in the judgment in Geraets-Smits' case f

64. In the letter of 25 October 2001, the national court asked the Court of Justice the meaning of that expression, which it did not find clear, in the following terms:

'Is the term "without undue delay" [tijdig] in paragraph 103 of the g judgment in Smits and Peerbooms to be interpreted as meaning that there can be no question of any undue delay if medical treatment is not urgent or necessary on medical grounds, irrespective of the length of the waiting time for such treatment?'

65. In that regard, I agree with the Commission, which pointed out that h the term derives from Netherlands law, specifically from the order by which the Arrondissementsrechtbank te Roermond made its reference in Geraets-Smits' case. The word 'tijdig' appears in the last line of the penultimate paragraph of chapter II(1) of the order.

<sup>41</sup> The possibility is not restricted to dental treatment. There are services such as scanning or magnetic resonance imaging, which are usually provided by radiologists, which do not require admission to hospital and the availability of which is limited and undoubtedly requires planning by the bodies which manage the sickness insurance fund.

a It is a condition linked to one of the two requirements laid down by the sickness funds when granting prior authorisation, namely that the planned treatment is necessary for the patient.

b 66. Furthermore, in Geraets-Smits' case the court explained, in para 104, the way in which to determine whether equally effective treatment could be obtained without undue delay from an establishment having contractual arrangements with the insured person's fund, stating that the national authorities are required to have regard to all the circumstances of each specific case, not only of the patient's medical condition at the time when authorisation is sought but also of his past record.

c As may be seen, the court made no mention of grounds other than medical. 67. I am of the opinion that it must be explained to the national court that determination of the condition as to 'without undue delay' (tijdig) must be carried out from a strictly medical point of view, irrespective of the length of the waiting time for the treatment sought.

IX—CONCLUSION

d 68. In view of the foregoing, I propose that the Court of Justice's reply to the questions referred to it by the Centrale Raad van Beroep should be as follows:

e (1) Articles 49 and 50 EC do not preclude legislation of a member state, setting up a social security system which provides for sickness benefits in kind, requiring insured persons to obtain prior authorisation from their sickness insurance fund in order to travel to another member state, if they wish to be treated by a non-contracted practitioner, and making the grant of such authorisation subject to the condition that the treatment is necessary for the person concerned, provided it is understood that it can be refused only if the same or equally effective treatment can be obtained without undue delay from a practitioner having a contractual arrangement with the insured person's sickness insurance fund.

f (2) Determination of the condition as to 'without undue delay' (tijdig) must be carried out from a strictly medical point of view, irrespective of the length of the waiting time for the treatment sought.

g 1. By order of 6 October 1999, received at the Court of Justice of the European Communities on 11 October 1999, the Centrale Raad van Beroep (Higher Social Security Court) referred to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) three questions on the interpretation of art 59 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, art 49 EC) and art 60 of the EC Treaty (now art 50 EC).

h 2. Those questions have been raised in two sets of proceedings between Ms Müller-Fauré and Onderlinge Waarborgmaatschappij OZ Zorgverzekeringen UA (mutual sickness insurance fund; the Zwijndrecht Fund), established in Zwijndrecht, Netherlands, and between Ms van Riet and Onderlinge Waarborgmaatschappij ZAO Zorgverzekeringen (the Amsterdam Fund), established in Amsterdam, Netherlands, concerning the reimbursement of medical costs incurred in Germany and Belgium respectively.

NATIONAL LEGAL FRAMEWORK

i 3. In the Netherlands, the sickness insurance scheme is based inter alia on the Ziekenfondswet (Law on Sickness Funds) of 15 October 1964 (Staatsblad 1964, No 392), which has been subsequently amended (the ZFW), and on the Algemene Wet Bijzondere Ziektekosten (Law on general insurance for special sickness costs) of 14 December 1967 (Staatsblad 1967, No 617), which has also been subsequently amended, (the AWBZ). Both the ZFW and the AWBZ establish a system of benefits in kind under which an insured person is entitled not to reimbursement of costs incurred for medical treatment but to free treatment. Both laws are based on a system of agreements between sickness funds and providers of health care. a

4. Under arts 2 to 4 of the ZFW, workers whose annual income does not exceed an amount determined by that law, persons treated as such and persons in receipt of social benefits, as well as dependent members of their families living with them in the same household, are compulsorily and automatically insured under that law. b

5. Article 5(1) of the ZFW provides that any person coming within its scope who wishes to claim entitlement under that law must be affiliated to a sickness fund operating in the municipality in which he resides. c

6. Article 8 of the ZFW provides:

‘1. An insured person shall be entitled to benefits in the form of necessary medical care, provided that he is not entitled to such care under the Algemene Wet Bijzondere Ziektekosten ... Sickness funds shall ensure that any insured person registered with them is able to rely on that right. d

2. The nature, content and extent of the benefits shall be defined by or pursuant to a Royal Decree, it being understood that they shall in any event include medical assistance, the extent of which remains to be defined, and also the care and treatment provided in categories of institutions to be defined. Furthermore, the grant of a benefit may be conditional on a financial contribution by the insured person; this contribution need not be the same for all insured persons ...’ e

7. The Verstrekkingsbesluit Ziekenfondsverzekering (Decree on sickness insurance benefits in kind) of 4 January 1966, (Staatsblad 1966, No 3), which has been subsequently amended (the Verstrekkingsbesluit), implements art 8(2) of the ZFW. f

8. The Verstrekkingsbesluit thus determines entitlement to benefits and the extent of such benefits for various categories of care, including in particular the categories ‘medical and surgical assistance’ and ‘in-patient hospital care’.

9. The principal features of the system of agreements put in place by the ZFW are as follows. g

10. Article 44(1) of the ZFW provides that the sickness funds are to ‘enter into agreements with persons and establishments offering one or more forms of care, as referred to in the Royal Decree adopted to implement Article 8’.

11. Article 44(3) of the ZFW provides that such agreements are to include as a minimum provisions concerning the nature and extent of the parties’ mutual obligations and rights, the categories of care to be provided, the quality and effectiveness of the care provided, supervision of compliance with the terms of the agreement, including supervision of the benefits provided or to be provided and the accuracy of the amounts charged for those benefits, and also an obligation to communicate the information necessary for that supervision. h

12. The sickness funds are free to enter into agreements with any care provider, subject to a twofold reservation. First, under art 47 of the ZFW, every sickness fund ‘is required to enter into an agreement ... with any establishment in the region in which it operates or which the population of that region regularly attends’. Second, agreements can be entered into only with i

- a establishments which are duly authorised to provide the care in question or with persons lawfully authorised to do so.

13. Article 8a of the ZFW provides:

‘1. An establishment providing services such as those referred to in Article 8 must be authorised to do so.

- b 2. A Royal Decree may provide that an establishment belonging to a category to be defined by Royal Decree is to be regarded as authorised for the purposes of this Law ...’

14. Under art 8c(a) of the ZFW approval of an establishment operating a hospital facility must be refused if that establishment does not meet the requirements of the Wet ziekenhuisvoorzieningen (Law on hospital facilities) on distribution and needs. That law, its implementing directives (in particular the directive based on art 3 of the law, Nederlandse Staatscourant 1987, No 248) and also the district plans determine in greater detail national needs in relation to various categories of hospitals and their distribution between the various health regions within the Netherlands.

- d 15. As regards the specific exercise of the right to benefits, art 9 of the ZFW provides:

‘1. Save as provided for in the Royal Decree referred to in Article 8, an insured person wishing to claim entitlement to a benefit shall apply to a person or an establishment with whom or with which the sickness fund with which he is registered has entered into an agreement for that purpose, subject to the provisions of paragraph 4.

- e 2. The insured person may choose from among the persons and establishments mentioned in paragraph 1, subject to the provisions of paragraph 5 and the provisions regarding conveyance by ambulance, as laid down in the Wet ambulancevervoer ((Law on conveyance by ambulance), Staatsblad 1971, No 369).

4. A sickness fund may, by way of derogation from paragraphs 1 and 2 hereof, authorise an insured person, for the purpose of claiming entitlement to a benefit, to apply to another person or establishment in the Netherlands where this is necessary for his health care. The Minister may determine the cases and circumstances in which an insured person may be granted authorisation, in claiming entitlement to a benefit, to apply to a person or an establishment outside the Netherlands.’

- g 16. The minister exercised the powers conferred on him by the final sentence of art 9(4) of the ZFW in adopting the Regeling hulp in het buitenland ziekenfondsverzekering (Regulation on care provided abroad under the sickness insurance rules) of 30 June 1988, (Nederlandse Staatscourant 1988, No 123; the Rhbz). Article 1 of the Rhbz provides:

i 17. In the event of an insured person obtaining authorisation to apply to a provider established outside the Netherlands, the cost of any treatment is wholly assumed by the sickness fund to which the person is affiliated.

18. The Centrale Raad van Beroep explains that, according to its established case law, applications for authorisation to undergo medical treatment abroad funded under the ZFW must be submitted to the insured person's sickness fund and the latter must, except in exceptional circumstances such as an emergency, have given its prior agreement to the provision of treatment, failing which it will not be possible to obtain reimbursement of the cost of the treatment.

19. Furthermore, as regards the condition laid down in art 9(4) of the ZFW and art 1 of the Rhbz that the insured's treatment abroad must be medically necessary, it appears from the documents before the court that the fund takes account, in practice, of the methods of treatment available in the Netherlands and ascertains whether appropriate treatment can be provided there without undue delay.

THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS

The Müller-Fauré case

20. While on holiday in Germany, Ms Müller-Fauré underwent dental treatment involving the fitting of six crowns and a fixed prosthesis on the upper jaw. The treatment was provided between 20 October and 18 November 1994 without recourse to any hospital facilities.

21. When she returned from her holiday, she applied to the Zwijndrecht Fund for reimbursement of the costs of the treatment, which amounted to a total of DEM 7,444.59. By letter of 12 May 1995 the fund refused reimbursement on the basis of the opinion of its advisory dental officer.

22. Ms Müller-Fauré sought the opinion of the Ziekenfondsraad, which is responsible for supervising the management and administration of sickness funds and which, on 16 February 1996, confirmed the Zwijndrecht Fund's decision on the ground that insured persons are entitled only to treatment itself and not to reimbursement of any related costs, except in exceptional circumstances which did not exist in this case.

23. Ms Müller-Fauré then brought an action before the Arrondissementsrechtbank te Rotterdam (District Court, Rotterdam), Netherlands. By judgment of 21 August 1997, that court upheld the fund's decision, having also found that the case entailed no exceptional circumstances such as to justify reimbursement of the costs, given, in particular, the scale of the treatment and the fact that it extended over several weeks.

24. The Centrale Raad van Beroep points out that in any event only a limited part of the treatment received by Ms Müller-Fauré is covered by the Verstrekkingenbesluit and is therefore eligible for reimbursement. Furthermore, it finds that Ms Müller-Fauré voluntarily sought treatment from a dentist established in Germany while she was on holiday there because she lacked confidence in dental practitioners in the Netherlands. Such circumstances cannot, according to the case law of the court concerned, provide grounds under the national legislation for reimbursement in respect of medical treatment undergone abroad without authorisation from the insured person's fund.

The van Riet case

25. Ms van Riet had been suffering from pain in her right wrist since 1985. On 5 April 1993, the doctor treating her requested that the Amsterdam Fund's medical adviser should grant authorisation for his patient to have an arthroscopy performed in Deurne hospital, Belgium, where that examination a could be carried out much sooner than in the Netherlands. The fund rejected that request by letters of 24 June and 5 July 1993 on the ground that the test could also be performed in the Netherlands.

26. In the meantime, Ms van Riet had already had the arthroscopy carried out at Deurne hospital in May 1993 and, following that examination, the decision was taken to carry out an ulnar reduction to relieve the patient's pain. b Care before and after the treatment, and the treatment itself, were provided in Belgium, partly in hospital and partly elsewhere. The Amsterdam Fund refused to reimburse the cost of the care, which amounted to a total of BEF 93,782. That decision was confirmed by the Ziekenfondsraad on the ground that there was no emergency nor any medical necessity such as to justify Ms van Riet receiving treatment in Belgium, since appropriate treatment was available in c the Netherlands within a reasonable period. The competent Arrondissementsrechtbank rejected as unfounded Ms van Riet's action against the decision for the same reasons as the Amsterdam Fund.

27. The Centrale Raad van Beroep, before which the applicant in the main proceedings brought an appeal, states that, although it is not disputed that d most of the treatment given to Ms van Riet is indeed covered by the Verstrekkingenbesluit, the treatment was provided in Belgium without prior authorisation and without it being established that Ms van Riet could not reasonably wait, for medical or other reasons, until the Amsterdam Fund had taken a decision on her application. Furthermore, in that court's view, the time which Ms van Riet would have had to wait for the arthroscopy in the e Netherlands was not unreasonable. The documents before the court show that the waiting time was about six months.

28. The referring court submits that, in this instance, the conditions for application of art 22(1)(a) of Council Regulation (EEC) 1408/71 on the application of social security schemes to employed persons, to self-employed persons and to members of their families moving within the Community) f (OJ English Sp Edn 1972 (II) p 416), as amended and updated by Council Regulation (EC) 118/97 (OJ 1997 L28 p 1), were not met, since neither Ms Müller-Fauré's nor Ms van Riet's state of health necessitated immediate treatment during a stay in the territory of another member state. Furthermore, nor has it been established, in conformity with art 22(1)(c) and (2), second g paragraph, of that regulation that the treatment concerned could not, account being taken of the state of health of the applicants in the main actions, be given in the Netherlands within the time 'normally necessary', a fact which would have obliged the sickness funds to authorise treatment in another member state.

29. The national court none the less raises a question as to the compatibility h of the decisions refusing reimbursement with arts 59 and 60 of the Treaty in the light of the judgment in Kohll v Union des Caisses de Maladie Case C-158/96 [1998] All ER (EC) 673, [1998] ECR I-1931. It notes that the national provisions at issue do not of themselves prevent insured persons from applying to a service provider established in another member state but impose a precondition that the sickness insurance fund of which the insured persons are i members must have entered into an agreement with that provider, something which, as a rule, is not the case. In the absence of such an agreement, reimbursement of costs incurred in another member state is subject to prior authorisation, which is not granted unless 'it is necessary for [the insured person's] health care', which in general is the case only where the contracted care providers cannot offer all the appropriate care. The obligation to obtain prior authorisation therefore works to the advantage of contracted medical care providers—which are virtually always from the Netherlands—and to the detriment of care providers from other member states. The referring court adds that the administrative powers of the Netherlands authorities do not extend to care providers established in other member states, which may hinder the conclusion of agreements with those providers. a

30. If it were found that the authorisation required by art 9(4) of the ZFW impedes the freedom to provide services, the Centrale Raad van Beroep seeks to ascertain whether the requirement is justified. b

31. In that connection, the referring court draws attention to the characteristics of the Netherlands sickness insurance scheme. In essence, unlike 'reimbursement' schemes, the scheme guarantees that benefits in kind will be provided. In the submission of the defendants in the main actions, the financial balance of the scheme could be jeopardised if it were possible for insured persons to obtain reimbursement, without prior authorisation, of the costs of care provided in another member state. The national court refers in that regard to national measures taken to control the costs of hospital care, in particular the rules laid down in the Wet ziekenhuisvoorzieningen concerning the planning and geographical distribution of care, and those in the ZFW limiting reimbursement to care provided by authorised hospitals. c

THE QUESTIONS REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

32. Those were the circumstances in which the Centrale Raad van Beroep decided to stay proceedings and refer the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling: e

'(1) Are Articles 59 and 60 of the EC Treaty ... to be interpreted as meaning that in principle a provision such as Article 9(4) of the Ziekenfondswet, read in conjunction with Article 1 of the Regeling hulp in het buitenland ziekenfondsverzekering, is incompatible therewith in so far as it stipulates that in order to assert his entitlement to benefits a person insured with a sickness insurance fund requires the prior authorisation of that fund to seek treatment from a person or establishment outside the Netherlands with whom or which the sickness insurance fund has not concluded an agreement? f

(2) If so, do the objectives of the Netherlands system of benefits in kind referred to above constitute an overriding reason in the general interest capable of justifying a restriction on the fundamental principle of freedom to provide services? g

(3) Does the question whether the treatment as a whole or only a proportion thereof involved hospital care affect the answers to these questions? h

33. By letter of 12 July 2001, the Court Registry asked the referring court whether it wished to maintain its reference for a preliminary ruling in the light of the judgment delivered on that date in Geraets-Smits v Stichting Ziekenfonds VGZ, Peerbooms v Stichting CZ Groep Zorgverzekeringen Case C-157/99 [2003] All ER (EC) 481, [2001] ECR I-5473. i

34. By letter of 25 October 2001, the referring court informed the court that it was maintaining the reference since Geraets-Smits' case did not specifically deal with the attributes of the Netherlands sickness insurance scheme, which is a benefits-in-kind scheme based on agreements. It also asked the court to explain the import of para 103 of the judgment, which states:

- a '... the condition concerning the necessity of the treatment, laid down by the rules at issue in the main proceedings, can be justified under art 59 of the Treaty, provided that the condition is construed to the effect that authorisation to receive treatment in another member state may be refused on that ground only if the same or equally effective treatment [for the patient] can be obtained without undue delay from an establishment with which the insured person's sickness insurance fund has contractual arrangements.'

35. More specifically, the referring court asks the court what is meant by 'without undue delay' and, in particular, whether that condition must be assessed on a strictly medical basis, regardless of the waiting time for the treatment sought.

36. By letter of 6 March 2002, the Court Registry requested the parties to the main actions, the member states and the Commission of the European Communities to submit any observations which they might have on the conclusions to be drawn from the judgment in Geraets-Smits' case in the light of the questions raised by the Centrale Raad van Beroep.

THE FIRST QUESTION

37. By its first question, the national court is essentially asking whether arts 59 and 60 of the Treaty are to be interpreted as precluding legislation of a member state, such as the legislation at issue in the main proceedings, which makes assumption of the costs of care provided in another member state, by a person or an establishment with whom or which the insured person's sickness fund has not concluded an agreement, conditional upon prior authorisation by the fund.

38. It should be borne in mind, as a preliminary point, that it is settled case law that medical activities fall within the scope of art 60 of the Treaty, there being no need to distinguish in that regard between care provided in a hospital environment and care provided outside such an environment (see, most recently, Geraets-Smits' case (para 53)).

39. The court also found, in paras 54 and 55 of Geraets-Smits' case, that the fact that the applicable rules are social security rules and, more specifically, provide, as regards sickness insurance, for benefits in kind rather than reimbursement does not mean that the medical treatment in question falls outside the scope of the freedom to provide services guaranteed by the EC Treaty. Indeed, in the disputes before the national court, the treatment provided in a member state other than that in which the persons concerned were insured resulted in direct payment by the patient to the doctor providing the service or the establishment in which the care was provided.

40. Since medical services fall within the ambit of freedom to provide services for the purposes of arts 59 and 60 of the Treaty, it is necessary to determine whether the legislation at issue in the main actions introduces restrictions on that freedom in making assumption of the costs of care provided in a member state other than that in which the insured person's sickness fund is established, by a person or establishment which has not concluded an agreement with that fund, conditional upon prior authorisation by the fund.

41. In that regard the court has already held, in para 62 of the judgment in Geraets-Smits' case, that while the ZFW does not deprive insured persons of the possibility of using a service provider established in a member state other than that in which the sickness fund covering the insured is situated, it does nevertheless make reimbursement of the costs thus incurred subject to prior authorisation, which may be given, as the referring court points out, only where provision of the care at issue, irrespective of whether it involves a hospital, is a medical necessity. a

42. Since the requirement of medical necessity is in practice satisfied only where adequate treatment cannot be obtained without undue delay from a contracted doctor or hospital in the member state in which the person is insured, this requirement by its very nature is liable severely to limit the circumstances in which such authorisation will be issued (see Geraets-Smits' case (para 64)). b

43. Admittedly, it is open to the Netherlands sickness insurance funds to enter into agreements with hospital establishments outside the Netherlands. In such a case no prior authorisation would be required in order for the cost of treatment provided by such establishments to be assumed under the ZFW. However, with the exception of hospitals situated in regions adjoining the Netherlands, it seems unlikely that a significant number of hospitals in other member states would ever enter into agreements with those sickness insurance funds, given that their prospects of admitting patients insured by those funds remain uncertain and limited (see Geraets-Smits' case (paras 65, 66)). c d

44. The court has therefore already held that rules such as those at issue in the main proceedings deter, or even prevent, insured persons from applying to providers of medical services established in member states other than that of the insurance fund and constitute, both for insured persons and service providers, a barrier to freedom to provide services (see Geraets-Smits' case (para 69)). e

45. However, before coming to a decision on whether arts 59 and 60 of the Treaty preclude rules such as those at issue in the main actions, it is appropriate to determine whether those rules can be objectively justified, which is the subject of the second question. f

THE SECOND AND THIRD QUESTIONS

46. By its second and third questions, which it is appropriate to examine together, the referring court is asking whether legislation such as that at issue in the main proceedings, which has restrictive effects on freedom to provide services, can be justified by the actual particular features of the national sickness insurance scheme, which provides not for reimbursement of costs incurred but essentially for benefits in kind and is based on a system of agreements intended both to ensure the quality of the care and to control the costs thereof. It also wishes to know whether the fact that the treatment at issue is provided in whole or in part in a hospital environment has any effect in that regard. g h

The arguments submitted to the court

47. In the submission of the Netherlands government and the Zwijsdrecht Fund, the authorisation required by art 9(4) of the ZFW is an integral part of the Netherlands sickness insurance scheme. Sickness cover by way of benefits in kind, as provided by that scheme, necessitates the prior conclusion, between the fund and care providers, of agreements dealing with the volume, quality, effectiveness and costs of health care in order, first, to allow for needs-based planning and expenditure control and, second, to ensure that a high-quality i a medical service is provided, that benefits are comparable and thus that insured persons are treated equally. A system of agreements of that kind is in the main advantageous to the insured.

48. In those circumstances, insured persons must apply to contracted care providers alone or, if they none the less wish to be treated by a non-contracted doctor or establishment established in the Netherlands or abroad, obtain prior authorisation from the sickness insurance scheme to which they belong.

b 49. The Netherlands government and the Zwijsdrecht Fund add that, if there were no requirement for prior authorisation, it would never be in the interest of care providers to participate in the system of agreements by becoming subject to contractual clauses dealing with the availability, volume, quality, effectiveness and cost of services, with the result that the authorities managing the sickness insurance scheme would be unable to make any needs-related plans by adjusting expenditure to needs and to ensure that a high-quality medical service was open to all. The system of agreements would thus lose its raison d'être as a means of managing health care, which would prejudice the sovereign power of the member states, recognised by the court's case law, to organise their social security systems. The Netherlands government explains in that connection that there are waiting lists because of the limited financial resources available for health-care cover and that this gives rise to a need to quantify the benefits to be provided and to make them subject to priorities which must be strictly observed.

e 50. Furthermore, the Netherlands sickness funds cannot be forced to conclude agreements with a greater number of care providers than is necessary to meet the needs of people living in the Netherlands. The Netherlands government points out that it is specifically to meet those needs that most of the agreements are entered into with care providers established in the Netherlands since demand from the insured is clearly greatest within the national territory.

f 51. Finally, as regards the way in which it is appropriate to determine whether 'the same or equally effective treatment can be obtained without undue delay', in the words of para 103 of Geraets-Smits' case, the Zwijsdrecht Fund submits that the mere fact of a person being on a waiting list does not mean that such treatment is not available. If it were to adopt a different interpretation, the court would significantly extend the conditions in which benefits are awarded, which are a matter of national competence. Moreover, it would cast uncertainty over all attempted planning and rationalisation in the health-care sector aimed at avoiding over-capacity, supply-side imbalance, wastage and loss.

h 52. The Netherlands government argues, in that regard, that it is quite apparent from para 103 of Geraets-Smits' case that the period within which medical treatment is necessary is to be determined by reference to the patient's medical condition and history. It is the national court's responsibility to ascertain whether the treatment is available within that period, which amounts to a factual assessment.

i 53. The Danish, German, Spanish, Irish, Italian, Swedish and United Kingdom governments, together with the Icelandic and Norwegian governments, generally endorse the foregoing observations.

54. In particular, the Spanish government maintains that any distinction between treatment provided by a practitioner and treatment provided in a hospital is unnecessary where a sickness insurance scheme provides exclusively benefits in kind. If an insured person is given health care or purchases a medicinal product in a member state other than that in which his insurance fund is established, the duties and taxes paid by providers or suppliers are not paid into the budget of the member state of affiliation, which adversely affects one of the sources of financing of social security in that state. a

55. The Irish and United Kingdom governments submit that if insured persons were entitled to go to a member state other than that in which they are insured in order to receive treatment there, there would be adverse consequences for the setting of priorities for medical treatment and the management of waiting lists, which are significant aspects of the organisation of sickness insurance. In that regard, the United Kingdom government points out that the finite financial resources allocated to the National Health Service (the NHS) are managed by local health authorities which establish timetables based on clinical judgments and medically determined priorities for different treatments. Patients do not have the right to demand a certain timetable for their hospital treatment. It follows that if patients could shorten their waiting time by obtaining, without prior authorisation, medical treatment in other member states for which the competent fund was none the less obliged to assume the cost, the financial balance of the system would be threatened and the resources available for more urgent treatment would be severely depleted, thereby placing at risk its ability to provide adequate levels of health care. b c d

56. The United Kingdom government adds that if hospital services were to be liberalised, its own hospitals would be unable to predict either the loss of demand that would follow from recourse being had to hospital treatment in other member states or the increase in demand that would follow from persons insured in those other states being able to seek hospital treatment in the United Kingdom. Those effects of liberalisation would not necessarily offset each other and the impact would be different for every hospital in the United Kingdom. e

57. As regards the criteria by which it should be ascertained whether treatment which is the same or equally effective for the patient could be obtained without undue delay in the member state in which the person is insured, the United Kingdom government, like the Swedish government, refers to art 22(2), second paragraph, of Regulation 1408/71, in conjunction with art 22(1)(c), from which it is apparent that the person concerned may not be refused the authorisation required to go to the territory of another member state to receive there the treatment where, taking account of his current state of health and the probable course of the disease, he cannot be given the treatment within the time normally necessary in the member state of residence. There is also a reference to the way in which those provisions were interpreted in para 10 of the judgment in Bestuur van het Algemeen Ziekenfonds Drenthe-Platteland v Pierik Case 182/78 [1979] ECR 1977. f g

58. In that regard the United Kingdom government draws attention to the fact that in practice authorisation for treatment in another member state is generally given in the United Kingdom when there is a delay for treatment beyond the maximum waiting times. National waiting lists take account of the different needs of different categories of patients and permit the best possible allocation of hospital resources. The lists are flexible so that if a patient's condition suddenly deteriorates, he can be moved up the waiting list and treated more quickly. To compel the competent authorities to authorise treatment abroad in circumstances other than where there is a delay beyond the normal waiting time and to pass the cost on to the NHS would have damaging consequences for its management and financial viability. h i a 59. In any event, the United Kingdom government points to the specific characteristics of the NHS and asks the court to uphold the principle that health care provided under such a national sickness insurance scheme does not fall within the scope of art 60 of the Treaty and that the NHS, which is a non-profit-making body, is not a service provider for the purposes of the Treaty.

b 60. The Danish government argues that there would be a risk of excessive consumption of medical services if patients had unrestricted access to free medical care in member states other than that in which the insured's sickness insurance fund is established and also a risk, in the event of numerous journeys abroad for medical purposes, of it not being possible to maintain the competence of doctors established in national territories at an adequate level as regards unusual and complex diseases.

c 61. The Belgian government submits that the specific nature of the Netherlands scheme, in providing not for reimbursement of costs incurred but for benefits in kind, does not amount per se to a general-interest reason justifying a restriction on freedom to provide services. It submits that it is appropriate to draw a distinction between services supplied elsewhere than in a hospital and those supplied in a hospital.

d 62. In the first case, there is no justification for any restriction on freedom to provide services, as can be seen from the judgment in Kohll's case. However, in the second case, there are sound reasons, linked to protecting the financial balance of the social security system and to maintaining a balanced medical and hospital service open to all, which justify requiring prior authorisation when services are to be provided in a hospital environment in a member state other than that in which the insured's sickness insurance fund is established. Furthermore, in the absence of prior authorisation, the member states with waiting lists for hospital treatment might have a tendency to send their nationals abroad for treatment instead of investing in their own infrastructure, thereby thwarting the other member states' attempted hospital-related planning.

e 63. The Commission distinguishes between care provided in a surgery, which it places on the same footing as out-patient treatment within a hospital environment, and hospital treatment as such. As regards the first category, the analysis in the judgments in Decker v Caisse de Maladie des Employés Privés Case C-120/95 [1998] All ER (EC) 673, [1998] ECR I-1831 and Kohll's case should be upheld, by regarding the requirement for prior authorisation as incompatible with Community law, except in the case of certain services, dental work in particular, which are extremely costly and specialised. As to the second category of care, provided in a hospital environment, reference should be made to the analysis in the judgment in Geraets-Smits' case, and whilst it should be recognised that the requirement for prior authorisation is justified by planning needs, refusal of authorisation should none the less be subject to the limits set by the court in that judgment.

f 64. As to the interpretation of the words 'without undue delay' employed in para 103 of the judgment in Geraets-Smits' case, the Commission submits that only the patient's medical condition should be taken into account, as is clear from para 104 of the judgment.

g 65. Finally, the Norwegian government argues that the conditions on which benefits are granted and the periods within which they can be given are a matter solely for national legislation. Community law cannot confer on patients the right to receive, in a member state other than that in which the persons concerned are insured, health care to which they are not entitled in their own member state. Nor can it entitle them to receive treatment within a shorter time limit than that provided for by national legislation. If it did so, it would prejudice the member state's power to organise their social security systems and would go beyond the scope of the Treaty provisions on freedom to provide services. a

66. It is clear from the documents before the court that the reasons put forward to justify the requirement for prior authorisation where sickness insurance is to cover benefits provided in a member state other than that in which the person concerned is insured, whether within a hospital environment or not, are linked (i) to the protection of public health inasmuch as the system of agreements is intended to ensure that there is a high-quality, balanced medical and hospital service open to all, (ii) to the financial balance of the social security system in that a system of that kind also permits the managing authorities to control expenditure by adjusting it to projected requirements, according to pre-established priorities, and (iii) to the essential characteristics of the sickness insurance scheme in the Netherlands, which provides benefits in kind. b

The risk that the protection of public health may be adversely affected

67. It is apparent from the court's case law that the objective of maintaining a high-quality, balanced medical and hospital service open to all, may fall within one of the derogations provided for in art 56 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, art 46 EC), in so far as it contributes to the attainment of a high level of health protection (see Kohll's case (para 50) and Geraets-Smits' case (para 73)). In particular, that Treaty provision permits member states to restrict the freedom to provide medical and hospital services in so far as the maintenance of treatment capacity or medical competence on national territory is essential for public health, and even the survival of the population (see Kohll's case (para 51) and Geraets-Smits' case (para 74)). c

68. However, it is settled case law that it is necessary, where justification is based on an exception laid down by the Treaty or indeed on an overriding general-interest reason, to ensure that the measures taken in that respect do not exceed what is objectively necessary for that purpose and that the same result cannot be achieved by less restrictive rules (see EC Commission v Germany Case 205/84 [1986] ECR 3755 (paras 27, 29), EC Commission v Italy Case C-180/89 [1991] ECR I-709 (paras 17, 18), Ramrath v Ministre de la Justice Case C-106/91 [1992] ECR I-3351 (paras 30, 31) and Geraets-Smits' case (para 75)). d

69. In this instance the arguments put forward to justify the requirement for prior authorisation seek to establish that, if it were open to patients to get treatment in a member state other than that in which they are insured, without prior authorisation to that effect, the competent state could no longer guarantee that in its territory there would be a high-quality, balanced medical and hospital service open to all and hence a high level of public health protection. e

70. As to the Danish government's argument that the actual competence of practitioners, working in surgeries or in a hospital environment, would be undermined because of numerous journeys abroad for medical purposes, the court finds that no specific evidence has been adduced in support of this argument. f

- a 71. The objective of maintaining a balanced medical and hospital service open to all is inextricably linked to the way in which the social security system is financed and to the control of expenditure, which are dealt with below.

The risk of seriously undermining the financial balance of the social security system

- b 72. It must be recalled, at the outset, that, according to the court's case law, aims of a purely economic nature cannot justify a barrier to the fundamental principle of freedom to provide services (see, to that effect, Syndesmos ton en Elladi Touristikou kai Taxidiotikon Grafeion v Ergasias Case C-398/95 [1997] ECR I-3091 (para 23) and Kohll's case (para 41)).

- c 73. However, in so far as, in particular, it could have consequences for the overall level of public-health protection, the risk of seriously undermining the financial balance of the social security system may also constitute per se an overriding general-interest reason capable of justifying a barrier of that kind (see Kohll's case (para 41) and Geraets-Smits' case (para 72)).

- d 74. It is self-evident that assuming the cost of one isolated case of treatment, carried out in a member state other than that in which a particular person is insured with a sickness fund, can never make any significant impact on the financing of the social security system. Thus an overall approach must necessarily be adopted in relation to the consequences of freedom to provide health-related services.

- e 75. In that regard, the distinction between hospital services and non-hospital services may sometimes prove difficult to draw. In particular, certain services provided in a hospital environment but also capable of being provided by a practitioner in his surgery or in a health centre could for that reason be placed on the same footing as non-hospital services. However, in the main actions, the fact that the care at issue is partly hospital treatment and partly non-hospital treatment has not given rise to disagreement between the parties to the main proceedings or on the part of the member states which have submitted observations under art 23 of the EC Statute of the Court of Justice or the Commission.

Hospital services

- g 76. As regards hospital services, such as those provided to Ms van Riet in Deurne hospital, the court, in paras 76 to 80 of the judgment in Geraets-Smits' case, made the following findings.

- h 77. It is well known that the number of hospitals, their geographical distribution, the way in which they are organised and the facilities with which they are provided, and even the nature of the medical services which they are able to offer, are all matters for which planning must be possible.

- h 78. As may be seen, in particular, from the system of agreements involved in the main actions this kind of planning generally meets a variety of concerns.

79. For one thing, it seeks to achieve the aim of ensuring that there is sufficient and permanent accessibility to a balanced range of high-quality hospital treatment in the state concerned.

- i 80. For another thing, it assists in meeting a desire to control costs and to prevent, as far as possible, any wastage of financial, technical and human resources. Such wastage would be all the more damaging because it is generally recognised that the hospital care sector generates considerable costs and must satisfy increasing needs, while the financial resources which may be made available for health care are not unlimited, whatever the mode of funding applied.

81. In those circumstances, a requirement that the assumption of costs, under a national social security system, of hospital treatment provided in a member state other than that of affiliation must be subject to prior authorisation appears to be a measure which is both necessary and reasonable. a

82. As regards specifically the system set up by the ZFW, the court clearly acknowledged that, if insured persons were at liberty, regardless of the circumstances, to use the services of hospitals with which their sickness insurance fund had no agreement, whether those hospitals were situated in the Netherlands or in another member state, all the planning which goes into the system of agreements in an effort to guarantee a rationalised, stable, balanced and accessible supply of hospital services would be jeopardised at a stroke (see Geraets-Smits' case (para 81)). b

83. Although Community law does not therefore in principle preclude a system of prior authorisation for this category of services, the conditions attached to the grant of such authorisation must none the less be justified in the light of the overriding considerations mentioned above and must satisfy the requirement of proportionality referred to in para 68 above. c

84. It likewise follows from settled case law that a scheme of prior administrative authorisation cannot legitimise discretionary decisions taken by the national authorities, which are liable to negate the effectiveness of provisions of Community law, in particular those relating to a fundamental freedom such as that at issue in the main proceedings (see Ministerio Fiscal v Bordessa, Ministerio Fiscal v Mellado Joined cases C-358/93 and C-416/93 [1995] All ER (EC) 385, [1995] ECR I-361 (para 25), Criminal proceedings against Sanz de Lera Joined cases C-163/94, C-165/94 and C-250/94 [1995] ECR I-4821 (paras 23–28) and Asociación Profesional de Empresas Navieras de Líneas Regulares (Analir) v Administración General del Estado Case C-205/99 [2001] ECR I-1271 (para 37)). d

85. Thus, in order for a prior administrative authorisation scheme to be justified even though it derogates from a fundamental freedom of that kind, it must be based on objective, non-discriminatory criteria which are known in advance, in such a way as to circumscribe the exercise of the national authorities' discretion, so that it is not used arbitrarily (see the Analir case (para 38)). Such a prior administrative authorisation scheme must likewise be based on a procedural system which is easily accessible and capable of ensuring that a request for authorisation will be dealt with objectively and impartially within a reasonable time and refusals to grant authorisation must also be capable of being challenged in judicial or quasi-judicial proceedings (see Geraets-Smits' case (para 90)). e

86. In the main actions, the disputes do not concern the actual cover provided by the Netherlands sickness insurance scheme for the medical and hospital treatment with which Ms Müller-Fauré and Ms van Riet were provided. In those actions, what is disputed is whether it was a medical necessity for them to have the treatment at issue in Germany and Belgium respectively, rather than in the Netherlands. In that regard, in paras 99 to 107 of Geraets-Smits' case, the court also ruled on that condition concerning the necessity of the proposed treatment, to which the grant of authorisation is subject. f

87. As the national court states, it follows from the wording of art 9(4) of the ZFW and art 1 of the Rhbz that in principle that condition applies irrespective of whether the request for authorisation relates to treatment in an g a establishment located in the Netherlands with which the insured person's sickness insurance fund has no agreement or in an establishment located in another member state.

b 88. As regards hospital treatment carried out outside the Netherlands, the national court states that the condition concerning the necessity of the treatment is in practice interpreted as meaning that such treatment is not to be authorised unless it appears that appropriate treatment cannot be provided without undue delay in the Netherlands. The Netherlands government explains that if art 9(4) of the ZFW is read in conjunction with art 1 of the Rhbz, authorisation must be refused solely where the care required by the insured person's state of health is available from contracted care providers.

c 89. The condition concerning the necessity of the treatment, laid down by the legislation at issue in the main proceedings, can be justified under art 59 of the Treaty, provided that the condition is construed to the effect that authorisation to receive treatment in another member state may be refused on that ground only if treatment which is the same or equally effective for the patient can be obtained without undue delay from an establishment with

e 90. In order to determine whether treatment which is equally effective for the patient can be obtained without undue delay in an establishment having an agreement with the insured person's fund, the national authorities are required to have regard to all the circumstances of each specific case and to take due f account not only of the patient's medical condition at the time when authorisation is sought and, where appropriate, of the degree of pain or the nature of the patient's disability which might, for example, make it impossible or extremely difficult for him to carry out a professional activity, but also of his medical history (see, to that effect, Geraets-Smits' case (para 104)).

f 91. The court also stated, at paras 105 and 106 of Geraets-Smits' case, that:
—thus construed, the condition concerning the necessity of treatment can allow an adequate, balanced and permanent supply of high-quality hospital treatment to be maintained on the national territory and the financial stability of the sickness insurance system to be assured;

g —were large numbers of insured persons to decide to be treated in other member states even when the hospitals having agreements with their sickness insurance funds offer adequate identical or equivalent treatment, the consequent outflow of patients would be liable to put at risk the very principle of having agreements with hospitals and, consequently, undermine all the planning and rationalisation carried out in this vital sector in an effort to avoid the phenomena of hospital over capacity, imbalance in the supply of hospital
h medical care and logistical and financial wastage.

i 92. However, a refusal to grant prior authorisation which is based not on fear of wastage resulting from hospital overcapacity but solely on the ground that there are waiting lists on national territory for the hospital treatment concerned, without account being taken of the specific circumstances attaching to the patient's medical condition, cannot amount to a properly justified restriction on freedom to provide services. It is not clear from the arguments submitted to the court that such waiting times are necessary, apart from considerations of a purely economic nature which cannot as such justify a restriction on the fundamental principle of freedom to provide services, for the purpose of safeguarding the protection of public health. On the contrary, a waiting time which is too long or abnormal would be more likely to restrict access to balanced, high-quality hospital care. a

93. As regards non-hospital medical services such as those supplied to Ms Müller-Fauré and, in part, to Ms van Riet, no specific evidence has been produced to the court, not even by the Zwijndrecht and Amsterdam Funds or the Netherlands government, to support the assertion that, were insured persons at liberty to go without prior authorisation to member states other than those in which their sickness funds are established in order to obtain those services from a non-contracted provider, that would be likely seriously to undermine the financial balance of the Netherlands social security system. b

94. It is true that removal of the condition that there should be a system of agreements in respect of services supplied abroad adversely affects the ways in which health-care expenditure may be controlled in the member state of affiliation. c

95. However, the documents before the court do not indicate that removal of the requirement for prior authorisation for that type of care would give rise to patients travelling to other countries in such large numbers, despite linguistic barriers, geographic distance, the cost of staying abroad and lack of information about the kind of care provided there, that the financial balance of the Netherlands social security system would be seriously upset and that, as a result, the overall level of public-health protection would be jeopardised—which might constitute proper justification for a barrier to the fundamental principle of freedom to provide services. d

96. Furthermore, care is generally provided near to the place where the patient resides, in a cultural environment which is familiar to him and which allows him to build up a relationship of trust with the doctor treating him. If emergencies are disregarded, the most obvious cases of patients travelling abroad are in border areas or where specific conditions are to be treated. Furthermore, it is specifically in those areas or in respect of those conditions that the Netherlands sickness funds tend to set up a system of agreements with foreign doctors, as the observations submitted to the court reveal. e

97. Those various factors seem likely to limit any financial impact on the Netherlands social security system of removal of the requirement for prior authorisation in respect of care provided in foreign practitioners' surgeries. f

98. In any event, it should be borne in mind that it is for the member states alone to determine the extent of the sickness cover available to insured persons, so that, when the insured go without prior authorisation to a member state other than that in which their sickness fund is established to receive treatment there, they can claim reimbursement of the cost of the treatment given to them only within the limits of the cover provided by the sickness insurance scheme in the member state of affiliation. g

99. The Zwijndrecht Fund and the Netherlands, Spanish and Norwegian governments have drawn attention to the fact that member states are free to set up the social security system of their choice. In this instance, in the absence of prior authorisation, insured persons could apply freely to non-contracted care providers with the result that the existence of the Netherlands system of benefits in kind, the operation of which is in essence dependent upon the h

- a system of agreements, would be jeopardised. Furthermore, the Netherlands authorities would be obliged to introduce mechanisms for reimbursement into their method of organising access to health care since, instead of receiving free health services on national territory, the insured would have to advance the sums needed to pay for the services received and wait for some time before being reimbursed. Thus, member states would be obliged to abandon the principles and underlying logic of their sickness insurance schemes.

100. In that regard it follows from settled case law that Community law does not detract from the power of the member states to organise their social security systems (see, in particular, Duphar BV v Netherlands Case 238/82 [1984] ECR 523 (para 16) and Sodemare SA v Regione Lombardia Case C-70/95 [1997] ECR I-3395 (para 27)). Therefore, in the absence of harmonisation at Community level, it is for the legislation of each member state to determine the conditions on which social security benefits are granted (see, in particular, Coonan v Insurance Officer Case 110/79 [1980] ECR 1445 (para 12), Paraschi v Landesversicherungsanstalt Württemberg Case C-349/87 [1991] ECR I-4501 (para 15) and Stöber v Bundesanstalt für Arbeit Joined cases C-4/95 and 5/95 [1997] ECR I-511 (para 36)). However, it is nevertheless the case that the member states must comply with Community law when exercising that power (see Decker's case (para 23) and Kohll's case (para 19)).

101. Two preliminary observations must be made on this point.

102. First, achievement of the fundamental freedoms guaranteed by the Treaty inevitably requires member states to make some adjustments to their national systems of social security. It does not follow that this would undermine their sovereign powers in this field. It is sufficient in this regard to look to the adjustments which they have had to make to their social security legislation in order to comply with Regulation 1408/71, in particular with the conditions laid down in art 69 thereof regarding the payment of unemployment benefit to workers residing in the territory of other member states when no national system provided for the grant of such benefits to unemployed persons registered with an employment agency in another member state.

103. Second, as has already been made clear in para 39, above, a medical service does not cease to be a provision of services because it is paid for by a national health service or by a system providing benefits in kind. The court has, in particular, held that a medical service provided in one member state and paid for by the patient cannot cease to fall within the scope of the freedom to provide services guaranteed by the Treaty merely because reimbursement of the costs of the treatment involved is applied for under another member state's sickness insurance legislation which is essentially of the type which provides for benefits in kind (see Geraets-Smits' case (para 55)). The requirement for prior authorisation where a person is subsequently to be reimbursed for the costs of that treatment is precisely what constitutes, as has already been stated in para 44, above, the barrier to freedom to provide services, that is to say, to a patient's ability to go to the medical service provider of his choice in a member state other than that of affiliation. There is thus no need, from the perspective of freedom to provide services, to draw a distinction by reference to whether the patient pays the costs incurred and subsequently applies for reimbursement thereof or whether the sickness fund or the national budget pays the provider directly.

104. It is in the light of those observations that it is appropriate to determine whether removal of the requirement for sickness insurance funds to grant prior authorisation for non-hospital health care provided in a member state other than that of affiliation, is such as to call in question the essential characteristics of the system of access to health care in the Netherlands. a

105. First, when applying Regulation 1408/71, those member states which have established a system providing benefits in kind, or even a national health service, must provide mechanisms for ex post facto reimbursement in respect of care provided in a member state other than the competent state. That is the case, for example, where it has not been possible to complete the formalities during the relevant person's stay in that state (see art 34 of Council Regulation (EEC) 574/72 (fixing the procedure for implementing Regulation 1408/71) (OJ English Sp Edn 1972 (I) p 159)) or where the competent state has authorised access to treatment abroad in accordance with art 22(1)(c) of Regulation 1408/71. b

106. Second, as has already been stated in para 98 above, insured persons who go without prior authorisation to a member state other than the one in which their sickness fund is established to receive treatment there can claim reimbursement of the cost of the treatment received only within the limits of the cover provided by the sickness insurance scheme of the member state of affiliation. Thus, in the present case, it is apparent from the documents before the court that, in relation to the €3,806.35 paid by Ms Müller-Fauré to a provider established in Germany, the Zwijndrecht Fund would in any event, given the extent of the insurance cover provided by the fund, contribute only up to a maximum amount of €221.03. Likewise, the conditions on which benefits are granted, in so far as they are neither discriminatory nor an obstacle to freedom of movement of persons, remain enforceable where treatment is provided in a member state other than that of affiliation. That is particularly so in the case of the requirement that a general practitioner should be consulted prior to consulting a specialist. d

107. Third, nothing precludes a competent member state with a benefits in kind system from fixing the amounts of reimbursement which patients who have received care in another member state can claim, provided that those amounts are based on objective, non-discriminatory and transparent criteria. f

108. Consequently, the evidence and arguments submitted to the court do not show that removal of the requirement that sickness insurance funds grant prior authorisation to their insured to enable them to receive health care, in particular other than in a hospital, provided in a member state other than that of affiliation would undermine the essential characteristics of the Netherlands sickness insurance scheme. g

109. In the light of all the foregoing considerations, the answer to the questions must be that:

Articles 59 and 60 of the Treaty must be interpreted as not precluding legislation of a member state, such as that at issue in the main proceedings, which (i) makes the assumption of the costs of hospital care provided in a member state other than that in which the insured person's sickness fund is established, by a provider with which that fund has not concluded an agreement, conditional upon prior authorisation by the fund and (ii) makes the grant of that authorisation subject to the condition that such action is necessary for the insured person's health care. However, authorisation may be refused on that ground only if treatment which is the same or equally effective for the patient can be obtained without undue delay in an establishment which has concluded an agreement with the fund; h

- a* —by contrast, arts 59 and 60 of the Treaty do preclude the same legislation in so far as it makes the assumption of the costs of non-hospital care provided in another member state by a person or establishment with whom or which the insured person's sickness fund has not concluded an agreement conditional upon prior authorisation by the fund, even when the national legislation concerned sets up a system of benefits in kind under which insured persons are entitled not to reimbursement of costs incurred for medical treatment, but to the treatment itself which is provided free of charge.

COSTS

- c* 110. The costs incurred by the Netherlands, Belgian, Danish, German, Spanish, Irish, Italian, Finnish, Swedish, United Kingdom, Icelandic and Norwegian governments and by the Commission, which have submitted observations to the court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the actions pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court.

- d* On those grounds, the Court of Justice, in answer to the questions referred to it by the Centrale Raad van Beroep by order of 6 October 1999, hereby rules:

- e* Article 59 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, art 49 EC) and art 60 of the EC Treaty (now art 50 EC) must be interpreted as not precluding legislation of a member state, such as that at issue in the main proceedings, which (i) makes the assumption of the costs of hospital care provided in a member state other than that in which the insured person's sickness fund is established, by a provider with which that fund has not concluded an agreement, conditional upon prior authorisation by the fund and (ii) makes the grant of that authorisation subject to the condition that such action is necessary for the insured person's health care. However, authorisation may be refused on that ground only if treatment which is the same or equally effective for the patient can be obtained without undue delay in an establishment which has concluded an agreement with the fund;
- f*

- g* —by contrast, arts 59 and 60 of the Treaty do preclude the same legislation in so far as it makes the assumption of the costs of non-hospital care provided in another member state by a person or establishment with whom or which the insured person's sickness fund has not concluded an agreement conditional upon prior authorisation by the fund, even when the national legislation concerned sets up a system of benefits in kind under which insured persons are entitled not to reimbursement of costs incurred for medical treatment, but to the treatment itself which is provided free of charge.

COURT OF JUSTICE OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES (SIXTH CHAMBER)

JUDGES PUISOCHET (PRESIDENT OF CHAMBER), GULMANN (RAPPORTEUR), MACKEN, COLNERIC AND CUNHA RODRIGUES
ADVOCATE GENERAL JACOBS

10 OCTOBER, 12 DECEMBER 2002, 8 MAY 2003

European Community – Freedom of movement – Goods – Medicinal products – Marketing authorisation – Parallel imports – Marketing authorisation withdrawn at holder's request – Whether automatic cessation of parallel import licence granted for same medicinal product precluded by principle of free movement of goods – Articles 28, 30 EC (EC Treaty, arts 30, 36).

The competent Swedish authorities withdrew a marketing authorisation for a medicinal product in capsule form used to treat conditions caused by stomach acid. That withdrawal had been made at the request of the holder of the authorisation on the basis that it intended to sell a new variant of the product in tablet form. The two versions of the product were therapeutic equivalents, but each product contained a different active ingredient, which in the tablet form of the product dissolved more easily in water and was more stable, and was thus easier to manufacture than was the product in capsule form. The competent national authorities also decided that that marketing authorisations for parallel imports of the capsule form of the product (which continued to be sold in other member states under the marketing authorisations granted therein) would expire at the same time, since the two forms of the product had to be considered as being distinct medicinal products, and since the product in the capsule form would otherwise be put on the market without having met the requisite safety requirements. Proceedings arose concerning that decision and, in due course, the national court decided to stay the proceedings and refer to the Court of Justice of the European Communities certain questions for preliminary pursuant to art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) concerning whether it was compatible with arts 28<sup>a</sup> and 30 EC<sup>b</sup> (formerly arts 30 and 36 of the EC Treaty) to revoke a marketing authorisation for a medicinal product imported as a parallel import on the ground that the

<sup>b</sup> Article 30 EC, so far as material, provides: 'The provisions of Articles 28 ... shall not preclude prohibitions or restrictions on imports, exports or goods in transit justified on grounds ... the protection of health and life of humans ... Such prohibitions or restrictions shall not, however, constitute a means of arbitrary discrimination or a disguised restriction on trade between Member States.'

- a* marketing authorisation for the directly imported product had been revoked at the request of the holder of the authorisation for reasons unconnected with the safety of the medicinal product.

- Held – Articles 28 and 30 EC precluded the automatic cessation of a parallel import licence granted for a medicinal product after the marketing authorisation for the directly imported product had been withdrawn at the request of its holder, unless there was in fact a risk to the health of humans as a result of the continued existence of that medicinal product on the market of the importing member state. It had to be observed that the withdrawal of a marketing authorisation of reference did not mean in itself that the efficacy and non-toxicity of the old version of a product was called into question.
- c* Although the competent authorities of the member state of importation had to adopt the measures necessary to verify the quality, efficacy and non-toxicity of the old version of the product, that objective might be attained by measures having a less restrictive effect on the import of medicinal products than the automatic cessation of the validity of the parallel import licence. In that regard, pharmacovigilance might ordinarily be guaranteed for medicinal products that were the subject of parallel imports through cooperation with the national authorities of the other member states by means of access to documents and data produced by the manufacturer, relating the old version of the product in the member state in which the version was marketed on the basis of a marketing authorisation. However, reasons relating to the protection of public health which might justify the automatic withdrawal of a parallel licence were not precluded and might arise from the coexistence of two versions of the same medicinal product on the market of the importing state (see judgment paras 26–28, 32, below).

By order of 21 December 2000, the Regeringsrätten (Supreme Administrative Court, Sweden) referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty)

two questions (set out in first judgment para 19, below) on the interpretation of arts 28 and 30 EC (formerly arts 30, 36 of the EC Treaty). Those questions were raised in proceedings brought by Paranova Läkemedel AB, Farmagon A/S, Medartuum AB, Net Pharma KG AB, Orifarm AB, Trans Euro Medical AB, Cross Pharma AB and MedImport Scandinavia AB (Paranova and others) against the Läkemedelsverket (Swedish Medical Products Agency) concerning the consequences of the withdrawal of a marketing authorisation on the parallel import into Sweden by Paranova and others of a medicinal product. Written observations were submitted on behalf of: Paranova Läkemedel AB, Farmagon A/S, Medartuum AB, Net Pharma KG AB, Orifarm AB, Trans Euro Medical AB, Cross Pharma AB and MedImport Scandinavia AB by U Rutgersson Langenius, Advokat; the Läkemedelsverket by A Åslundh-Nilsson and B Lindström, acting as agents; the Swedish government by A Kruse, acting as agent; the Danish government by J Molde, acting as agent; the Netherlands government by HG Sevenster, acting as agent; the Norwegian government by T Nordby, acting as agent; and the Commission of the European Communities by L Ström, acting as agent. Oral observations were made on behalf of: Paranova Läkemedel AB, Farmagon A/S, Medartuum AB, Net Pharma KG AB, Orifarm AB, Trans Euro Medical AB, Cross Pharma AB and MedImport Scandinavia AB, represented by C Bus, Advokat; the Läkemedelsverket and of the Swedish government, represented by A Kruse; the Danish government, represented by J Molde; the Netherlands government, represented by J van Bakel, acting as agent; the Norwegian government, represented by T Nordby; and the Commission, represented by L Ström. The language of the case was Swedish. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General.

By order of 8 March 2001, the Högsta förvaltningsdomstolen (Supreme Administrative Court, Finland) referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) three questions (set out in second judgment para 20, below) on the interpretation of arts 28 and 30 EC (formerly arts 30, 36 of the EC Treaty). Those questions were raised in proceedings between Paranova Oy (Paranova) and the Läkemedelsverket (Finnish Medical Products Agency) concerning the consequences of the withdrawal of a marketing authorisation on the parallel import into Finland by Paranova of a medicinal product. Written observations submitted on behalf of: the Finnish government by E Bygglin, acting as agent; the Danish government by J Molde, acting as agent; the Netherlands government by HG Sevenster, acting as agent; the Norwegian government by T Nordby, acting as agent; the Commission of the European Communities by L Ström, acting as agent. Oral observations were made on behalf of: the Finnish government, represented by E Bygglin; the Danish government, represented by J Molde; the Netherlands government, represented by J Bakel, acting as agent; the Norwegian government, represented by T Nordby; and the Commission, represented by L Ström. The language of the case was Swedish. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General.

b 1. These cases raise a number of questions concerning the consequences for a parallel importer of medicinal products benefiting from a marketing authorisation in the member state of import where that authorisation is withdrawn at the request of the company holding it.

c THE COMMUNITY LEGAL CONTEXT

3. The marketing of medicinal products in the Community was at the material time<sup>2</sup> principally governed by Council Directive (EEC) 65/65 (on the approximation of provisions laid down by law, regulation or administrative action relating to medicinal products)<sup>3</sup>.

d 4. Article 3 of Directive 65/65 provides that no medicinal product may be placed on the market of a member state unless a marketing authorisation has been issued by the competent authorities of that member state or an authorisation has been granted in accordance with Council Regulation (EEC) 2309/93<sup>4</sup>.

e 5. Article 4 of Directive 65/65 defines in detail the procedure, documents and information necessary for the issue of a marketing authorisation by the competent authority of a member state.

6. It is clear from the case law of the court that parallel imports of medicinal products are not covered by Directive 65/65. That case law was recently summarised by the Court of Justice of the European Communities in Ferring Arzneimittel GmbH v Eurim Pharm Arzneimittel GmbH<sup>5</sup> as follows:

f 'According to the principles laid down in Directive 65/65, no medicinal product may be placed on the market for the first time in a Member State unless a marketing authorisation has been issued in accordance with the directive by the competent authority of that State. Applications for marketing authorisations for a medicinal product submitted by the person responsible for placing it on the market must contain the information and be accompanied by the documents listed in Article 4 of the directive, even where the medicinal product concerned is already the subject of an authorisation issued by the competent authority of another Member State'

2 The legislation has with effect from 18 December 2001 been codified and consolidated in EP and Council Directive (EC) 2001/83 (on the Community code relating to medicinal products for human use) (OJ 2001 L311 p 67). However, the relevant provisions have not been amended in their substance.

i 4 Laying down Community procedures for the authorisation and supervision of medicinal products for human and veterinary use and establishing a European Agency for the Evaluation of Medicinal Products (OJ 1993 L214 p 1). Community-wide marketing authorisations are not at issue in the present cases.

5 Case C-172/00 [2002] ECR I-6891 (paras 19–22), judgment delivered on 10 September 2002; see also the extremely helpful discussion of the Community regulation of parallel imports of medicinal products in the opinion in that case of Advocate General Geelhoed delivered on 7 February 2002.

[R v Medicines Control Agency, ex p Rhône-Poulenc Rorer Ltd Case C-94/98 [2000] All ER (EC) 46, [1999] ECR I-8789 (para 23)]. a

However, those principles are subject to exceptions resulting, on the one hand, from the directive itself and, on the other, from the rules of the EC Treaty relating to the free movement of goods.

Those rules, as interpreted by the court, mean in particular that an operator who has bought a medicinal product lawfully marketed in one Member State under a marketing authorisation issued in that State can import that medicinal product into another Member State where it already has a marketing authorisation without having to obtain such an authorisation in accordance with Directive 65/65, and without having to provide information about the verification, prescribed by the directive, of efficacy and non-toxicity of the medicinal product. It is not necessary for the protection of public health to subject parallel importers to such requirements, as the competent authorities of the Member State of importation already have all the information necessary to carry out that verification (see in particular [Criminal proceedings against de Peijper Case 104/75 [1976] ECR 613 (paras 21, 36), and R v Medicines Control Agency, ex p Smith & Nephew Pharmaceuticals Ltd Case C-201/94 (1996) 34 BMLR 141, [1996] ECR I-5819 (para 22)]). b

In such a case the parallel import is authorised in the State of importation by reference to the marketing authorisation issued in accordance with Directive 65/65 ("marketing authorisation of reference").' e

7. Although, as appears from the case law cited above, member states may not require parallel importers of medicinal products to obtain a full marketing authorisation within the meaning of Directive 65/65, they frequently provide for a simplified authorisation procedure for parallel imports. The Commission of the European Communities recognised that practice in its guidelines<sup>6</sup> published in 1982, subject to limitations designed to ensure that the inevitable restrictions on imports flowing from any monitoring system are justified for the purpose of protecting the health and life of humans pursuant to art 30 EC (formerly art 36 of the EC Treaty). Thus for example the Commission envisages that the parallel importer may be required to supply the competent authorities of the member state of import with information enabling them to check that the medicinal product to be imported is in fact covered by the marketing authorisation of reference relied on by the parallel importer. f

8. In the context of such a system, many member states—including, it appears from the orders for reference, Sweden and Finland—issue separate authorisations to parallel importers. For convenience, I shall refer to such an authorisation as a 'licence' or 'parallel import licence', as distinct from the 'marketing authorisation' within the meaning of Directive 65/65 for the reference product. h

9. Finally, Ch Va of Second Council Directive (EEC) 75/319<sup>7</sup> requires the member states to set up a pharmacovigilance system which, among other things, imposes obligations on the holder of a marketing authorisation relating i a to the registration and notification of all adverse reactions to those medicinal products on humans. To that end reports must be submitted to the competent authorities at regular intervals and must be accompanied by a scientific evaluation.

THE PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE NATIONAL COURTS

b 10. Both cases concern the medicinal product Losec. Losec, reportedly the world's largest-selling pharmaceutical, is used to treat and prevent peptic ulcers and reflux oesophagitis (heartburn). It contains omeprazole, a substance called a proton-pump inhibitor which works by blocking a particular mechanism in the stomach called the proton pump which controls acid production, thereby reducing the amount of stomach acid produced.

c 11. Losec was initially marketed in capsules. Case C-15/01 (the Swedish case) concerns Sweden, where the marketing authorisation for Losec capsules was held by Hässle Läkemedel AB (Hässle) whilst Paranova Läkemedel AB and several other pharmaceutical companies (Paranova AB) held the licence for capsules imported as a parallel import. Case C-113/01 (the Finnish case) d concerns Finland, where the marketing authorisation for Losec capsules was held by Suomen Astra Oy (Astra) whilst Paranova Oy held the licence for capsules imported as a parallel import. I shall refer to the parallel importers collectively as Paranova.

e 12. Subsequently Hässle and Astra (the manufacturers) each gave notice to the relevant national medical products agency (the competent authority for the purpose of Directive 65/65, in each case called the Läkemedelsverket) that it was withdrawing Losec capsules from the market and at the same time surrendering or seeking revocation of the marketing authorisation for those products.

f 13. The reason for the manufacturers' actions was that they intended to sell a new variant of Losec called Losec MUPS tablets. The capsules however were to continue to be sold in other member states under authorisations granted there. It appears to be accepted that Losec MUPS tablets and Losec capsules are what are known as therapeutic equivalents—that is to say, they contain the same active ingredient (omeprazole)—and are bioequivalent in that that ingredient is absorbed by the body at the same rate and to the same extent when taken orally. They differ however according to the Läkemedelsverket in g pharmaceutical form (capsule as opposed to tablet) and form of the active ingredient (magnesium salt of omeprazole acid as opposed to omeprazole acid).

h 14. The Läkemedelsverket gave notice to Paranova that the manufacturers' marketing authorisations for the capsules were no longer valid and that as a consequence and in accordance with the relevant national regulations Paranova's parallel import licences were also no longer valid.

i 15. Paranova sought annulment of the decisions of the Läkemedelsverket on the ground that, inter alia, they were incompatible with arts 28 and 30 EC (formerly arts 30, 36 of the EC Treaty). The application was made in the Swedish case to the Länsrätten (County Administrative Court), Uppsala, with an appeal to the Kammarrätten (Administrative Court of Appeal), Stockholm, and thence to the referring court and in the Finnish case directly to the referring court.

16. The Läkemedelsverket is in each case of the view that the fact that there is no marketing authorisation for the capsules in the member state of importation (Sweden or Finland) means that capsules cannot lawfully be imported by parallel trade from another member state since in such circumstances it would be unable properly to comply with its duty of pharmacovigilance. a

17. The referring courts have accordingly referred the following questions for a preliminary ruling.

18. In the Swedish case:

(1) Is it compatible with Articles 28 and 30 EC to revoke a marketing authorisation for a medicinal product imported as a parallel import on the ground that the marketing authorisation for the directly imported medicinal product has been revoked at the request of the holder of the authorisation for reasons unconnected with the safety of the medicinal product? Does the answer depend on what specific reasons have given rise to that request or on whether the holder of the authorisation or companies belonging to the same group in other Member States continue to sell the medicinal product to which the parallel imports relate on the basis of marketing authorisations granted there? b

(2) If the parallel importers rely on a new marketing authorisation for a directly imported medicinal product rather than on the old marketing authorisation, is authorisation for the continued marketing of the medicinal product imported as a parallel import precluded by the fact that that medicinal product and the directly imported medicinal product which is covered by the new marketing authorisation are different in the sense that the medicinal product imported as a parallel import is sold in the form of a capsule containing a certain acid (omeprazole) while the directly imported medicinal product is sold in the form of a tablet containing a magnesium salt of the acid? c

19. In the Finnish case:

(1) Is it compatible with Articles 28 and 30 EC for a national agency to decide that a marketing authorisation for a medicinal product imported as a parallel import automatically comes to an end if the original marketing authorisation for the medicinal product has been withdrawn at the holder's request for reasons unconnected with the effectiveness or the safety of the medicinal product and despite the fact that the product has a valid marketing authorisation in the Member State from which the parallel imports come? d

(2) If Community law imposes restrictions or conditions on the right of a national agency to decide that a marketing authorisation for parallel imports comes to an end in the situation referred to in Question (1), what importance should be accorded to the facts that e

(a) the holder of the original marketing authorisation has obtained a new marketing authorisation for a medicinal product designed to replace the original medicinal product but that new product is not in the same pharmaceutical form (tablets instead of capsules) and the active ingredient is not exactly the same (magnesium Omeprazole instead of Omeprazole); on the other hand, the national agency considers that the medicinal products are bioequivalent and that they have the same therapeutic effect; g

(b) subsequent control of the effectiveness and safety of the medicinal product is possibly made more difficult by the fact that the marketing authorisation for the original medicinal product has been withdrawn; h

a (c) the medicinal product imported as a parallel import has been widely used over many years in Member States and it is improbable that its continued sale presents a danger to public health?

b (3) If, in the situation referred to in Question (1), Articles 28 and 30 EC allow it to be found that the marketing authorisation granted for a parallel import has expired, may it be decided that the marketing authorisation for the parallel import expired immediately the original marketing authorisation was withdrawn, without allowing the parallel importer any time to adapt his activity? Do any of the circumstances referred to in Question (2) affect the question whether it may be decided that the marketing authorisation for a parallel import expires immediately?

c THE RECENT CASE LAW OF THE COURT

d 21. The court delivered its judgment in the Ferring case<sup>8</sup> after the orders for reference had been made in the present cases. In that case the court was asked to rule on the lawfulness of national legislation under which the withdrawal of the marketing authorisation of reference for a medicinal product on application by the holder thereof meant that the parallel import licence for that product automatically ceased to be valid. It was accepted that—as in the present cases—the holder of the marketing authorisation of reference sought withdrawal of that authorisation not for reasons connected with public health but because it intended to market a new version of the product.

e 22. The court started from the premiss that the cessation of the validity of a parallel import licence following the withdrawal of the marketing authorisation of reference constituted a restriction on the free movement of goods contrary to art 28 EC unless justified by reasons relating to the protection of public health in accordance with art 30 EC. It stated that the principle of proportionality, which was the basis of the last sentence of art 30 EC, required that the power of the member states to prohibit imports of products from other member states be restricted to what was necessary in order to achieve legitimately pursued aims concerning the protection of health. National legislation or practice could not therefore benefit from the derogation laid down in art 30 EC when the health and life of humans could be protected equally effectively by measures less restrictive of intra-Community trade<sup>9</sup>.

g 23. The court continued by stating that where a marketing authorisation of reference was withdrawn at the request of its holder for reasons other than the protection of public health there did not appear to be any grounds justifying the automatic cessation of the validity of the parallel import licence. First, the withdrawal of a marketing authorisation of reference did not mean in itself h that the quality, efficacy and non-toxicity of the old version—which continued to be lawfully marketed in the member state of exportation under the marketing authorisation issued in that state—was called into question. Second, pharmacovigilance satisfying Directive 75/319<sup>10</sup> could ordinarily be guaranteed for medicinal products that were the subject of parallel imports through i co-operation with the national authorities of the other member states by means of access to the documents and data produced by the manufacturer or other companies in the same group relating to the old version in the member states in which that version was still marketed on the basis of a marketing authorisation still in force<sup>11</sup>.

24. The court accordingly concluded that national legislation under which the withdrawal of the marketing authorisation of reference for a medicinal product on application by the holder thereof meant that a parallel import licence for that product automatically ceased to be valid did not comply with art 28 EC<sup>12</sup>.

25. The court had acknowledged that it was conceivable that there could be reasons relating to the protection of public health which required that a parallel import licence for medicinal products be necessarily linked to a marketing authorisation of reference. In particular, a demonstrated risk to public health arising from the co-existence of two versions of the same medicinal product on the market in a member state could justify restrictions on the importation of the old version of the medicinal product in consequence of the withdrawal of the marketing authorisation of reference by the holder thereof in relation to that market<sup>13</sup>.

OBSERVATIONS OF THE PARTIES

26. Written observations have been submitted in the Swedish case by Paranova AB, the Danish, Netherlands, Norwegian and Swedish governments and the Commission and in the Finnish case by the Danish, Finnish, Netherlands and Norwegian governments and the Commission. Paranova, all the aforementioned governments and the Commission were represented at the hearing, which was common to both cases.

27. The written observations were in all cases submitted before the court delivered its judgment in the Ferring case and to that extent, as was acknowledged at the hearing by, in particular, the Danish and Netherlands governments and the Commission, have in effect been overtaken by events as may be seen below.

THE FIRST QUESTION REFERRED

28. By their respective first questions, the referring courts in the present cases ask essentially whether it is compatible with arts 28 and 30 EC for a licence for a medicinal product imported as a parallel import to be revoked on the sole ground that the marketing authorisation of reference has been withdrawn at the holder's request for reasons unconnected with the safety of the product.

29. In my view, that question has now been answered in the negative by the judgment of the court in the Ferring case for the reasons summarised above<sup>14</sup>.

30. In the Swedish case the referring court asks in addition whether the answer to that question depends on what specific reasons have given rise to the request by the holder of the marketing authorisation of reference for the withdrawal of that authorisation.

31. As explained above<sup>15</sup>, revocation of the parallel import licence constitutes a restriction on the free movement of goods contrary to art 28 EC; as such it a will be lawful only if it can be justified in accordance with art 30 EC, which provides that measures may be justified on grounds of, inter alia, 'the protection of health and life of humans'. The Swedish referring court's question is explicitly based on the premiss that the reasons for the withdrawal of the marketing authorisation of reference are unconnected with the safety of the product. In those circumstances, the answer to the first question cannot therefore depend on what those other reasons—presumably dictated by commercial considerations—may be.

b 32. The Swedish referring court also asks whether the answer to the first question depends on whether the holder of the marketing authorisation of reference (or companies belonging to the same group) continues to sell the product which is the subject of parallel imports—namely the capsules—in other member states on the basis of marketing authorisations granted there.

c 33. It is not entirely clear what has prompted the Swedish referring court to raise that point. In one sense, it seems irrelevant, since the phenomenon of parallel import pre-supposes that the imported product is on the market in at least one member state other than the state of import; that product will moreover frequently have been placed on the other market by the holder of the marketing authorisation of reference or a company belonging to the same group. The Swedish court may however be asking whether the situation there described will make the pharmacovigilance duties of the competent authority of the state of import easier to discharge where a parallel import licence survives revocation of the marketing authorisation of reference.

d 34. The court stated in Ex p Rhône-Poulenc Rorer (para 46)<sup>16</sup> that with regard to pharmacovigilance it was—

e 'possible to compel the holder of the marketing authorisation in the member state of importation, who belongs to the group of companies which is in possession of the marketing authorisations for the old version in the other member states, to supply the necessary information ...'

f It is clear from the context<sup>17</sup> that the court was responding to the argument that the pharmacovigilance system would not work where a marketing authorisation of reference was revoked since the obligation on the holder of that authorisation to submit information regularly as required by Directive 75/319 would also lapse, so that the competent authorities in the state of import could not be sure that the use of the old product imported in parallel was still safe according to the latest scientific data. The court must therefore have meant in the passage cited above that it was possible to compel the holder of the marketing authorisation for the new version of the product in the member state of import, who belongs to the group of companies which is in possession of the marketing authorisations for the old version in the other member states (including ex hypothesi the state of export), to supply the necessary information relating to the old version.

g 35. Even where the situation described by the Swedish court does not obtain, however, it will in my view be only in exceptional circumstances that the competent authority of the state of import will be able to rely on difficulty in discharging its pharmacovigilance duties as a justification for withdrawing the parallel import licence. I set out my reasons for that view in paras 39 to 45, below, in the context of the second question referred by the Finnish court which directly raises this issue. a

THE SECOND QUESTION REFERRED IN THE FINNISH CASE

36. The referring court in the Finnish case also asks in effect whether it is relevant that (a) the holder of the marketing authorisation of reference has obtained a new marketing authorisation for a replacement product which, albeit in a different pharmaceutical form and with a slightly different active ingredient, is regarded as bioequivalent and as having the same therapeutic effect; (b) subsequent control of the effectiveness and safety of the product may be more difficult because the marketing authorisation of reference has been withdrawn; and (c) the imported product has been widely used over many years so that it is unlikely to present a danger to public health. b

37. It appears from the order for reference that Paranova Oy raised those points before the referring court in the context of its argument that a prohibition on imports based on health reasons in accordance with art 30 EC must respect the principle of proportionality. Paranova Oy argued that that assessment must be made with regard to the circumstances of the case in question. It stressed that the fact that the products were, in principle, identical and that they were well known, both to national agencies in charge of evaluation of medicinal products in the European Union and to doctors and patients, had to be taken into account and that Losec capsules, having been available on the world market for some time and being one of the most widely sold medicines, had been used by such a significantly large number of people and for such a significant period of time that national agencies in charge of evaluation of medication in the European Union had been able to develop a very clear opinion of how they worked and their effects. d

38. Under (a), the Finnish referring court asks whether it is relevant that the holder of the marketing authorisation of reference has obtained a new marketing authorisation for a replacement product which, albeit in a different pharmaceutical form and with a slightly different active ingredient, is regarded as bioequivalent and as having the same therapeutic effect. In my view, that factor is not relevant given the conclusion of the court in the Ferring case, since in any event the competent authority of the member state of import is not entitled to revoke the parallel import licence unless there is a demonstrated risk to public health. f

39. Under (b), the Finnish referring court mentions possible problems with pharmacovigilance. It is concerned in particular that subsequent control of the effectiveness and safety of the product may be more difficult after revocation of the marketing authorisation of reference. h

40. The court made it clear in the Ferring case that if it can be demonstrated that there is in fact a risk to public health arising from the coexistence on the market of the member state of import of the two versions of the medicinal product at issue (in the present case, the capsules and the tablets), such a risk may justify restrictions on the importation of the old version<sup>18</sup>. That statement was restricted to the specific alleged health risk referred to in the questions referred in that case. It is however clearly of broader application. If therefore it can be demonstrated that there is in fact a risk to public health arising from the i

b 41. However, the court added in the Ferring case that the question of the existence and the reality of the risk is a matter which is primarily for the competent authorities of the member state of import to determine, and the mere assertion by the holder of the marketing authorisation for the new and old versions that there is such a risk is not sufficient to justify prohibition of the importation of the old version<sup>19</sup>. The determination by the competent authority of the existence and reality of the risk must in my view be substantiated: the mere assertion by the competent authority concerned that, c for example, it would not be possible to carry out the necessary safety checks if parallel imports of the capsules continued after revocation of the marketing authorisation of reference would not be sufficient if the authority could not demonstrate that that concern was justified.

d 42. In that context, it is worth repeating the points made by the court in the Ferring case. First, it gave weight to the fact that the old version of the medicinal product continued to be lawfully marketed in the member state of exportation under the marketing authorisation issued in that state. Second, it noted that, although adequate monitoring of the old version remained necessary in the state of import, pharmacovigilance satisfying Directive 75/319 e could ordinarily be guaranteed through co-operation with the national authorities of the other member states by means of access to the documents and data produced by the manufacturer or other companies in the same group, relating to the old version in the member states in which that version was still marketed on the basis of a marketing authorisation still in force<sup>20</sup>. It may be added that, as discussed above<sup>21</sup>, it is clear from the case law of the court that the manufacturer in that situation may be compelled to supply the necessary information<sup>22</sup>.

f 43. At the time of the events giving rise to the main proceedings in the present cases<sup>23</sup>, Ch Va of Directive 75/319<sup>24</sup> as amended in particular by Directive 93/39<sup>25</sup> imposed a series of obligations concerning pharmacovigilance. In particular, art 29a required member states to establish a pharmacovigilance system to be used to collect information useful in the surveillance of medicinal products, with particular reference to adverse reactions in human beings, and to evaluate such information scientifically. g Articles 29c and 29d required the person responsible for placing the medicinal product on the market to establish and maintain a system ensuring that information about all suspected adverse reactions reported to the company and to medical representatives was collected and collated at a single point within h the Community, to answer fully and promptly any request from the competent authorities for additional information necessary for the evaluation of the benefits and risks of a medicinal product and to record and promptly report to the competent authorities all suspected serious adverse reactions brought to its attention by health care professionals. Article 29f required the member states to ensure that reports of suspected serious adverse reactions were immediately brought to the attention of the European Agency for the Evaluation of Medicinal Products established by Regulation 2309/93<sup>26</sup> (the Agency).

44. With effect from 30 June 2000, those obligations have been further strengthened by Directive 2000/38<sup>27</sup>, which amended Ch Va of Directive 75/319. The marketing authorisation holder must now in addition provide to the competent authorities any other information relevant to the evaluation of the benefits and risks of a medicinal product, including appropriate information on post-authorisation safety studies<sup>28</sup>, maintain detailed records of all suspected adverse reactions occurring either in the Community or in a third country<sup>29</sup> and record and promptly report to the competent authority of the member state in whose territory the incident occurred all suspected serious adverse reactions of which he has or can reasonably be expected to have knowledge<sup>30</sup>. Furthermore, member states are to ensure that reports of suspected serious adverse reactions that have taken place on their territory are promptly made available to the Agency and the other member states<sup>31</sup>.

45. The Finnish government stated at the hearing that reliance on the pharmacovigilance requirements of Directive 75/319 was undermined by the fact that different member states used different languages: a report of a suspected serious adverse reaction which took place in Greece, for example, would be forwarded to the Finnish competent authority in Greek. I am not however convinced that that is as serious a problem as it may appear at first sight. The 'Note for Guidance on Procedure for Competent Authorities on the Undertaking of Pharmacovigilance Activities'<sup>32</sup> issued by the Agency requires that the terminologies used to code medicinal products, diseases and adverse drug reactions should ensure compatibility of reports between member states and in particular that reports entered into a database should be coded according to internationally approved terminologies or with mutually accepted terms enabling connections with internationally approved terminologies.

46. In my view the combined effect of the above-mentioned pharmacovigilance requirements is such that it would be only in exceptional cases that the competent authority of the member state into which a medicinal product was imported in circumstances such as those of the present case could prohibit such imports on the ground that it could not ensure pharmacovigilance.

47. Finally, the factor referred to by the Finnish referring court at (c)—namely the history of widespread use of the capsules—is essentially part of the same pharmacovigilance point: although there is no formal requirement that the competent authority of the member state of import take such a factor into account, it will inevitably mean that the recording and reporting system imposed by the legislation and summarised above<sup>33</sup> is unlikely to be triggered.

- a 48. I accordingly conclude on the Finnish court's second question that, where a marketing authorisation of reference has been withdrawn for reasons unconnected with the safety of the product, restrictions on the continued import of medicinal products previously imported as parallel imports will be justified only if it can be demonstrated that there is in fact a risk to public health arising from the continued marketing of the imported capsules in the member state of import.

THE SECOND QUESTION REFERRED IN THE SWEDISH CASE AND THE THIRD QUESTION REFERRED IN THE FINNISH CASE

- c 49. It is clear from the order for reference in the Swedish case and from the terms of the third question referred in the Finnish case that each of those questions arises only if the first question is answered in the affirmative, namely to the effect that it is compatible with arts 28 and 30 EC for the parallel import licence to be revoked on the ground that the marketing authorisation of reference has been withdrawn. Since in the light of the judgment of the court in the Ferring case I propose that the first question should be answered in the negative, the second question referred in the Swedish case and the third question referred in the Finnish case do not arise.

CONCLUSION

- e 50. I am accordingly of the view that the questions referred by the Swedish Regeringsrätten and the Finnish Högsta Förvaltningsdomstolen should be answered as follows:

f It is not compatible with arts 28 and 30 EC for a licence for a medicinal product imported as a parallel import to be revoked on the sole ground that the marketing authorisation of reference has been withdrawn at the holder's request for reasons unconnected with the safety of the product unless there is a demonstrated risk to public health arising from the continued marketing of the imported product after withdrawal of that authorisation.

8 May 2003. The COURT OF JUSTICE (Sixth Chamber) delivered the following judgment in Paranova Läkemedel AB v Läkemedelsverket Case C-15/01.

- g 1. By order of 21 December 2000, received at the Court of Justice of the European Communities on 15 January 2001, the Regeringsrätten (Supreme Administrative Court, Sweden) referred to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) two questions on the interpretation of arts 28 and 30 EC (formerly arts 30, 36 of the EC Treaty).

- h 2. Those questions were raised in proceedings brought by Paranova Läkemedel AB, Farmagon A/S, Medartuum AB, Net Pharma KG AB, Orifarm AB, Trans Euro Medical AB, Cross Pharma AB and MedImport Scandinavia AB (Paranova and others) against the Läkemedelsverket (Swedish Medical Products Agency) concerning the consequences of the withdrawal of a marketing authorisation on the parallel import into Sweden by Paranova and others of a medicinal product.

LEGAL FRAMEWORK

3. Under art 28 EC quantitative restrictions on imports and all measures having equivalent effect are prohibited between member states. However, according to art 30 EC prohibitions or restrictions on import between member states which are justified on the ground, inter alia, of the protection of health of humans are authorised so long as they do not constitute a means of arbitrary discrimination or a disguised restriction on trade between member states. a

4. According to art 3 of Council Directive (EEC) 65/65 (on the approximation of provisions laid down by law, regulation or administrative action relating to proprietary medicinal products) (OJ English Sp Edn 1965-1966 (I) p 17), as amended by Council Directive (EEC) 93/39 (OJ 1993 L214 p 22) (Directive 65/65), no medicinal product may be placed on the market in a member state unless a marketing authorisation has been issued by the competent authority of that member state. b

5. Article 4 of Directive 65/65 defines the procedure, documents and information necessary for the issue of a marketing authorisation. c

6. Article 5 of Directive 65/65 states that the marketing authorisation is to be refused if after verification of the particulars and documents listed in art 4 it appears that the medicinal product is harmful in the normal conditions of use, or that its therapeutic efficacy is lacking or is insufficiently substantiated by the applicant, or that its qualitative and quantitative composition is not as declared. d

7. According to Ch Va of the Second Council Directive (EEC) 75/319 (on the approximation of provisions laid down by law, regulation or administrative action relating to proprietary medicinal products) (OJ 1975 L147 p 13), as amended by Directive 93/39, the member states are to set up a pharmacovigilance system which, amongst other things, imposes obligations on the holder of a marketing authorisation relating to the registration and notification of all adverse reactions to those medicinal products in humans. To that end reports must be submitted to the competent authorities at regular intervals and must be accompanied by a scientific evaluation. e

National law f

8. The Läkemedelslagen (Swedish Medicinal Products Law) (1992:859), the Läkemedelsförordningen (Medicinal Products Order) (1992:1752) and the regulations drawn up by the Läkemedelsverket (1994:22) contain provisions implementing Directive 65/65.

9. Under the regulations of the Läkemedelsverket a marketing authorisation from that agency is required in the case of parallel imports of medicinal products. The Läkemedelsverket investigates in order to establish whether the directly imported medicinal product and the medicinal product to be imported as a parallel import are the same. The withdrawal or suspension by the Swedish authorities or by those of the country of export of the marketing authorisation for the directly imported medicinal product entails the withdrawal or suspension of the authorisation for the parallel import into Sweden of the medicinal product. However, on application the Läkemedelsverket can authorise the continued validity of that authorisation if the marketing authorisation is withdrawn or suspended for economic reasons and not for reasons relating to the effects or the safety of the medicinal product concerned. g

THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND THE QUESTIONS REFERRED

10. Hässle Läkemedel AB (Hässle) held the marketing authorisation in Sweden for the medicinal product known as 'Losec enterokapslar' (Losec enteric capsules, hereinafter the capsules or the old version of the product), a while Paranova and others held marketing authorisations for parallel imports (parallel import licences) of the capsules. The product is used to treat conditions caused by stomach acid.

b 11. The Läkemedelsverket decided, at Hässle's request, that the marketing authorisation granted to Hässle ceased to be valid on 1 January 1999. Hässle made its request for withdrawal of the marketing authorisation granted to it for the capsules because it intended to sell in Sweden a new variant of that product called 'Losec MUPS enterotabletter' (Losec MUPS enteric tablets, hereinafter the tablets) in place of the capsules.

12. The capsules continued to be sold in other member states, under the marketing authorisations granted in those states.

c 13. The two versions of Losec are therapeutic equivalents, that is to say that both versions contain the same dose of the active ingredient which is absorbed by the body at the same rate and to the same extent when taken orally.

d 14. The active ingredient of the capsules contains omeprazole acid. The tablets contain magnesium salt of omeprazole acid. The salt dissolves more easily in water and is more stable. It is thus easier to manufacture tablets than capsules.

e 15. On 1 September 1998 the Läkemedelsverket decided that the parallel import licences granted to Paranova and others would expire on the same date as the marketing authorisation which Mr Hässle held. On 25 September 1998 the date on which those authorisations expired was, however, postponed until 30 June 1999. The Läkemedelsverket gave as the reason for its decision the fact that the capsules and the tablets had to be considered as two distinct medicinal products, both because the production methods differed and because the active ingredient, that is to say, omeprazole acid, of the capsules, had been replaced by another active ingredient in the tablets, that is to say, magnesium salt of omeprazole acid. It pointed out that if the parallel import licence for the capsules did not expire, that product would be put on the market in Sweden without it being possible to meet the necessary safety requirements.

f 16. Paranova and others appealed to the Länsrätten i Uppsala Län (County Administrative Court for Uppsala, Sweden), against the decision of the Läkemedelsverket of 1 September 1998. The Länsrätten upheld that appeal by judgment of 7 December 1998.

g 17. The Läkemedelsverket appealed against that judgment to the Kammarrätten i Stockholm (Administrative Court of Appeal, Stockholm, Sweden), which, by judgment of 26 February 1999, upheld that appeal, and held that the two medicinal products at issue were not sufficiently similar to be covered by the same marketing authorisation.

h 18. Paranova and others have appealed against that judgment to the Regeringsrätten, which, in the order for reference, pointed out that although the application was made in the form of a dispute as to whether a marketing authorisation granted for directly imported tablets can be the basis for a right to sell the capsules imported as parallel imports, it must first be decided whether the fact that the marketing authorisation held by Hässle for the capsules was withdrawn at its request must automatically entail the withdrawal of the authorisation granted to the parallel importers.

i 19. It is against that background that the Regeringsrätten referred the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

(1) Is it compatible with Articles 28 EC and 30 EC to revoke a marketing authorisation for a medicinal product imported as a parallel import on the ground that the marketing authorisation for the directly imported medicinal product has been revoked at the request of the holder of the authorisation for reasons unconnected with the safety of the medicinal product? Does the answer depend on what specific reasons have given rise to that request or on whether the holder of the authorisation or companies belonging to the same group in other Member States continue to sell the medicinal product to which the parallel imports relate on the basis of marketing authorisations granted there? a

(2) If the parallel importers rely on a new marketing authorisation for a directly imported medicinal product rather than on the old marketing authorisation, is authorisation for the continued marketing of the medicinal product imported as a parallel import precluded by the fact that that medicinal product and the directly imported medicinal product which is covered by the new marketing authorisation are different in the sense that the medicinal product imported as a parallel import is sold in the form of a capsule containing a certain acid (omeprazole) while the directly imported medicinal product is sold in the form of a tablet containing a magnesium salt of the acid? b

20. As a preliminary point it must be observed that:

- the parallel import licence for the capsules (the old version of the medicinal product) was issued by reference to the marketing authorisation granted by the national authorities for that same medicinal product; c
- that marketing authorisation was withdrawn at the request of its holder for reasons unconnected with the safety of the product; d
- that holder obtained a marketing authorisation for a new variant of that medicinal product; and e
- the old version of the medicinal product is still marketed legally in other member states under marketing authorisations which have not been revoked. f

21. In those circumstances, the question arises as to whether arts 28 and 30 EC preclude national legislation under which the withdrawal, at the request of its holder, of the marketing authorisation granted for the old version of a medicinal product of itself entails the withdrawal of the parallel import licence for that same product.

22. It must be noted at the outset that the cessation of the validity of a parallel import licence following the withdrawal of the marketing authorisation of reference constitutes a restriction on the free movement of goods contrary to art 28 EC (see Ferring Arzneimittel GmbH v Eurim Pharm Arzneimittel GmbH Case C-172/00 [2002] ECR I-6891 (para 33)). g

23. However, such a restriction may be justified by reasons relating to the protection of public health, in accordance with the provisions of art 30 EC (see the Ferring case (para 33)). h

24. It is for the national authorities responsible for the operation of the legislation governing the production and marketing of medicinal products—legislation which, as is made clear in the first recital of Directive 65/65, has as its primary objective the safeguarding of public health—to ensure that it is fully complied with. Nevertheless, the principle of proportionality, which is the basis of the last sentence of art 30 EC, requires that the power of the member states to prohibit imports of products from other member states be restricted to what is necessary in order to achieve the aims concerning the protection of health that are legitimately pursued. Thus, national legislation or i a practice cannot benefit from the derogation laid down in art 30 EC when the health and life of humans can be protected equally effectively by measures less restrictive of intra-Community trade (see the Ferring case (para 34)).

25. No reason has been put before the court to justify why the mere fact that a marketing authorisation of reference was withdrawn at the request of its holder should entail the automatic withdrawal of the parallel import licence issued for the medicinal product in question (see, to that effect, the Ferring case (para 35)).

b 26. First, it must be observed that the withdrawal of a marketing authorisation of reference does not mean in itself that the quality, efficacy and non-toxicity of the old version is called into question. In that respect it must be noted that that version continues to be lawfully marketed in the member state of exportation under the marketing authorisation issued in that state (see the Ferring case (para 36)).

c 27. Next, although the competent authorities of the member state of importation can, and indeed must, adopt the measures necessary for the purpose of verifying the quality, efficacy and non-toxicity of the old version of the medicinal product, it does not appear that that objective cannot be attained by other measures having a less restrictive effect on the import of medicinal products than the automatic cessation of the validity of the parallel import licence in consequence of the withdrawal of the marketing authorisation of reference (see the Ferring case (para 37)).

d 28. Although adequate monitoring of the old version of the medicinal product remains necessary and may in certain cases mean that information is requested from the importer, it must be pointed out that pharmacovigilance satisfying the relevant requirements of Directive 75/319 as amended can ordinarily be guaranteed for medicinal products that are the subject of parallel imports, such as those in question in the main proceedings, through co-operation with the national authorities of the other member states by means of access to the documents and data produced by the manufacturer or other companies in the same group, relating to the old version in the member states in which that version is still marketed on the basis of a marketing authorisation still in force (see the Ferring case (para 38)).

e 29. In that connection, it must be observed that the 'Note for Guidance on Procedure for Competent Authorities on the Undertaking of Pharmacovigilance Activities' (CPMP/PhVWP/175/95), published in June 1995 by the European Agency for the Evaluation of Medicinal Products, requires, in its para 3.1.4, that the terminologies used to code medicinal products, adverse reactions to them and diseases should ensure compatibility of reports between member states and in particular ensure that reports entered into a database should be coded according to internationally approved terminologies or with mutually accepted terms allowing connections to be made with such terminologies.

f 30. Finally, it must also be observed that, while it cannot be ruled out that there are reasons relating to the protection of public health which require a parallel import licence for medicinal products to be linked to a marketing authorisation of reference, no such reasons are apparent from the observations put before the court.

g 31. If there are no reasons of a general nature which could explain why the withdrawal of the marketing authorisation of reference should entail that of the parallel import licence, that does not preclude the existence, in specific circumstances, of reasons relating to the protection of public health which could justify the withdrawal of the parallel import licence. a

32. As the court has held, such reasons could arise, for example, where there is in fact a risk to public health arising from the coexistence of two versions of the same medicinal product on the market of the importing member state (see the Ferring case (para 43)).

33. In the light of those considerations the answer to the first part of the first question should be that arts 28 and 30 EC preclude national legislation under which the withdrawal, at the request of its holder, of the marketing authorisation of reference of itself entails the withdrawal of the parallel import licence granted for the medicinal product in question. However, those provisions do not preclude restrictions on parallel imports of the medicinal product in question if there is in fact a risk to the health of humans as a result of the continued existence of that medicinal product on the market of the importing member state. b

34. In the light of that reply, there is no need to reply to the second part of the first question. Similarly, it is not necessary to consider the second question in which the referring court essentially seeks to know whether the parallel import licence can be linked to the new marketing authorisation granted for the tablets. d

COSTS

35. The costs incurred by the Swedish, Danish, Netherlands and Norwegian governments and by the Commission of the European Communities, which have submitted observations to the court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. e

On those grounds, the Court of Justice (Sixth Chamber), in answer to the questions referred to it by the Regeringsträtten by order of 21 December 2000, hereby rules:

Articles 28 and 30 EC preclude national legislation under which the withdrawal, at the request of its holder, of the marketing authorisation of reference of itself entails the withdrawal of the parallel import licence granted for the medicinal product in question. However, those provisions do not preclude restrictions on parallel imports of the medicinal product in question if there is in fact a risk to the health of humans as a result of the continued existence of that medicinal product on the market of the importing member state. g

8 May 2003. The COURT OF JUSTICE (Sixth Chamber) delivered the following judgment in Re Paranova Oy Case C-113/01.

1. By order of 8 March 2001, received at the Court of Justice of the European Communities on 14 March 2001, the Högsta förvaltningsdomstolen (Supreme Administrative Court, Finland) referred to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) three questions on the interpretation of arts 28 and 30 EC (formerly arts 30, 36 of the EC Treaty). i

2. Those questions were raised in proceedings between Paranova Oy (Paranova) and the Läkemedelsverket (Finnish Medical Products Agency)

- a concerning the consequences of the withdrawal of a marketing authorisation on the parallel import into Finland by Paranova of a medicinal product.

LEGAL FRAMEWORK

Community law

3. Under art 28 EC quantitative restrictions on imports and all measures b having equivalent effect are prohibited between member states. However, according to art 30 EC, prohibitions or restrictions on import between member states which are justified on the ground, inter alia, of the protection of health of humans are authorised so long as they do not constitute a means of arbitrary discrimination or a disguised restriction on trade between member states.
4. According to art 3 of Council Directive (EEC) 65/65 (on the c approximation of provisions laid down by law, regulation or administrative action relating to proprietary medicinal products) (OJ English Sp Edn 1965–1966 (I) p 17), as amended by Council Directive (EEC) 93/39 (OJ 1993 L214 p 22) (Directive 65/65), no medicinal product may be placed on the market in a member state unless a marketing authorisation has been issued by d the competent authority of that member state.

5. Article 4 of Directive 65/65 defines the procedure, documents and information necessary for the issue of a marketing authorisation.

6. Article 5 of Directive 65/65 states that the marketing authorisation is to be refused if after verification of the particulars and documents listed in art 4 it
e appears that the medicinal product is harmful in the normal conditions of use, or that its therapeutic efficacy is lacking or is insufficiently substantiated by the applicant, or that its qualitative and quantitative composition is not as declared.

7. According to Ch Va of the Second Council Directive (EEC) 75/319 (on the approximation of provisions laid down by law, regulation or administrative action relating to proprietary medicinal products) (OJ 1975 L147 p 13), as
f amended by Directive 93/39, the member states are to set up a pharmacovigilance system which, amongst other things, imposes obligations on the holder of a marketing authorisation relating to the registration and notification of all adverse reactions to those medicinal products in humans. To that end reports must be submitted to the competent authorities at regular intervals and must be accompanied by a scientific evaluation.

- g National law

8. Under art 101 of the Läkemedelslagen (Finnish Medicinal Products Law No 395/1987), the Läkemedelsverket may prohibit the importation, manufacture, distribution and sale or any other transfer for consumption of a medicinal product if the conditions for a marketing authorisation or for a h registration or the requirements or obligations that concern the manufacture or the importation of the medicinal product are no longer fulfilled or if there is reason to believe that such is the case.

9. Under Regulation 1/1997 of the Läkemedelsverket on the parallel importation of medicinal products, parallel imports are possible only of medicinal products which are already covered by a marketing authorisation
i valid in Finland. Such products must also be covered by a marketing authorisation valid in the country of supply. That country must belong to the European Economic Area. When dealing with an application for the parallel import of a medicinal product, the Läkemedelsverket has to establish that the medicinal products are sufficiently similar to be considered to be identical products.

10. Under the first subparagraph of para 4.3 of that regulation, authorisation for parallel imports (a parallel import licence) is granted for five years. However, the validity of that licence depends on that of the marketing authorisations granted both in Finland and in the country of supply for the directly imported medicinal product and it remains in force only so long as those authorisations themselves remain valid. It is for the parallel importer to ensure that each consignment imported to Finland is covered by a marketing authorisation valid in that member state and in the country of supply. If the marketing authorisation expires in the country of supply, the parallel importer must inform the Läkemedelsverket immediately. a

THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND THE QUESTIONS REFERRED c

11. Suomen Astra Oy (Astra) held the marketing authorisation in Finland for the medicinal product known as 'Losec enterokapslar' (Losec enteric capsules, hereinafter the capsules or the old version of the product), while Paranova held a parallel import licence for the capsules. The product is used to treat conditions caused by stomach acid. b

12. By letter sent to the Läkemedelsverket on 28 September 1998, Astra sought revocation of the marketing authorisation granted to it for the capsules, explaining that it intended to sell in Finland a new variant of that product called 'Losec MUPS enterotabletter' (Losec MUPS enteric tablets, hereinafter the tablets) in place of the capsules. Subsequently, the Läkemedelsverket withdrew the marketing authorisation held by Astra for the capsules with effect from 30 September 1998. d

13. The capsules continued to be sold in other member states, under the marketing authorisations granted in those states. e

14. The two versions of Losec are therapeutic equivalents, that is to say that both versions contain the same dose of the active ingredient which is absorbed by the body at the same rate and to the same extent when taken orally. f

15. The active ingredient of the capsules contains omeprazole acid. The tablets contain magnesium salt of omeprazole acid. The salt dissolves more easily in water and is more stable. It is thus easier to manufacture tablets than capsules.

16. In a letter sent to Paranova on 8 October 1998, the Läkemedelsverket gave notice that it had withdrawn the marketing authorisation held by Astra for the capsules and that the validity of the licence which Paranova held for the capsules expired on the same date, that is to say, 30 September 1998. g

17. On 24 November 1998 the Läkemedelsverket gave notice that the parallel import licence held by Paranova for the capsules was no longer valid, with immediate effect, regardless of any objection by Paranova. In the grounds for the decision the Läkemedelsverket pointed out that the parallel import licence did not meet the conditions set out in Regulation 1/1997, since the validity of the parallel import licence depends on that of the marketing authorisation granted for the medicinal product at issue in Finland and remains in force only as long as that authorisation is itself valid. h

18. Paranova appealed against that decision before the Högsta förvaltningsdomstolen, claiming that it is incompatible with arts 28 and 30 EC. It argued that it became aware of the revocation of the marketing authorisation which Astra held when its own parallel import licence became invalid. It thus did not have the time necessary to adapt its stock and sale contracts concluded before the new situation arose. For parallel importers, i a securing a supply which is consistent with consumption of the medicinal product constitutes one of the most important commercial criteria.

19. The Läkemedelsverket countered that parallel import licences are granted for five years. However, their validity is limited by that of the marketing authorisation of reference in Finland and in the country of origin of the medicinal product imported as a parallel import. It is thus for the parallel importer to check that each consignment imported is covered by a marketing authorisation in both states. The Läkemedelsverket also contends that the two medicinal products are essentially the same if they have the same qualitative and quantitative composition in terms of active principles, if they have the same pharmaceutical form and, where appropriate, if they are 'bioequivalent'. However, as the capsules and the tablets have different pharmaceutical forms, they cannot constitute the same medicinal product.

20. It is against that background that the Högsta förvaltningsdomstolen decided to stay proceedings and refer the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

d '(1) Is it compatible with Articles 28 EC and 30 EC for a national agency to decide that a marketing authorisation for a medicinal product imported as a parallel import automatically comes to an end if the original marketing authorisation for the medicinal product has been withdrawn at the holder's request for reasons unconnected with the effectiveness or the safety of the medicinal product and despite the fact that the product has a valid marketing authorisation in the Member State from which the parallel imports come?

e (2) If Community law imposes restrictions or conditions on the right of a national agency to decide that a marketing authorisation for parallel imports comes to an end in the situation referred to in Question (1), what importance should be accorded to the facts that

f (a) the holder of the original marketing authorisation has obtained a new marketing authorisation for a medicinal product designed to replace the original medicinal product but that new product is not in the same pharmaceutical form (tablets instead of capsules) and the active ingredient is not exactly the same (magnesium Omeprazole instead of Omeprazole); on the other hand, the national agency considers that the medicinal products are bioequivalent and that they have the same therapeutic effect;

g (b) subsequent control of the effectiveness and safety of the medicinal product is possibly made more difficult by the fact that the marketing authorisation for the original medicinal product has been withdrawn;

h (c) the medicinal product imported as a parallel import has been widely used over many years in Member States and it is improbable that its continued sale presents a danger to public health?

i (3) If, in the situation referred to in Question (1), Articles 28 EC and 30 EC allow it to be found that the marketing authorisation granted for a parallel import has expired, may it be decided that the marketing authorisation for the parallel import expired immediately the original marketing authorisation was withdrawn, without allowing the parallel importer any time to adapt his activity? Do any of the circumstances referred to in Question (2) affect the question whether it may be decided that the marketing authorisation for a parallel import expires immediately?

THE QUESTIONS REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

21. As a preliminary point it must be observed that:

—the parallel import licence for the capsules (the old version of the medicinal product) was issued by reference to the marketing authorisation granted by the national authorities for that same medicinal product;

—that marketing authorisation was withdrawn at the request of its holder for reasons unconnected with the safety of the product;

—that holder obtained a marketing authorisation for a new variant of that medicinal product; and

—the old version of the medicinal product is still marketed legally in other member states under marketing authorisations which have not been revoked.

22. In those circumstances, the question arises as to whether arts 28 and 30 EC preclude national legislation under which the withdrawal, at the request of its holder, of the marketing authorisation granted for the old version of a medicinal product of itself entails the withdrawal of the parallel import licence for that same product.

23. It must be noted at the outset that the cessation of the validity of a parallel import licence following the withdrawal of the marketing authorisation of reference constitutes a restriction on the free movement of goods contrary to art 28 EC (see Ferring Arzneimittel GmbH v Eurim Pharm Arzneimittel GmbH Case C-172/00 [2002] ECR I-6891 (para 33)).

24. However, such a restriction may be justified by reasons relating to the protection of public health, in accordance with the provisions of art 30 EC (see the Ferring case (para 33)).

25. It is for the national authorities responsible for the operation of the legislation governing the production and marketing of medicinal products—legislation which, as is made clear in the first recital of Directive 65/65, has as its primary objective the safeguarding of public health—to ensure that it is fully complied with. Nevertheless, the principle of proportionality, which is the basis of the last sentence of art 30 EC, requires that the power of the member states to prohibit imports of products from other member states be restricted to what is necessary in order to achieve the aims concerning the protection of health that are legitimately pursued. Thus, national legislation or practice cannot benefit from the derogation laid down in art 30 EC when the health and life of humans can be protected equally effectively by measures less restrictive of intra-Community trade (see the Ferring case (para 34)).

26. No reason has been put before the court to justify why the mere fact that a marketing authorisation of reference was withdrawn at the request of its holder should entail the automatic withdrawal of the parallel import licence issued for the medicinal product in question (see, to that effect, the Ferring case (para 35)).

27. First, it must be observed that the withdrawal of a marketing authorisation of reference does not mean in itself that the quality, efficacy and non-toxicity of the old version of the medicinal product is called into question. In that respect it must be noted that that version continues to be lawfully marketed in the member state of exportation under the marketing authorisation issued in that state (see the Ferring case (para 36)).

28. Next, although the competent authorities of the member state of importation can, and indeed must, adopt the measures necessary for the purpose of verifying the quality, efficacy and non-toxicity of the old version of the medicinal product, it does not appear that that objective cannot be attained by other measures having a less restrictive effect on the import of medicinal a products than the automatic cessation of the validity of the parallel import licence in consequence of the withdrawal of the marketing authorisation of reference (see the Ferring case (para 37)).

29. Although adequate monitoring of the old version of the medicinal product remains necessary and may in certain cases mean that information is requested from the importer, it must be pointed out that pharmacovigilance satisfying the relevant requirements of Directive 75/319 as amended can ordinarily be guaranteed for medicinal products that are the subject of parallel imports, such as those in question in the main proceedings, through co-operation with the national authorities of the other member states by means of access to the documents and data produced by the manufacturer or other companies in the same group, relating to the old version in the member states in which that version is still marketed on the basis of a marketing authorisation still in force (see the Ferring case (para 38)).

30. In that connection, it must be observed that the 'Note for Guidance on Procedure for Competent Authorities on the Undertaking of Pharmacovigilance Activities' (CPMP/PhVWP/175/95), published in June 1995 by the European Agency for the Evaluation of Medicinal Products, requires, in its para 3.1.4, that the terminologies used to code medicinal products, adverse reactions to them and diseases should ensure compatibility of reports between member states and in particular ensure that reports entered into a database should be coded according to internationally approved terminologies or with mutually accepted terms allowing connections to be made with such terminologies.

31. Finally, it must also be observed that, while it cannot be ruled out that there are reasons relating to the protection of public health which require a parallel import licence for medicinal products to be linked to a marketing authorisation of reference, no such reasons are apparent from the observations put before the court.

f 32. If there are no reasons of a general nature which could explain why the withdrawal of the marketing authorisation of reference should entail that of the parallel import licence, that does not preclude the existence, in specific circumstances, of reasons relating to the protection of public health which could justify the withdrawal of the parallel import licence.

g 33. As the court has held, such reasons could arise, for example, where there is in fact a risk to public health arising from the coexistence of two versions of the same medicinal product on the market of the importing member state (see the Ferring case (para 43)).

h 34. In the light of those considerations the answer to the first question should be that arts 28 and 30 EC preclude national legislation under which the withdrawal, at the request of its holder, of the marketing authorisation of reference of itself entails the withdrawal of the parallel import licence granted for the medicinal product in question. However, those provisions do not preclude restrictions on parallel imports of the medicinal product in question if there is in fact a risk to the health of humans as a result of the continued existence of that medicinal product on the market of the importing member state.

i 35. In the light of that reply, there is no need to reply to the second question. Similarly, it is not necessary to consider the third question in which the referring court essentially seeks to know whether the parallel import licence loses its validity immediately on withdrawal of the marketing authorisation of reference.

COSTS

36. The costs incurred by the Finnish, Danish, Netherlands and Norwegian governments and by the Commission of the European Communities, which have submitted observations to the court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court.

On those grounds, the Court of Justice (Sixth Chamber), in answer to the questions referred to it by the Högsta förvaltningsdomstolen by order of 8 March 2001, hereby rules:

Articles 28 and 30 EC preclude national legislation under which the withdrawal, at the request of its holder, of a marketing authorisation of reference of itself entails the withdrawal of the parallel import licence granted for the medicinal product in question. However, those provisions do not preclude restrictions on parallel imports of the medicinal product in question where there is in fact a risk to the health of humans as a result of the continued existence of that medicinal product on the market of the importing member state.

e      A mother (who was a national of China) had entered the territory of Northern Ireland and given birth to a child. That child was dependent both emotionally and financially on her mother (who was her primary carer). Further, she received private medical and child-care services in return for payment in the United Kingdom, and both her and her mother were insured against ill-health, such that they did not rely on public funds and there was no realistic possibility of their becoming so reliant. By virtue of the fact that the child had been born on the island of Ireland, she was entitled to, and had acquired, Irish nationality.

f      However, by contrast, birth within British territory did not automatically confer United Kingdom nationality on a person. In due course, the United Kingdom authorities refused to grant a long-term residence permit to the child and to the mother on the basis that the child was not exercising any rights arising from the EC Treaty. An appeal against that decision was brought before

g      the relevant appellate authority, which decided to stay the proceedings and refer to the Court of Justice of the European Communities certain questions, pursuant to art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty), concerning whether the freedom of citizens of the Union to reside and move freely within the territory of the member states guaranteed by art 18 EC<sup>a</sup> (formerly art 8a of the EC Treaty) and read in the light of the limitations placed upon that

i      Held – Article 18 EC and the directive conferred on both a young minor—who was a national of a member state, who was covered by appropriate sickness insurance, and whose primary carer was a third-country national having sufficient resources for the minor not to become a burden on the public finances of the host member state—and the minor's primary carer a right to reside for an indefinite period in that host state. The right of citizens of the Union to reside in the territory of the member states guaranteed by art 18(1) EC was recognised subject to the limitations and conditions imposed by the Treaty and by the measures adopted to give it effect, particularly, so far as relevant, art 1 of the directive. Although that right might be limited by a requirement that nationals of member states and their families were covered by sickness insurance in respect of all risks in the host member state and had sufficient resources to avoid becoming a burden on the social assistance system in the host member state during their period of residence, there was no requirement laid down as to the origin of those resources. Therefore, there was no condition that the person concerned, such as the child in the main proceedings, had to possess those resources personally. Any contrary interpretation would add to the condition of sufficiency of resources a requirement which was unnecessary for the attainment of the objective pursued, namely the protection of the public finances of the member state, such as to constitute a disproportionate interference with the fundamental right of freedom of movement and residence guaranteed by art 18 EC. Furthermore, it was irrelevant that, in the main proceedings, the purpose of the mother's stay in the United Kingdom had been to create a situation in which the child she was expecting would acquire the nationality of another member state in order to secure for her child and for herself a long-term right to reside in the United Kingdom, since there was dispute as to the legality of the child's acquisition of Irish nationality. In that regard, it was not permissible for a member state to restrict the effects of the grant of the nationality of another member state by imposing an additional condition for recognition of that nationality with a view to the exercise of the fundamental freedoms provided for in the Treaty. So far as the child's mother was concerned, a refusal to allow a parent, whether a national of a member state or a national of a non-member country, who was the carer of a child to whom art 18 EC and the directive granted a right of residence, to reside with that child in the host member state would deprive the child's right of residence of any useful effect, since enjoyment by a young child of a right of residence necessarily implied that that child was entitled to be accompanied by the person who was his or her primary carer (see judgment paras 26, 27, 29–30, 33, 36–39, 45, below).

<sup>a</sup> Article 18 EC, so far as material, provides: 'Every citizen of the Union shall have the right to move and reside freely within the territory of the Member States, subject to the limitations and conditions laid down in this Treaty and by the measures adopted to give it effect.'

I—INTRODUCTION

1. The Immigration Appellate Authority, Hatton Cross (United Kingdom) (the Immigration Authority), wishes to ascertain whether Community law, in the particular and unusual circumstances of the present case, precludes refusal by a member state to grant a long-term residence permit to a young child who is a national of another member state and has lived since birth in the territory of the first state, and to the child's mother, who is a national of a non-member country. b

II—RELEVANT COMMUNITY LAW c

2. Article 17 EC (formerly art 8 of the EC Treaty) provides for citizenship of the Union, which supplements Member-state nationality and involves, in particular, under art 18 EC (formerly art 8a of the EC Treaty), in addition to other rights and duties provided for by the Treaty, 'the right to move and reside freely within the territory of the member states, subject to the limitations and conditions laid down in this Treaty and by the measures adopted to give it effect'. d

3. Among the provisions of secondary law relevant to movement of persons and residence, of primary importance here is Council Directive (EEC) 73/148 (on the abolition of restrictions on movement and residence within the Community for nationals of member states with regard to establishment and the provision of services)<sup>2</sup>. e

4. Pursuant to art 1 thereof:

'1. The Member States shall, acting as provided in this Directive, abolish restrictions on the movement and residence of ...

(b) nationals of Member States wishing to go to another Member State as recipients of services ... f

(d) the relatives in the ascending and descending lines of such nationals and of the spouse of such nationals, which relatives are dependent on them, irrespective of their nationality.'

5. The first subparagraph of art 4(2) provides that '[t]he right of residence for persons providing and receiving services shall be of equal duration with the period during which the services are provided'. g

6. Council Directive (EEC) 90/364 (on the right of residence) (Directive 90/364)<sup>3</sup> governs the rights of movement and residence of people who are not economically active. Thus, art 1 thereof provides:

'1. Member States shall grant the right of residence to nationals of Member States who do not enjoy this right under other provisions of Community law and to members of their families as defined in paragraph 2, provided that they themselves and the members of their families are covered by sickness insurance in respect of all risks in the host Member State and have sufficient resources to avoid becoming a burden on the social assistance system of the host Member State during their period of residence ... h a 2. The following shall, irrespective of their nationality, have the right to install themselves in another Member State with the holder of the right of residence:

(a) his or her spouse and their descendants who are dependants;

III—FACTS AND PROCEDURE

c 7. The questions submitted to the Court of Justice of the European Communities were raised in proceedings before the Immigration Appellate Authority by Kunqian Catherine Zhu, an Irish national born on 16 September 2000 in Belfast, United Kingdom, (hereinafter 'Catherine' or 'the first appellant') and by her mother, Man Chen, a Chinese national (hereinafter 'the mother', 'her mother' or 'Mrs Chen') against the refusal by the Secretary of State for the Home Department (hereinafter 'the Secretary of State') to grant them a permanent residence permit in the United Kingdom.

d 8. Mrs Chen works with her husband, who is also a Chinese national, for a company whose registered office is in the People's Republic of China. It is a very large company, which produces and exports chemicals to various parts of the world, in particular to the United Kingdom and other member states of the European Union.

e 9. Mr Chen is one of the directors of that company, in which he has a controlling shareholding. In his capacity as director, he undertakes frequent business trips to the United Kingdom and other member states of the European Union.

f 10. Before Catherine's birth, the couple had only one child, Huixiang Zhu, who was born in the People's Republic of China in 1998. Mr and Mrs Chen had decided to have a second child, but came up against obstacles inherent in the birth control policy—the 'one child policy'—adopted by the People's Republic of China to dissuade couples living in China from having a second child.

g 11. In 2000, in order to ensure that the birth of her second child would not give rise to any of the negative repercussions associated with the above-mentioned demographic policy, Mrs Chen decided to give birth abroad and for that purpose travelled to the United Kingdom.

12. Catherine came into the world on 16 September 2000, in Belfast, Northern Ireland.

h 13. The choice of the place of birth was no accident. It is noteworthy that, when certain conditions are fulfilled, anyone born within the territory of the island of Ireland, even outside the political boundaries of Ireland, Eire, acquires Irish nationality. As is apparent from the file, it was specifically because of that particular feature of Irish law, brought to their attention by the lawyers they consulted, that Mr and Mrs Chen decided to arrange for their child to be born in Belfast. They intended to take advantage of the child's Community nationality in order to ensure that she and her mother would be able to establish themselves in the United Kingdom.

i 14. Catherine in fact met the above-mentioned conditions laid down by Irish law and therefore acquired Irish nationality and, as a result, citizenship of the Union. However, she did not acquire United Kingdom nationality because she did not meet the requirements laid down for that purpose by the relevant United Kingdom legislation.

15. After moving to Cardiff with her child, Mrs Chen applied to the United Kingdom authorities for a permit to enable her and her child Catherine to reside in the United Kingdom. a 16. Those applications were rejected by decision of the Secretary of State of 15 June 2000. Catherine and her mother appealed to the Immigration Appellate Authority.

17. That Authority found that the contested decision was, in principle, in conformity with the relevant national law. However, certain circumstances prompted it to query whether it was also compatible with Community law. b

18. It noted, in essence, that Catherine, as a citizen of the Union, could be vested with a right of residence conferred on her directly by provisions of Community law; her mother, for her part, might enjoy a right deriving from her child's right, in so far as she is primarily responsible for her care and upbringing. c

19. More specifically, with regard to the child, the question arises whether the right to remain in the United Kingdom derives primarily from her status as a recipient of services within the meaning of Directive 73/148: Catherine is a recipient in the United Kingdom of child-care services and medical services provided privately in return for payment. d

20. In addition, the mother and child, who have always lived under the same roof, constitute an economically self-sufficient family unit, thanks to the resources made available by the mother. There is no charge on public United Kingdom funds, nor does it seem reasonable to conclude that there will be in the future. Both are covered by sickness insurance. The possibility cannot therefore be ruled out, according to the Immigration Authority, that they enjoy a right of residence under Directive 90/364. e

21. Finally, the Immigration Authority observes that Catherine is entitled to enter the territory of the People's Republic of China for not more than 30 days at a time and then only with permission from the government of that country, of which she is not a national. To deny the child or her mother a right to reside in the United Kingdom could therefore constitute unlawful interference with their family life, because the possibility of their continuing to live together would thereby be significantly undermined. f

22. For those reasons, the Immigration Appellate Authority referred the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling: g

'(1) On the facts of the present case, does Article 1 of Council Directive 73/148/EEC or in the alternative Article 1 of Council Directive 90/364/EEC: (a) confer the right on the First Appellant, who is a minor and a citizen of the Union, to enter and reside in the host Member State? (b) and if so, does it consequently confer the right on the Second Appellant, a third country national who is the First Appellant's mother and primary carer, to reside with the First Appellant (i) as her dependent relative, or (ii) because she lived with the First Appellant in her country of origin, or (iii) on any other special basis? h

(2) If and to the extent that the First Appellant is not a "national of a Member State" for purposes of exercising Community rights pursuant to Council Directive 73/148/EEC or Article 1 of Council Directive 90/364/EEC, what then are the relevant criteria for identifying whether a child, who is a citizen of the Union, is a national of a Member State for purposes of exercising Community rights? i a (3) In the circumstances of the present case, does the receipt of child care by the First Appellant constitute services for purposes of Council Directive 73/148/EEC?

b (4) In the circumstances of the present case, is the First Appellant precluded from residing in the host State pursuant to Article 1 of Council Directive 90/364/EEC because her resources are provided exclusively by her third country national parent who accompanies her?

c (5) On the special facts of this case does Article 18(1) EC give the First Appellant the right to enter and reside in the host Member State even when she does not qualify for residence in the host State under any other provision of EU law?

d (6) If so, does the Second Appellant consequently enjoy the right to remain with the First Appellant, during that time<sup>4</sup> in the host State?

(7) In this context, what is the effect of the principle of respect for fundamental human rights under Community law claimed by the Appellants, in particular where the Appellants rely on Article 8 [European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998)] that everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life and his home in conjunction with Article 14 [of the convention] given that the First Appellant cannot live in China with the Second Appellant and her father and brother?

e 23. In the proceedings before the Court of Justice, observations were submitted by the appellants in the main proceedings, and by Ireland, the United Kingdom and the Commission of the European Communities.

IV—ASSESSMENT

A—Preliminary observations

f 24. As I have already stated and as is confirmed by the account of the facts, this is certainly an unusual case whose features are so singular that the discussions between the parties have to some extent been influenced by that fact. On occasion, the parties have seemed more concerned with seeking similarly individualistic solutions than with verifying whether the more unusual aspects of the case might not be brought within the usual rules and principles of Community law, as defined by the case law of the court. As we shall see below, that is precisely the course which, in my opinion, should be followed in replying to the questions raised by Catherine's circumstances.

g 25. To that end, it is necessary in the first place to consolidate the various questions submitted by the Immigration Appellate Authority so as to highlight the essential issues brought before this court and also to ensure that they are dealt with in an orderly manner.

h It seems to me that this can be done by extracting from those questions two main issues which can be summarised in the following terms: (a) whether Catherine is entitled to reside permanently in the United Kingdom as a recipient of services, within the meaning of Directive 73/148, or as a Community national who is not active but has at her disposal sufficient resources and sickness insurance, within the meaning of Directive 90/364, or, finally, directly on the basis of art 18 EC; (b) and whether her mother has a right of residence as being 'a dependent member of the family' of the child for the purposes of the above-mentioned directive or as Catherine's primary carer, or, finally, on the basis of the right to respect for family life upheld by art 8 European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998).

26. I shall therefore now deal with the questions raised by the Immigration Authority on the basis of the approach outlined above, taking into account, when and where necessary or appropriate, the arguments put forward by those who have submitted observations in these proceedings.

27. However, before examining those questions, I must spend some time on an objection of inadmissibility raised by the United Kingdom government.

28. The United Kingdom government has raised the preliminary objection that the court has no jurisdiction to give a ruling on the questions submitted by the Immigration Appellate Authority because the dispute relates to a purely internal situation. The only foreign element, namely the nationality of the child, is in its opinion the result of a subterfuge resorted to by Mr and Mrs Chen, which should be seen as an abuse of law.

29. I shall for the moment leave aside the latter point, that being a matter which may well become clearer after I have examined the merits of the questions submitted (see below, para 108 et seq).

30. Turning instead to the objection concerning the purely internal nature of the facts, I would observe that, according to the United Kingdom government, the appellants have never exercised the freedom of movement granted to them by the Treaty because they have never left the United Kingdom to go to another member state. Therefore there are no foreign elements of such a kind as to render Community law applicable to the applications for residence permits at issue.

31. My view, however, is that that objection cannot be upheld.

32. It should be borne in mind, first, that, according to settled Community case law, the fact of possessing the nationality of a member state other than the one in which a person resides is sufficient to render Community law applicable, even where the person relying on those provisions has never crossed the frontiers of the member state in which he lives<sup>5</sup>.

33. In particular, in its recent judgment in Garcia Avello v Belgium Case C-148/02 [2004] All ER (EC) 740, after stating that '[c]itizenship of the Union, established by art 17 EC, is not ... intended to extend the scope of the Treaty also to internal situations which have no link with Community law'<sup>6</sup>, the court made it clear that '[s]uch a link with Community law does, however, exist in regard to ... nationals of one member state lawfully resident in the territory of another member state'<sup>7</sup>, and that is the case regardless of whether they have exercised the freedom of movement provided for by the Treaty or, as in that case, had lived since birth in the territory of the host member state.

a 34. Catherine's Irish nationality is therefore sufficient to establish that the proceedings between her, with her mother, and the Secretary of State are not purely internal to United Kingdom law.

b 35. A different conclusion might possibly be reached only if it were considered that Catherine does not in fact possess Irish nationality or that in some way the fact of such nationality could not be relied on against the United Kingdom government.

c 36. However, at no stage of the proceedings, either before the Immigration Authority or before this court, has there ever been any doubt that Catherine does possess Irish nationality, and likewise the United Kingdom government has not challenged the legality, from the point of view of international or Community law, of the grant of that nationality by the Irish state.

d 37. In those circumstances, it is not necessary to express any view as to the existence or otherwise of any provision of general international law to the effect that no state is required to recognise nationality granted to an individual by another state in the absence of a real and effective link between the individual and that state<sup>8</sup>.

e 38. I shall merely point out that, as regards Community law, the court has held in its judgments in Micheletti v Delegación del Gobierno en Cantabria<sup>9</sup> and R (on the application of Kaur) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept (JUSTICE, intervening)<sup>10</sup> that '[u]nder international law, it is for each Member State, having due regard to Community law, to lay down the conditions for the acquisition and loss of nationality'<sup>11</sup>, and that therefore—

f 'it is not permissible for the legislation of a Member State to restrict the effects of the grant of the nationality of another Member State by imposing an additional condition for recognition of that nationality with a view to the exercise of the fundamental freedoms provided for in the Treaty.'<sup>12</sup>

g 39. I think that therefore it can be concluded that, in view of Catherine's Irish nationality, the dispute pending before the Immigration Authority falls, as a matter of principle, within the scope of the Treaty, and that the objection of inadmissibility raised by the United Kingdom government must therefore be rejected.

h C—Catherine's right of residence

40. That said, and moving on to the merits of the questions set out above (para 25(a)), the first point to be dealt with is what rights of movement and residence are available under Community law to a child, like Catherine, who is a national of one member state of the Union and has lived since birth in another member state.

8 In support of such a rule, in relation to matters of diplomatic protection, see the well-known judgment of the International Court of Justice in the Nottebohm case: Lichtenstein v Guatemala (second phase) (1955) ICJ Rep 4, in particular at p 20 et seq.

11 Micheletti's case (para 10), Kaur's case (para 19). That finding, it should be noted, is entirely consistent with the case law of the International Court of Justice, according to which '[i]t is ... for every sovereign state to settle by its own legislation the rules relating to the acquisition of its nationality' (the Nottebohm case (p 20), cited above).

12 Micheletti's case (para 10) and, more recently, Garcia Avello's case (para 28).

—Can a minor be vested with rights of movement and residence?

41. In that connection, the Irish government appears to object that, as a matter of principle, Catherine could not invoke the rights of movement and residence provided for by the Treaty.

42. If I have correctly understood that government's reasoning, it considers that, given her tender age, Catherine is not in fact capable of independently exercising the right to choose a place of residence and establish herself there<sup>13</sup>. Consequently, she cannot be regarded as a person entitled to the rights accorded to nationals of a member state by Directive 90/364<sup>14</sup>.

43. I do not agree with that reasoning. I think it derives from a confusion between the capacity of a person to be the subject of rights and obligations (legal personality)<sup>15</sup> and the capacity of that person to take action which produces legal effects (legal capacity)<sup>16</sup>.

44. The fact that a minor cannot exercise a right independently does not mean that he has no capacity to be an addressee of the legal provision on which that right is founded.

45. The line of reasoning should instead follow the opposite course. Because, according to a general principle which is common to the legal systems of the member states (and not only to them), legal capacity is acquired at birth, even a minor is a subject of law and, as such, is therefore a holder of the rights conferred by law.

46. The fact that he is not in a position to exercise those rights independently does not detract from his status as the holder of those rights. On the contrary, it is precisely because he has that status that other persons, appointed by operation of law (parents, guardian, etc), will be able to give effect to his rights and will be able to do so not because they are the holders of those rights but because they are acting on behalf of the minor, that is, they are acting on behalf of the sole and actual holder of those rights.

47. In the present case, however, the argument put forward by the Irish government is not only not supported by any textual provision but is likewise not justified by the nature of the rights and freedoms in question. That argument appears to be incompatible with the aims pursued by the relevant provisions of the Treaty, namely art 49 EC et seq (formerly art 59 of the EC Treaty) as regards the free movement of services and art 18 EC as regards the right of residence of nationals of the Union.

48. As regards art 49 EC et seq, it is clear that one of the objectives of the freedom for which they provide is precisely that of facilitating the movement of persons who must travel in order to receive supplies of services<sup>17</sup>.

a 49. It must be pointed out that a minor, even one who is very young, can indeed be the recipient of a wide range of services, including services of very great importance (for example, medical treatment).

50. For that very reason, the minor will be the holder of the rights conferred by art 49 EC et seq, as a recipient of services.

b 51. As regards, next, the provisions on the right of residence, I would observe that art 18 EC, supplemented by art 1 of Directive 90/364, seeks to guarantee for every Community national—who satisfies certain conditions—the right to establish himself in any member state, even if he does not want or is not able to carry on any economic activity.

c 52. Having regard to the points I clarified earlier (para 43 et seq), there is no reason to deprive a minor of a right conferred in general terms on all Community citizens by a fundamental provision of Community law, such as art 18 EC. Thus, if the conditions laid down by the directive are satisfied, even a minor can claim the right to reside freely, as an economically non-active person, in a member state other than the one whose nationality he possesses.

d 53. Moreover, that is confirmed by the case law of the Court of Justice, by virtue of which there is no doubt that minors can be vested with residence rights. In the case of Echternach (GBC) v Netherlands Minister for Education and Science<sup>18</sup>, for example, it was explicitly stated that a minor who was the son of a worker who had in the meantime left the host country ‘retains the right to rely on the provisions of Community law’, which allow him to remain in that country to complete studies already commenced<sup>19</sup>.

e 54. And that outcome cannot vary according to the age of the minor because, as far as the relevant principles are concerned, the situation does not change.

55. I conclude therefore that even a very young minor like Catherine can be vested with rights of movement and residence within the Community.

f —The existence of a right of residence in Catherine’s specific case

56. Following those considerations of a general nature, it is now necessary to establish whether, in the present case, Catherine may invoke a right of residence (i) as a recipient of services within the meaning of Directive 73/148 or (ii) on the basis of art 18 EC and Directive 90/364.

g 57. (i) Let me start by saying that Catherine’s right to reside permanently in the United Kingdom could not be based on her status as a recipient of child-care services and medical services (see para 19, above).

h 58. So far as concerns the first category of services, even if we disregard the problem of identifying the recipient of the services, who would appear in fact to be her mother, it is clear from the file that the services in question are not provided on a temporary basis, but on a long-term and continuous basis.

59. However, as the Commission rightly pointed out, the Community case law has long since made it clear that the freedom to provide services cannot be invoked in relation to ‘an activity carried out on a permanent basis or, in any event, without a foreseeable limit to its duration'<sup>20</sup>, because in such circumstances it would be the provisions of the Treaty on freedom of establishment that would come into play. That is true, primarily, for the provider, but it is also clearly valid, with greater reason, for the recipient of services, who can invoke that freedom only if he does not intend to establish himself definitively in the host country<sup>21</sup>. a

i 18. Joined cases 389/87 and 390/87 [1989] ECR 723.

19. The Echternach case (para 21). That case concerned Council Regulation (EEC) 1612/68 (on the free movement of workers within the Community) (OJ English Sp Ed 1968 (II) p 475), art 12 of which provides: ‘The children of a national of a Member State who is or has been employed in the territory of another Member State shall be admitted to that State’s general educational, apprenticeship and vocational training courses under the same conditions as the nationals of that State, if such children are residing in its territory.’

60. But a right of permanent residence likewise could not be established for Catherine in relation to medical services. Such services, by their very nature, are provided for a limited period. If, therefore, she was in fact the recipient of those services (and there is no clear indication in the file that she is), Catherine could claim, on the basis of the explicit provisions of the first subparagraph of art 4(2) of Directive 73/148, only the right to remain in the United Kingdom for the periods necessary to receive that treatment. b

61. In other words, she could claim a temporary right of residence of 'equal duration with the period during which the services are provided' but could not, under that directive, obtain a long-term residence permit. c

62. (ii) The question remains to be considered whether Catherine may claim a right of residence in the United Kingdom under art 18 EC and Directive 90/364. d

63. Article 18 EC, it will be remembered, confers on every citizen of the Union the right to move and reside freely in the territory of the member states, subject to the limitations and conditions laid down by the Treaty and by the rules of secondary law.

64. For the purposes of this case, those limits and conditions are defined by Directive 90/364. e

65. Article 1, in particular, by granting 'the right of residence to nationals of member states who do not enjoy this right under other provisions of Community law', imposes the condition—

'that they themselves and the members of their families are covered by sickness insurance in respect of all risks in the host Member State and have sufficient resources to avoid becoming a burden on the social assistance system of the host Member State during their period of residence.' f

66. As is apparent from the order for reference, Catherine is covered by adequate sickness insurance and also has, through the members of her family, sufficient resources to obviate any danger that she might become 'a burden on the social assistance system of the host Member State during [her] period of residence'. g

67. It would therefore appear that both the requirements laid down by the directive are fulfilled.

68. That is not, however, the opinion of the governments which have submitted observations: they consider that Catherine is not economically self-sufficient because the financial resources available to her are in fact provided to her by her mother. h

69. According to those governments, the right of residence created by Directive 90/364 is essentially limited to those persons who 'in [their] own right' have income or earnings which guarantee the availability of sufficient resources. i a 70. I must, however, observe, as the Commission rightly points out, that no such limitation on the right of residence is to be found in the wording of the directive, which in fact confines itself to requiring that those who claim that right 'have sufficient resources'<sup>22</sup>.

21 Steymann's case (para 17) and Sodemare SA v Regione Lombardia Case C-70/95 [1997] ECR I-3395 (para 38).

71. Nor, moreover, does it seem to me that such a limitation is consistent with the purposes of the directive.

b 72. The directive was adopted to extend the scope of the right of movement and residence to all Community nationals, subject to certain limitations designed to ensure that they do not 'become an unreasonable burden on the public finances of the host Member State' (see the fourth recital).

c 73. Following the introduction by the Maastricht Treaty of art 8a of the EC treaty, now art 18 EC, freedom of movement and residence came to be declared as fundamental rights of Community nationals, albeit subject to the limits and conditions laid down by (inter alia) Directive 90/364.

d 74. In that new context, that directive has thus become a measure which limits the exercise of a fundamental right. The conditions imposed by it must therefore be interpreted restrictively, in the same way as all exceptions and limitations imposed on the freedoms upheld by the Treaty. There is therefore no question of stretching its text so far as to incorporate in it a condition not expressly laid down, like the one contended for by the governments involved in this case.

e 75. That is not all. As the court recognised in its judgment in Baumbast v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, 'the exercise of the right of residence of citizens of the Union can be subordinated to the legitimate interests of the member states'<sup>23</sup>—

f '[h]owever, those limitations and conditions must be applied in compliance with the limits imposed by Community law and in accordance with the general principles of that law, in particular the principle of proportionality. That means that national measures adopted on that subject must be necessary and appropriate to attain the objective pursued

g 76. It seems to me that an interpretation of the directive like that proposed by the United Kingdom and by Ireland would unnecessarily hamper the pursuit of the objectives of the directive.

h 77. What is important is to ensure that the citizens of the Union who exercise freedom of movement do not become a burden on the finances of the host state. Whilst therefore it is necessary to that end that they should 'have' sufficient financial resources, it is not, on the other hand, necessary to seek to impose the further condition—which, moreover, is difficult to define clearly—that those resources must belong to them directly.

i 78. In conclusion, I am of the opinion that the court's answer to the Immigration Authority should be to the effect that a very young minor who is a Community national and is covered by sickness insurance covering all risks in the host member state and who, although not directly possessing income or earnings in his own right, nevertheless has at his disposal, through his parents,

24 See Baumbast's case (para 91). To the same effect, see the earlier judgment in Allué v Università degli Studi di Venezia Joined cases C-259/91, C-331/91 and C-332/91 [1993] ECR I-4309 (para 15).

sufficient resources to ensure that he will not become a burden on the finances of the host member state, meets the requirements laid down by art 1 of Directive 90/364 and therefore enjoys a right to reside for an indeterminate period in the territory of a member state other than the one of which he is a national. a

79. We now come to the question of Catherine's mother's right of residence.

80. It seems to me to be beyond question, as a starting point, that Mrs Chen, as a national of a non-member country, is unable to invoke the right of residence granted to Community nationals by art 1(1)(b) of Directive 73/148 (see para 4, above) and by art 1(1) of Directive 90/364 (see para 6, above). c

81. That said, there is likewise no possibility that Mrs Chen could invoke the right of residence provided for by art 1(1)(d) of Directive 73/148 and by art 1(2)(b) of Directive 90/364 in favour of 'dependent' relatives in the ascending line of Community citizens with a right of residence, regardless of their nationality. d

82. The Community case law has made it clear that a 'dependent' family member is one who is dependent on material resources supplied by another member of the family<sup>25</sup>.

83. That clearly is not the case here, since Mrs Chen is financially self-sufficient and indeed it is she herself who ensures that her daughter's material needs are satisfied. e

84. Nor can it be concluded, contrary to what may be inferred from the order for reference, that the concept of a dependent family member includes people who are 'emotionally dependent' on the Community national who has a right of residence or those persons whose right to remain in a member state 'depends' on the right of the Community national. f

85. Even if we were to ignore the case law of the Court of Justice just referred to, I would observe that only the English language version uses a neutral term like 'dependent' whereas, as the Commission correctly points out, in all the other language versions the term used relates unambiguously to material dependency. g

86. In the present case, therefore, Mrs Chen cannot be described as a 'dependent member' of Catherine's family within the meaning of the directive, notwithstanding the undoubted emotional bond that exists between her and her daughter and notwithstanding the fact that any right she may have to remain is linked to that of her daughter.

87. It seems to me, therefore, that neither Directive 73/148 nor Directive 90/364 confers directly upon Mrs Chen a permanent right of residence in the United Kingdom. h

88. It remains to be considered whether Catherine's mother could invoke a right of residence deriving from that of her daughter. i

89. Let me say straight away that in my opinion that question should be answered in the affirmative.

a 90. I consider that the opposite conclusion would be manifestly contrary to the interests of the minor and to the requirement of respecting the unity of family life. But above all, it would deprive of any useful effect the right of residence conferred by the Treaty upon Catherine because clearly, since she cannot remain alone in the United Kingdom, she would otherwise ultimately be unable to enjoy that right.

b 91. Those same considerations also appear to inspire the Community case law. In Baumbast's case, the court recognised that 'where children have the right to reside in a host member state' Community law 'entitl[es] the parent who is the primary carer of those children, irrespective of his nationality, to reside with them in order to facilitate the exercise of that right'<sup>26</sup>. It is clear that if a similar conclusion was valid in a case like the one cited concerning children of school age, a fortiori it must be valid in the case of a very young child like Catherine.

c 92. The rationale of the above-mentioned case law lies, of course, above all in the requirement of protecting the interests of the minor, having regard to the fact that it is precisely that purpose which must be pursued when the power granted to the parents (or guardian) to choose the place of establishment of the minor on behalf of the latter is exercised.

d 93. If she were denied a right of residence in Great Britain, the mother would only be able to exercise the right of establishment in the territory of that state on Catherine's behalf in a manner manifestly contrary to the interests of her daughter, because in such a case the child would automatically have to be abandoned by her mother.

e 94. For the same reason, therefore, that denial would likewise contravene the principle of respect for the unity of family life, as laid down by art 8 of the convention<sup>27</sup> to which the Court of Justice itself attributes fundamental importance<sup>28</sup>.

f 95. In order to preclude such a result, therefore, Mrs Chen would simply have to decline to exercise the right of her daughter to establish her residence in Great Britain. That means, however, that, contrary to the case law just referred to, the right of movement and residence attaching to the Irish national Catherine under art 18 EC and Directive 90/364 would not only not be 'facilitated' but would even be deprived of any useful effect.

g 96. For that reason alone, therefore, I consider that Catherine's mother may invoke a right of residence derived from her daughter's right.

—The prohibition of discrimination on grounds of nationality

h 97. Furthermore, it seems to me that the grant to Mrs Chen of a right of residence is decisively supported by art 12 EC (formerly art 6 of the EC Treaty), which prohibits, within the scope of the Treaty, any discrimination on grounds of nationality.

98. I consider that in this case all the conditions for the application of that provision are satisfied.

i <sup>26</sup> See Baumbast's case (para 75) (my emphasis). That case concerned a parent of United States nationality.

99. In the first place, the present dispute indubitably falls within the scope of the Treaty since it concerns the right of a Community national to reside in the territory of a member state pursuant to art 18 EC and Directive 90/364; and that is also true as regards the mother's right of residence which, as we have seen, is inextricably linked with that of her daughter. a

100. It should then be noted that, according to settled case law, the prohibition of discrimination 'requires that comparable situations must not be treated differently and that different situations must not be treated in the same way'.<sup>29</sup> b

101. As has become clear in the course of these proceedings and particularly at the hearing, if Catherine were a British national<sup>30</sup>, her mother, although a national of a non-member country, would be entitled to remain with her daughter in the United Kingdom. c

102. That means that, if other things were equal from a factual point of view and thus there were an 'analogous situation', the nationality of the child would give rise to favourable treatment of her mother's application for a residence permit.

103. There is no objective justification for different treatment in the present case. d

104. If a national of a non-member country, being the mother of an English child, is entitled purely because of that circumstance to remain in the United Kingdom, that position clearly derives from the fundamental role of a mother in caring for and bringing up her child, and, in more general terms, is based on reasons of protection of the family and family unity. e

105. Such considerations apply equally, however, to a case like the present one, in which the child, although not able to derive its right of residence directly from British nationality, nevertheless enjoys a right of permanent residence in the United Kingdom by reason of her Community citizenship. It is entirely clear that the irreplaceable role of a mother in caring for and bringing up a very young minor does not in any way depend upon the nationality of the child. f

106. Therefore, in the absence of objective reasons which might justify differing treatment of the mother's application for a residence permit on the basis of the nationality of her child, it must be concluded that the United Kingdom measures in question constitute discrimination on grounds of nationality contrary to art 12 EC. g

—Final considerations

107. I therefore propose, in conclusion, that the answer to be given to the Immigration Authority is that a measure whereby the authorities of a member state reject an application for a long-term residence permit submitted by the mother of a Community national who is a minor and has a right of residence in that member state not only renders ineffective the right granted to the minor by art 18 EC and by art 1 of Directive 90/364 but also constitutes discrimination on grounds of nationality prohibited by art 12 EC. h

<sup>30</sup> Such a hypotheses is entirely realistic: for that purpose, it would have been sufficient if the other parent had had British nationality or, although a foreigner, had a right of permanent residence in the United Kingdom (s 1 of the British Nationality Act 1981: see note 8 to the United Kingdom's observations submitted to the court). i

108. As I have already stated (see para 28 et seq), the United Kingdom government also objected that Mr and Mrs Chen had arranged for their daughter to be born in Northern Ireland with the manifest intention of ensuring that she would acquire Irish nationality and thereby the right of residence in another member state of the Community. Catherine's Irish nationality is therefore 'contrived', being the result of a specific plan put into effect by her parents in order to acquire a right of residence in the Community.

109. It is clear from the case law of the court that a member state is entitled to adopt measures designed to ensure that people do not use the opportunities offered by the Treaty to take advantage, improperly or fraudulently, of Community law in order to escape the effects of national laws<sup>31</sup>.

110. In the present case, it is alleged that there has been an abuse of law which is liable to affect the outcome of these proceedings.

111. For my part, however, I am unable to endorse that view, and that would be the case even if I were to disregard the reservations of a general nature prompted by the transposition to Community level of a concept whose existence is a matter of dispute in national systems of law and of which the definition is even less certain.

112. However, even if the United Kingdom's reasoning were to be taken into consideration, it seems to me that the scheme of the relationship between Community law and the laws of the member states, as now clearly defined over several decades of case law of the court, necessarily implies that it is only in exceptional circumstances that the exercise of a right conferred by the Treaty can constitute an abuse, because the non-application of a national provision as a result of reliance on a right conferred by Community law constitutes the normal consequence of the principle of the supremacy of Community law.

113. Nor does the fact that a person knowingly places himself in a situation which causes a right deriving from Community law to arise in his favour, in order to avoid the application of certain national legislation unfavourable to him, constitute, in itself, a sufficient basis for the relevant Community provisions to be rendered inapplicable<sup>32</sup>.

114. For it to be possible to speak of an abuse of law, there must, in contrast, also be an underlying 'combination of objective circumstances' in which 'despite formal observance of the conditions laid down by the Community rules, the purpose of those rules has not been achieved'<sup>33</sup>. In other words, it must be ascertained whether the person concerned, by invoking the Community provision which grants the right in question, is betraying its spirit and scope.

115. The test is therefore, essentially, whether or not there has been a distortion of the purposes and objectives of the Community provision which grants the right in question.

116. In my opinion, those conditions are not fulfilled. I do not consider that the conduct of Mr and Mrs Chen can be regarded as being such as to imply

<sup>33</sup> Emsland-Stärke GmbH v Hauptzollamt Hamburg-Jonas Case C-110/99 [2000] ECR I-11569 (para 52). To the same effect, see the Centros case (para 25), and X v Riksskatteverket Case C-436/00 (2002) 5 ITLR 433, [2002] ECR I-10829 (para 42).

'circumvention of national law by Community nationals improperly or fraudulently invoking Community law'<sup>34</sup>. a

117. It is true that Mrs Chen, in availing herself of the Treaty provisions which grant a right of residence to Catherine and, by ricochet, to herself as the child's mother, is ultimately circumventing the United Kingdom provisions which restrict the right of residence of nationals of non-member countries.

118. However, that does not, in my opinion, involve any distortion of the purposes of the Community provisions relied on. b

119. The aim pursued by the provisions on the right of residence, in particular art 18 EC, as implemented by Directive 90/364 and taken up in art 45 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union (OJ 2000 C364 p 1), is entirely clear. Its purpose is to eliminate any restriction on the movement and residence of Community nationals, subject to the sole condition that they must not constitute a financial burden for the host state. c

120. When a future parent decides, as in the present case, that the welfare of his or her child requires the acquisition of Community nationality in order to allow him to enjoy the rights associated with that status, and in particular the right of establishment under art 18 EC, there is nothing 'abusive' about taking action, in compliance with the law, to ensure that the child, when born, satisfies the conditions for acquiring the nationality of a member state. d

121. Likewise, the fact that such a parent takes action to ensure that his or her daughter can exercise her legitimately acquired right of residence and consequently applies to be allowed to reside with her in the same host state cannot be classified as 'abusive'. e

122. This is not a case of people 'improperly or fraudulently invoking Community law'<sup>35</sup>, failing to observe the scope and purposes of the provisions of that legal system, but rather one of people who, apprised of the nature of the freedoms provided for by Community law, take advantage of them by legitimate means, specifically in order to attain the objective which the Community provision seeks to uphold: the child's right of residence. f

123. Nor can the non-application to the mother of the United Kingdom provisions on residence of nationals of non-member countries be regarded as following on from of an abuse of law. As has been seen, that result is entirely consistent with the purpose of the Community provision in question and is even a necessary precondition for the attainment of that objective, in so far as it allows Community nationals to be assured of the right to reside freely in the territory of a member state. g

124. The fact is that the problem, if problem there be, lies in the criterion used by the Irish legislation for granting nationality, the ius soli<sup>36</sup>, which lends itself to the emergence of situations like the one at issue in this case.

125. In order to avoid such situations, the criterion could have been moderated by the addition of a condition of settled residence of the parent h

34 Abuse of Community law was thus defined in R (on the application of Gloszczuk) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept Case C-63/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 353, [2001] ECR I-6369 (para 75). My emphasis. i

36 On the other hand, no importance, for the purposes of this case, attaches to the fact that the 'land' to which the ius soli relates, namely Belfast, as a result of the well-known history of Ireland, is under the sovereignty not of Ireland (Eire) but of the United Kingdom. The issues would have been the same if the child had been born in the territory of Ireland (Eire) and had then moved to Belfast or Cardiff with her mother.

a within the territory of the island of Ireland<sup>37</sup>. But there is no such additional condition in Irish legislation, or in any event no such condition was applicable to Catherine.

126. In those circumstances, I repeat, there is certainly no basis for criticising Catherine or her mother for legitimately taking advantage of the opportunities and rights available to them under Community law.

b 127. Furthermore, if the United Kingdom's argument were accepted, suspicions of abuse could be raised in almost all cases of intentional acquisition of nationality of a member state. And, paradoxically, that could lead to a situation in which the enjoyment of rights deriving from citizenship of the Union was subject to the condition that such citizenship had to have been acquired involuntarily.

c 128. But that would be equivalent—

‘to restrict[ing] the effects of the grant of the nationality of another Member State by imposing an additional condition for recognition of that nationality with a view to the exercise of the fundamental freedoms provided for in the Treaty.’

d And as the court has made clear, that is not allowed in the Community legal order<sup>38</sup>.

e 129. To my way of thinking, therefore, the answer to be given to the Immigration Authority must not be influenced by the fact that Mr and Mrs Chen arranged for their daughter to be born in Northern Ireland specifically in order to ensure that she acquired Irish nationality and as a result the right to reside in the United Kingdom and the other member states of the Community.

F—The right to respect for family life

f 130. Having concluded that Community law grants to Catherine the right to establish herself in the United Kingdom and to her mother the right to remain with her daughter, I consider that it is unnecessary to go into the question of the compatibility of the national measures with the convention. The interpretation of the Treaty proposed here is, as has been seen, entirely in conformity with the values embodied in art 8 of the convention and in particular the requirement of respecting the unity of family life (see para 94, above).

V—CONCLUSION

h 131. I therefore suggest that the Court of Justice give the following answers to the questions referred to it by the Immigration Appellate Authority, Hatton Cross:

37 As, it may be noted incidentally, is provided in art 1 and annex 2 to the 'Agreement between the government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the government of Ireland signed at Belfast on 10 April 1998. Article 1(vi) provides that the two governments 'recognise the birthright of all the people of Northern Ireland to identify themselves and be accepted as Irish or British, or both, as they may so choose, and accordingly confirm that their right to hold both British and Irish citizenship is accepted by both governments and would not be affected by any future change in the status of Northern Ireland'. Annex 2 states that the term 'the people of Northern Ireland' in art 1 of the agreement means 'all persons born in Northern Ireland and having, at the time of their birth, at least one parent who is a British citizen, an Irish citizen or is otherwise entitled to reside in Northern Ireland without any restriction on their period of residence'. (My emphasis.)

38 See Micheletti's case (para 10), cited in footnote 9, above, see Kaur's case (para 19), cited in footnote 10, above.

(1) A very young minor who is a Community national and is covered by sickness insurance covering all risks in the host member state and who although not directly entitled to income or earnings in her own right, nevertheless has at her disposal, through her parents, sufficient resources to ensure that she will not become a burden on the finances of the host member state, meets the requirements laid down by art 1 of Council Directive (EEC) 90/364 (on a right of residence) and therefore enjoys a right to reside for an indeterminate period in the territory of a member state other than that of which she is a national. a

(2) A measure whereby the authorities of a member state reject an application for a long-term residence permit submitted by the mother of a Community national who is a minor and has a right of residence in that member state not only renders ineffective the right granted to the minor by art 18 EC and by art 1 of Directive 90/364 but also constitutes discrimination on grounds of nationality prohibited by art 12 EC. b

19 October 2004. The COURT OF JUSTICE delivered the following judgment.

1. This reference for a preliminary ruling concerns the interpretation of Council Directive (EEC) 73/148 (on the abolition of restrictions on movement and residence within the Community for nationals of member states with regard to establishment and the provision of services) (OJ 1973 L172 p 14), of Council Directive (EEC) 90/364 (on the right of residence) (OJ 1990 L180 p 26) and of art 18 EC (formerly art 8a of the EC Treaty). c

2. The reference was made in the course of proceedings brought by Kunqian Catherine Zhu (hereinafter Catherine), of Irish nationality, and her mother, Man Lavette Chen (hereinafter Mrs Chen), a Chinese national, against the Secretary of State for the Home Department concerning the latter's rejection of applications by Catherine and Mrs Chen for a long-term permit to reside in the United Kingdom. d

Community legislation

3. Article 1 of Directive 73/148 provides:

'1. The Member States shall, acting as provided in this Directive, abolish restrictions on the movement and residence of:

(a) nationals of a Member State who are established or who wish to establish themselves in another Member State in order to pursue activities as self-employed persons, or who wish to provide services in that State;

(b) nationals of Member States wishing to go to another Member State as recipients of services;

(c) the spouse and the children under twenty one years of age of such nationals, irrespective of their nationality;

(d) the relatives in the ascending and descending lines of such nationals and of the spouse of such nationals, which relatives are dependent on them, irrespective of their nationality.

2. Member States shall favour the admission of any other member of the family of a national referred to in paragraph 1(a) or (b) or of the spouse of that national, which member is dependent on that national or spouse of that national or who in the country of origin was living under the same roof.'

4. Article 4(2) of the same directive states:

a 'The right of residence for persons providing and receiving services shall be of equal duration with the period during which the services are provided.

Where such period exceeds three months, the Member State in the territory of which the services are performed shall issue a right of abode as proof of the right of residence.

b Where the period does not exceed three months, the identity card or passport with which the person concerned entered the territory shall be sufficient to cover his stay. The Member State may, however, require the person concerned to report his presence in the territory.'

5. Under art 1 of Directive 90/364:

c '1. Member States shall grant the right of residence to nationals of Member States who do not enjoy this right under other provisions of Community law and to members of their families as defined in paragraph 2, provided that they themselves and the members of their families are covered by sickness insurance in respect of all risks in the host Member State and have sufficient resources to avoid becoming a burden on the social assistance system of the host Member State during their period of residence.

d The resources referred to in the first subparagraph shall be deemed sufficient where they are higher than the level of resources below which the host Member State may grant social assistance to its nationals, taking into account the personal circumstances of the applicant and, where appropriate, the personal circumstances of persons admitted pursuant to paragraph 2.

e Where the second subparagraph cannot be applied in a Member State, the resources of the applicant shall be deemed sufficient if they are higher than the level of the minimum social security pension paid by the host Member State.

f 2. The following shall, irrespective of their nationality, have the right to install themselves in another Member State with the holder of the right of residence:

(a) his or her spouse and their descendants who are dependants;

g (b) dependent relatives in the ascending line of the holder of the right of residence and his or her spouse.'

The United Kingdom legislation

6. Under Regulation 5 of the Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2000, SI 2000/2326, (the EEA Regulations):

h '(1) In these Regulations, "qualified person" means a person who is an EEA national and in the United Kingdom as—(a) a worker; (b) a self employed person; (c) a provider of services; (d) a recipient of services; (e) a self sufficient person; (f) a retired person; (g) a student; or (h) a self employed person who has ceased activity; or who is a person to whom paragraph (4) applies.'

i THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND THE QUESTIONS REFERRED TO THE COURT OF JUSTICE

7. The order for reference states that Mrs Chen and her husband, both of Chinese nationality, work for a Chinese undertaking established in China. Mrs Chen's husband is a director and the majority shareholder of that company. For the purposes of his work, he travels frequently to various member states, in particular the United Kingdom. a

8. The couple's first child was born in the People's Republic of China in 1998. Mrs Chen, who wished to give birth to a second child, entered the United Kingdom in May 2000 when she was about six months pregnant. She went to Belfast in July of the same year and Catherine was born there on 16 September 2000. The mother and her child live at present in Cardiff, Wales (United Kingdom). b

9. Under s 6(1) of the Irish Nationality and Citizenship Act of 1956, which was amended in 2001 and applies retroactively as from 2 December 1999, Ireland allows any person born on the island of Ireland to acquire Irish nationality. Under s 6(3), a person born in the island of Ireland is an Irish citizen from birth if he or she is not entitled to citizenship of any other country. c

10. Under those rules, Catherine was issued with an Irish passport in September 2000. According to the order for reference, Catherine is not entitled, on the other hand, to acquire United Kingdom nationality since, in enacting the British Nationality Act 1981, the United Kingdom departed from the jus soli, so that birth in the territory of that member state no longer automatically confers United Kingdom nationality. d

11. It is common ground that Mrs Chen took up residence in the island of Ireland in order to enable the child she was expecting to acquire Irish nationality and, consequently, to enable her to acquire the right to reside, should the occasion arise, with her child in the United Kingdom.

12. The referring court also observes that Ireland forms part of the Common Travel Area within the meaning of the Immigration Acts, so that, because Irish nationals do not as a general rule have to obtain a permit to enter and reside in the United Kingdom, Catherine, in contrast to Mrs Chen, may move freely within the United Kingdom and within Ireland. Aside from Catherine's right of free movement limited to those two member states, neither of the appellants in the main proceedings is entitled to reside in the United Kingdom under its domestic legislation. e

13. The order for reference also makes it clear that Catherine is dependent both emotionally and financially on her mother, that her mother is her primary carer, that Catherine receives private medical services and child-care services in return for payment in the United Kingdom, that she lost the right to acquire Chinese nationality by virtue of having been born in Northern Ireland and her subsequent acquisition of Irish nationality and, as a result, that she only has the right to enter Chinese territory under a visa allowing residence for a maximum of 30 days per visit; that the two appellants in the main proceedings provide for their needs by reason of Mrs Chen's employment, that the appellants do not rely upon public funds in the United Kingdom and there is no realistic possibility of their becoming so reliant, and, finally, that the appellants are insured against ill health. f

14. The Secretary of State for the Home Department's refusal to grant a long-term residence permit to the two appellants in the main proceedings was based on the fact that Catherine, a child of eight months of age, was not exercising any rights arising from the EC Treaty such as those laid down by reg 5(1) of the EEA Regulations and the fact that Mrs Chen was not entitled to reside in the United Kingdom under those regulations. g

15. The decision not to grant a permit was the subject of an appeal to the Immigration Appellate Authority, which stayed the proceedings pending a preliminary ruling from the Court of Justice on the following questions: h

a (1) On the facts of the present case, does Article 1 of Council Directive 73/148/EEC or in the alternative Article 1 of Council Directive 90/364/EEC: (a) confer the right on the First Appellant, who is a minor and a citizen of the Union, to enter and reside in the host Member State? (b) and if so, does it consequently confer the right on the Second Appellant, a third country national who is the First Appellant's mother and primary carer, to reside with the First Appellant (i) as her dependent relative, or (ii) because she lived with the First Appellant in her country of origin, or (iii) on any other special basis?

b (2) If and to the extent that the First Appellant is not a "national of a Member State" for purposes of exercising Community rights pursuant to Council Directive 73/148/EEC or Article 1 of Council Directive 90/364/EEC, what then are the relevant criteria for identifying whether a child, who is a citizen of the Union, is a national of a Member State for purposes of exercising Community rights?

c (3) In the circumstances of the present case, does the receipt of child care by the First Appellant constitute services for purposes of Council Directive 73/148/EEC?

d (4) In the circumstances of the present case, is the First Appellant precluded from residing in the host State pursuant to Article 1 of Council Directive 90/364/EEC because her resources are provided exclusively by her third country national parent who accompanies her?

e (5) On the special facts of this case does Article 18(1) EC give the First Appellant the right to enter and reside in the host Member State even when she does not qualify for residence in the host State under any other provision of EU law?

f (6) If so, does the Second Appellant consequently enjoy the right to remain with the First Appellant, during that time in the host State?

g (7) In this context, what is the effect of the principle of respect for fundamental human rights under Community law claimed by the Appellants, in particular where the Appellants rely on Article 8 [of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998)] that everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life and his home in conjunction with Article 14 [of the convention] given that the First Appellant cannot live in China with the Second Appellant and her father and brother?

THE QUESTIONS REFERRED TO THE COURT OF JUSTICE

h 16. By those questions, the national court seeks in essence to ascertain whether Directive 73/148, Directive 90/364 or art 18 EC, if appropriate, read in conjunction with arts 8 and 14 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) (ECHR), confer, in circumstances such as those of the main proceedings, upon a young minor who is a national of a member state, and is in the care of a parent who is a national of a non-member country, the right to reside in another member state where the minor receives child-care services. If such right be conferred, the national court wishes to ascertain whether those same provisions consequently confer a right of residence on the parent concerned.

i 17. It is therefore necessary to examine the provisions of Community law concerning the right of residence in the light of the situation of a national not of legal age such as Catherine, and then that of a parent who is a national of a non-member country and looks after the child. a

The right of residence of a person in Catherine's situation

Preliminary considerations

18. The Irish and United Kingdom governments' contention that a person in Catherine's situation cannot claim the benefit of the provisions of Community law on free movement of persons and residence simply because that person has never moved from one member state to another member state must be rejected at the outset. b

19. The situation of a national of a member state who was born in the host member state and has not made use of the right to freedom of movement cannot, for that reason alone, be assimilated to a purely internal situation, thereby depriving that national of the benefit in the host member state of the provisions of Community law on freedom of movement and of residence (to that effect, see, in particular, Garcia Avello v Belgium Case C-148/02 [2004] All ER (EC) 740 (paras 13, 27)). c

20. Moreover, contrary to the Irish government's contention, a young child can take advantage of the rights of free movement and residence guaranteed by Community law. The capacity of a national of a member state to be the holder of rights guaranteed by the Treaty and by secondary law on the free movement of persons cannot be made conditional upon the attainment by the person concerned of the age prescribed for the acquisition of legal capacity to exercise those rights personally (to that effect, see, in particular, in the context of Council Regulation (EEC) 1612/68 (on freedom of movement for workers within the Community) (OJ English Sp Edn 1968 (II) p 475), Echternach (GBC) v Netherlands Minister for Education and Science Joined cases 389/87 and 390/87 [1989] ECR 723 (para 21) and Baumbast v Secretary of State for the Home Dept Case C-413/99 [2003] ICR 1347, [2002] ECR I-7091 (paras 52–63) and, in relation to art 17 EC (formerly art 8 of the EC Treaty), Garcia Avello's case (para 21)). Moreover, as Advocate General Tizzano made clear in paras 47 to 52 of his opinion, it does not follow either from the terms of, or from the aims pursued by, arts 18 and 49 EC and Directives 73/148 and 90/364 that the enjoyment of the rights with which those provisions are concerned should be made conditional upon the attainment of a minimum age. d e f g

21. The national court wishes to ascertain whether a person in Catherine's situation may rely on the provisions of Directive 73/148 with a view to residing on a long-term basis in the United Kingdom as a recipient of child-care services provided in return for payment. h

22. According to the case law of the court, the provisions on freedom to provide services do not cover the situation of a national of a member state who establishes his principal residence in the territory of another member state with a view to receiving services there for an indefinite period (to that effect, see, in particular, Steymann v Staatssecretaris van Justitie Case 196/87 [1988] ECR 6159). The child-care services to which the national court refers fall precisely within that case. i

23. As regards the medical services that Catherine is receiving on a temporary basis, it must be observed that, under the first subparagraph of art 4(2) of Directive 73/148, the right of residence of persons receiving services

- a by virtue of the freedom to provide services is co-terminous with the duration of the period for which they are provided. Consequently, that directive cannot in any event serve as a basis for a right of residence of indefinite duration of the kind with which the main proceedings are concerned.

Article 18 EC and Directive 90/364

- b 24. Since Catherine cannot rely on Directive 73/148 for a right of long-term residence in the United Kingdom, the national court would like to know whether Catherine might have a right to long-term residence under art 18 EC and under Directive 90/364, which, subject to certain conditions, guarantees such a right for nationals of member states to whom it is not available under other provisions of Community law, and for members of their families.

- c 25. By virtue of art 17(1) EC, every person holding the nationality of a member state is a citizen of the Union. Union citizenship is destined to be the fundamental status of nationals of the member states (see, in particular, Baumbast's case (para 82)).

- d 26. As regards the right to reside in the territory of the member states provided for in art 18(1) EC, it must be observed that that right is granted directly to every citizen of the Union by a clear and precise provision of the Treaty. Purely as a national of a member state, and therefore as a citizen of the Union, Catherine is entitled to rely on art 18(1) EC. That right of citizens of the Union to reside in another member state is recognised subject to the limitations and conditions imposed by the Treaty and by the measures adopted to give it effect (see, in particular, Baumbast's case (paras 84, 85)).

- e 27. With regard to those limitations and conditions, art 1(1) of Directive 90/364 provides that the member states may require that the nationals of a member state who wish to benefit from the right to reside in their territory and the members of their families be covered by sickness insurance in respect of all risks in the host member state and have sufficient resources to avoid becoming a burden on the social assistance system of the host member state during their period of residence.

- f 28. It is clear from the order for reference that Catherine has both sickness insurance and sufficient resources, provided by her mother, for her not to become a burden on the social assistance system of the host member state.

- g 29. The objection raised by the Irish and United Kingdom governments that the condition concerning the availability of sufficient resources means that the person concerned must, in contrast to Catherine's case, possess those resources personally and may not use for that purpose those of an accompanying family member, such as Mrs Chen, is unfounded.

- h 30. According to the very terms of art 1(1) of Directive 90/364, it is sufficient for the nationals of member states to 'have' the necessary resources, and that provision lays down no requirement whatsoever as to their origin.

- i 31. The correctness of that interpretation is reinforced by the fact that provisions laying down a fundamental principle such as that of the free movement of persons must be interpreted broadly.

- i 32. Moreover, the limitations and conditions referred to in art 18 EC and laid down by Directive 90/364 are based on the idea that the exercise of the right of residence of citizens of the Union can be subordinated to the legitimate interests of the member states. Thus, although, according to the fourth recital in the preamble to Directive 90/364, beneficiaries of the right of residence must not become an 'unreasonable' burden on the public finances of the host member state, the court nevertheless observed that those limitations and conditions must be applied in compliance with the limits imposed by Community law and in accordance with the principle of proportionality (see, in particular, Baumbast's case (paras 90, 91)). a

33. An interpretation of the condition concerning the sufficiency of resources within the meaning of Directive 90/364, in the terms suggested by the Irish and United Kingdom governments would add to that condition, as formulated in that directive, a requirement as to the origin of the resources which, not being necessary for the attainment of the objective pursued, namely the protection of the public finances of the member states, would constitute a disproportionate interference with the exercise of the fundamental right of freedom of movement and of residence upheld by art 18 EC. b

34. The United Kingdom government contends, finally, that the appellants in the main proceedings are not entitled to rely on the Community provisions in question because Mrs Chen's move to Northern Ireland with the aim of having her child acquire the nationality of another member state constitutes an attempt improperly to exploit the provisions of Community law. The aims pursued by those Community provisions are not, in its view, served where a national of a non-member country wishing to reside in a member state, without however moving or wishing to move from one member state to another, arranges matters in such a way as to give birth to a child in a part of the host member state to which another member state applies its rules governing acquisition of nationality jure soli. It is, in their view, settled case law that member states are entitled to take measures to prevent individuals from improperly taking advantage of provisions of Community law or from attempting, under cover of the rights created by the Treaty, illegally to circumvent national legislation. That rule, which is in conformity with the principle that rights must not be abused, was in their view reaffirmed by the court in its judgment in Centros Ltd v Erhvervs-og Selskabsstyrelsen Case C-212/97 [2000] All ER (EC) 481, [1999] ECR I-1459. c

35. That argument must also be rejected. d

36. It is true that Mrs Chen admits that the purpose of her stay in the United Kingdom was to create a situation in which the child she was expecting would be able to acquire the nationality of another member state in order thereafter to secure for her child and for herself a long-term right to reside in the United Kingdom. e

37. Nevertheless, under international law, it is for each member state, having due regard to Community law, to lay down the conditions for the acquisition and loss of nationality (see, in particular, Micheletti v Delegación del Gobierno en Cantabria Case C-369/90 [1992] ECR I-4239 (para 10) and R (on the application of Kaur) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept (JUSTICE, intervening) Case C-192/99 [2001] All ER (EC) 250, [2001] ECR I-1237 (para 19)). f

38. None of the parties that submitted observations to the court has questioned either the legality, or the fact, of Catherine's acquisition of Irish nationality. g

39. Moreover, it is not permissible for a member state to restrict the effects of the grant of the nationality of another member state by imposing an additional condition for recognition of that nationality with a view to the exercise of the fundamental freedoms provided for in the Treaty (see, in particular, Micheletti's case (para 10) and García Avello's case (para 28)). h

40. However, that would be precisely what would happen if the United Kingdom were entitled to refuse nationals of other member states, such as Catherine, the benefit of a fundamental freedom upheld by Community law i

- a merely because their nationality of a member state was in fact acquired solely in order to secure a right of residence under Community law for a national of a non-member country.

41. Accordingly, in circumstances like those of the main proceedings, art 18 EC and Directive 90/364 confer on a young minor who is a national of a member state, is covered by appropriate sickness insurance and is in the care of a parent who is a third-country national having sufficient resources for that minor not to become a burden on the public finances of the host member state, a right to reside for an indefinite period in that state.

- c 42. Article 1(2)(b) of Directive 90/364, which guarantees 'dependent' relatives in the ascending line of the holder of the right of residence the right to install themselves with the holder of the right of residence, regardless of their nationality, cannot confer a right of residence on a national of a non-member country in Mrs Chen's situation either by reason of the emotional bonds between mother and child or on the ground that the mother's right to enter and reside in the United Kingdom is dependent on her child's right of residence.

d 43. According to the case law of the court, the status of 'dependent' member of the family of a holder of a right of residence is the result of a factual situation characterised by the fact that material support for the family member is provided by the holder of the right of residence (see, to that effect, in relation to art 10 of Regulation 1612/68, Centre Public d'Aide Sociale de Courcelles v Lebon Case 316/85 [1987] ECR 2811 (paras 20–22)).

e 44. In circumstances such as those of the main proceedings, the position is exactly the opposite in that the holder of the right of residence is dependent on the national of a non-member country who is her carer and wishes to accompany her. In those circumstances, Mrs Chen cannot claim to be a 'dependent' relative of Catherine in the ascending line within the meaning of Directive 90/364 with a view to having the benefit of a right of residence in the United Kingdom.

f 45. On the other hand, a refusal to allow the parent, whether a national of a member state or a national of a non-member country, who is the carer of a child to whom art 18 EC and Directive 90/364 grant a right of residence, to reside with that child in the host member state would deprive the child's right of residence of any useful effect. It is clear that enjoyment by a young child of a right of residence necessarily implies that the child is entitled to be accompanied by the person who is his or her primary carer and accordingly that the carer must be in a position to reside with the child in the host member state for the duration of such residence (see, mutatis mutandis, in relation to art 12 of Regulation 1612/68, Baumbast's case (paras 71–75)).

h 46. For that reason alone, where, as in the main proceedings, art 18 EC and Directive 90/364 grant a right to reside for an indefinite period in the host member state to a young minor who is a national of another member state, those same provisions allow a parent who is that minor's primary carer to reside with the child in the host member state.

i 47. The answer to be given to the national court must therefore be that, in circumstances like those of the main proceedings, art 18 EC and Directive 90/364 confer on a young minor who is a national of a member state, is covered by appropriate sickness insurance and is in the care of a parent who is a third-country national having sufficient resources for that minor not to become a burden on the public finances of the host member state, a right to reside for an indefinite period in that state. In such circumstances, those same provisions allow a parent who is that minor's primary carer to reside with the child in the host member state.

48. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. Costs incurred in submitting observations to the court, other than the costs of those parties, are not recoverable.

On those grounds, the Court of Justice (sitting as a full court) hereby rules:
(1) In circumstances like those of the main proceedings, art 18 EC and Council Directive (EEC) 90/364 (on the right of residence confer on a young minor who is a national of a member state), is covered by appropriate sickness insurance and is in the care of a parent who is a third-country national having sufficient resources for that minor not to become a burden on the public finances of the host member state, a right to reside for an indefinite period in that state. In such circumstances, those same provisions allow a parent who is d that minor's primary carer to reside with the child in the host member state.

25 NOVEMBER 2003, 11 MARCH, 13 JULY 2004

European Community – Freedom of movement – Services – Television broadcasting – National legislation prohibiting indirect advertising of alcoholic beverages – Prohibition extending to retransmission of bi-national sporting events taking place in other member states where advertising visible on hoardings and sports shirts – Whether prohibition infringing freedom of transmission and reception of television broadcasts – Whether prohibition infringing freedom to provide services – Articles 46, 49 EC (formerly EC Treaty, arts 56, 59) – Council Directive (EEC) 89/552, art 2(2).

- f It was a misdemeanor under French criminal law for a television company directly or indirectly to advertise alcoholic beverages. So far as relevant, that ban applied to the extent that it prohibited the retransmission in France of sporting events taking place in other member states in which advertising for alcoholic beverages was visible on advertising hoardings displayed within the sporting venue and on sports shirts. Pursuant to a code of conduct drawn up by the competent authorities and by French television channels, a distinction was drawn between bi-national sporting events (whose retransmission was specifically aimed at a French audience), and multinational sporting events (images of which were retransmitted in a large number of countries such that they were not to be regarded as being aimed principally at the French public).
- h In relation to the bi-national events, French broadcasters who had no control over filming conditions had to use all available means to prevent the appearance on their channels of brand names of alcoholic beverages, such that, in practice, they had to inform their partners of the national requirements, make inquiries in advance about the advertisements that were to be displayed, and use all technical means available to avoid showing advertisements for alcoholic beverages. In due course, two cases concerning the prohibition came before the Court of Justice of the European Communities. In the first case (Case C-262/02), the Commission of the European Communities sought a declaration under art 226 EC (formerly art 169 of the EC Treaty) that France had failed to fulfil its obligations under the EC Treaty and, in the second case (Case C-429/02), a national court had referred certain questions to the Court under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) in proceedings between a company that produced and marketed numerous alcoholic beverages and companies that negotiated retransmission rights for football matches. Accordingly, issues arose concerning the compatibility of the prohibition with: (i) the freedom to provide services guaranteed by arts 46<sup>a</sup> and 49<sup>b</sup> EC (formerly arts 56, 59 of the EC Treaty); and (ii) the freedom of reception and retransmission of television broadcasts under arts 1(b), 2(2), 10(1) and 11(2)<sup>c</sup> of Council Directive (EEC) 89/552 (on the co-ordination of certain provisions laid down by law, regulation or administrative action in member states concerning the pursuit of television broadcasting activities).
- i

(1) Article 46 EC did not preclude a member state from prohibiting television advertising for alcoholic beverages marketed in that state by way of indirect television advertising resulting from the appearance on screen of hoardings visible during the retransmission of bi-national sporting events taking place in other member states. Such a prohibition restricted the freedom to provide advertising services in so far as owners of advertising hoardings had to refuse, as a preventive measure, any advertising for alcoholic beverages if a sporting event was likely to be retransmitted in France. It also impeded the provision of broadcasting services for television programmes since French broadcasters had to refuse all retransmission of sporting events in which hoardings bearing advertising for alcoholic beverages marketed in France might be visible. Furthermore, the organisers of sporting events taking place outside France could not sell the retransmission rights to French broadcasters if the transmission of the television programmes of such events was likely to contain indirect television advertising for those alcoholic beverages. Moreover, although, technically, it was possible to mask the images in order selectively to conceal the hoardings showing advertising for alcoholic beverages, such techniques involved substantial additional costs for the French broadcasters. It followed that the national rules constituted a restriction on the freedom to provide services within the meaning of art 46 EC. However, measures restricting the advertising of alcoholic beverages in order to combat alcohol abuse reflected public health concerns and were justified under art 46 EC. Moreover, the prohibition at issue in the main proceedings did not go beyond what was necessary to achieve that objective. Although, in practice, the rules might mean that whole of a sporting event could not be broadcast, there were no other less restrictive measures available which might exclude or conceal the indirect television advertising. Since that advertising appeared on screen only sporadically and only for a few seconds, it was not possible either to control its content or to insert warnings at the same time as the appearance of the advertisement on the screen on the dangers resulting from an excessive consumption of alcohol (see judgment paras 22–40 in C-262/02 and judgment paras 30–41 in C-429/02, below).

<sup>a</sup> Article 46 EC provides, so far as material that: 'The provisions of this chapter and measures taken in pursuance thereof shall not prejudice the applicability of provisions laid down by law, regulation or administrative action providing for special treatment for foreign nationals on grounds of public policy, public security or public health.'

<sup>b</sup> Article 49 EC provides, so far as material, that: '... restrictions on freedom to provide services within the Community shall be prohibited in respect of nationals of Member States who are established in a State of the Community other than that of the person for whom the services are intended.'

(2) The provisions of the directive did not preclude a member state from prohibiting indirect television advertising for alcoholic beverages marketed in that state arising from the appearance on screen of hoardings visible during the retransmission of bi-national sporting events taking place in other member states. Television advertising for the purposes of the directive was any form of announcement broadcast in return for payment or similar consideration to promote goods or services. Further, such advertising had to be kept separate from other parts of the programme service and, in sports programmes, were only to be inserted between parts or in intervals. However, images on advertising hoardings appearing in the background of the pictures broadcast during sporting events appeared in a random and unpredictable fashion according to the requirements of the retransmission and they had no distinct character in the context of the directive. Therefore, such indirect television advertising was not to be regarded as being 'television advertising' for the purposes of the directive (see judgment paras 26–29, below).

Application and Reference

Case C-262/02

By application lodged on 16 July 2002 the Commission of the European Communities brought an action under art 226 EC (formerly art 169 of the EC Treaty) for a declaration that, by making television broadcasting in France by French television channels of sporting events taking place in other member states conditional on the prior removal of advertising for alcoholic beverages, the French Republic has failed to fulfil its obligations under art 59 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, art 49 EC). By order dated 3 December 2002, the President of the Court of Justice of the European Communities gave leave to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to intervene in support of the forms of order sought by the Commission. The Commission was represented by H van Lier, acting as agent, with an address for service in Luxembourg. The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland was represented by K Manji, acting as agent, and K Beal, Barrister. France was represented by G de Bergues and R Loosli-Surrans, acting as agents. At the oral argument the Commission was represented by H van Lier and W Wils, acting as agent, the French Republic by G de Bergues and R Loosli-Surrans, and the United Kingdom by K Manji and P Harris, Barrister. The language of the case was French. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General.

By decision of 19 November 2002, the French Cour de Cassation (Court of Cassation) referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) two questions (set out at judgment para 23, below) on the interpretation of Council Directive (EEC) 89/552 (on the co-ordination of certain provisions laid down by law, regulation or administrative action in member states concerning the pursuit of television broadcasting activities) and art 59 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, art 49 EC). Those questions were raised in proceedings between Bacardi France SAS, formerly Bacardi-Martini SAS (Bacardi), and Télévision Française 1 SA (TF1), Groupe Jean-Claude Darmon SA (Darmon) and Giro Sport SARL (Giro Sport), seeking an order that the latter three undertakings cease to put pressure on foreign clubs to refuse advertising for alcoholic beverages produced by Bacardi on advertising hoardings placed in venues hosting bi-national sporting events taking place in other member states. Written observations were submitted on behalf of: Bacardi, by C Niedzielski and JM Cot, Avocats; Télévision Française 1 SA (TF1), by L Bousquet and O Sprung, Avocats; the French government, by G de Bergues and R Loosli-Surrans, acting as agents; the United Kingdom government, by K Manji, acting as agent, and K Beal, Barrister; and the Commission by H van Lier, acting as agent. Oral observations were made on behalf of: Bacardi France SAS, represented by J-M Cot; the French government, represented by G de Bergues and R Loosli-Surrans; the United Kingdom government, represented by K Manji; and the Commission, represented by H van Lier and W Wils, acting as agent. The language of the case was French. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General.

b 1. In Case C-262/02, brought by the Commission of the European Communities under art 226 EC (formerly art 169 of the EC Treaty), the Court of Justice of the European Communities is asked to rule whether the French legislation prohibiting on national territory the televising of sporting events taking place in other member states if hoardings displayed at those events promote alcoholic beverages, the television advertising of which is prohibited in France, is compatible with art 49 EC (formerly art 59 of the EC Treaty).

c 2. The same legislation is the subject of two questions submitted by the Cour de Cassation (Court of Cassation, France), by order of 19 November 2001, to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling in Case C-429/02. In particular, in that case the French court seeks to ascertain whether the legislation of a member state, such as the French legislation cited above, is compatible with Council Directive (EEC) 89/552 (on the co-ordination of certain provisions laid down by law, regulation or administrative action in member states concerning the pursuit of television broadcasting activities) (OJ 1989 L298 p 23) (the Television Without Frontiers Directive; hereinafter Directive 89/552) and with art 49 EC.

3. As can be seen, the two cases relate to the same national law and present characteristics that coincide to a very large extent. It is therefore appropriate to deal with them jointly.

e I—LEGAL BACKGROUND

A—Community law

4. So far as concerns Community law, as is well known, art 49 EC guarantees the freedom to provide services within the Community.

f 5. Regard should also be given to art 46 EC, which is applicable to the freedom to provide services within the meaning of art 55 EC; that article enables the applicability of provisions laid down by law, regulation or administrative action by the member states which, while limiting that freedom, are justified on grounds of public policy, public security or public health.

g Directive 89/552

h 7. In order to ensure freedom of transmission in television broadcasting within the Community, Directive 89/552 co-ordinates some fields of television activities, laying down minimum rules with which broadcasts emanating from and intended for reception within the Community must comply (see the 13th and 14th recitals).

i 8. Furthermore, to achieve that objective, the directive requires the member states first to ensure that television broadcasters under their jurisdiction comply with the provisions of the directive (art 3(2)) and secondly to ensure freedom of reception and not to restrict retransmission on their territory of television broadcasts from other member states for reasons which fall within the fields co-ordinated by the directive (art 2(2)).

1 Original language: Italian.

2 Set out in para 2, above.

9. The fields co-ordinated by the directive include that of 'television advertising', for which it lays down provisions defining the basic concepts involved and regulating the methods, limits and times of transmission of that form of advertising. a

10. In so far as relevant here, I would recall that art 1(b) and (c) provide that:

'(b) "television advertising" means any form of announcement broadcast in return for payment or for similar consideration by a public or private undertaking in connection with a trade, business, craft or profession in order to promote the supply of goods or services, including immovable property, or rights and obligations, in return for payment ...' b

(c) "surreptitious advertising" means the representation in words or pictures of goods, services, the name, the trade mark or the activities of a producer of goods or a provider of services in programmes when such representation is intended by the broadcaster to serve advertising and might mislead the public as to its nature. Such representation is considered to be intentional in particular if it is done in return for payment or for similar consideration ...' c

11. Article 10 lays down that: d

'1. Television advertising shall be readily recognizable as such and kept quite separate from other parts of the programme service by optical and/or acoustic means ...

4. Surreptitious advertising shall be prohibited.' e

12. Article 11 provides that:

'1. Advertisements shall be inserted between programmes. Provided the conditions contained in paragraphs 2 to 5 of this Article are fulfilled, advertisements may also be inserted during programmes in such a way that the integrity and value of the programme, taking into account natural breaks in and the duration and nature of the programme, and the rights of the rights holders are not prejudiced. f

2. In programmes consisting of autonomous parts, or in sports programmes and similarly structured events and performances comprising intervals, advertisements shall only be inserted between the parts or in the intervals.' g

13. Finally, art 15 lays down certain specific criteria with which television advertising for alcoholic beverages must comply.

14. Lastly, it should be noted that Directive 89/552 was amended by Directive 97/36<sup>3</sup> subsequent to the facts at issue and is not applicable in the present case. h

B—National law

(a) The Loi Evin

15. As regards national legislation, I would first recall French provisions on the television advertising of alcoholic beverages, beginning with Law 91-32 of 10 January 1991 on the campaign against tobacco and alcohol addiction<sup>4</sup> i a (hereinafter the Loi Evin), which amended art L. 17 of the Code des débits de boissons (Code of Licensed Premises, hereinafter the CDB)<sup>5</sup>.

16. The Loi Evin is based on the principle that all forms of advertising for alcoholic beverages (that is to say beverages with an alcohol content of more than 1.2°) are prohibited unless expressly authorised. In accordance with that principle, the television advertising of alcoholic beverages is therefore b prohibited as it is not expressly authorised by art L. 17 of the CDB.

17. That prohibition is expressly confirmed by art 8 of Decree 92-280 of 27 March 1992 on advertising and sponsorship in television<sup>6</sup>, which provides as follows:

c 'The advertising, first, of products whose advertising on television is prohibited by law and, secondly, of the following products and economic sectors:

beverages with an alcohol content of more than 1.2° ...
is prohibited.'

d 18. Any infringement of the Loi Evin constitutes a 'délit' under French criminal law. Article L. 21 of the CDB provides that:

'Infringements of the provisions of Articles L. 17, L. 18, L. 19 and L. 20 shall be punishable by a fine of FRF 500 000. The maximum fine may be increased by 50% of the sum spent on illegal advertising.

e In the event of repeated offences, the court may prohibit the sale of the illegally advertised alcoholic beverage for a period of between one and five years.'

(b) The measures adopted by the CSA

f 19. Furthermore, an important supervisory role has been entrusted to the Conseil supérieur de l'audiovisuel (Authority for the Audiovisual Sector, hereinafter the CSA), which may impose administrative penalties on French broadcasters that fail to comply with the Loi Evin.

20. While performing that role, the CSA discovered that hoardings advertising alcoholic beverages were being shown during the televising in France of certain sporting events held abroad<sup>7</sup> and judged that this form of g television advertising contravened the Loi Evin. Accordingly, it warned some French broadcasters to comply with the law, to the extent of bringing a criminal complaint for infringement<sup>8</sup>.

21. The CSA then drew up a Code of Conduct to publicise the interpretation it intended to give to the provisions of the Loi Evin with regard to the
h

5 This subsequently became art L3323-2 of the Code de la santé publique (Public Health Code).

i 7 For example, during a friendly match between France and the Netherlands on 18 January 1995 in Utrecht (the Netherlands) the CSA noted the presence of advertising for eight different brands of alcoholic beverage.

8 On 23 January 1995 the CSA brought a complaint under art 40 of the French Code de procédure pénale (Code of Criminal Procedure) before the Procureur de la République at the Tribunal de Grande Instance (Regional Court) Nanterre. As a result of that complaint, the French broadcaster TF1 decided not to broadcast the football match between Auxerre and Arsenal played on 2 March 1995. Similarly, France 2 cancelled the transmission of the rugby matches between Ireland and Scotland and between Ireland and Wales scheduled for 18 March 1995.

broadcasting of sporting events at which advertising for alcoholic beverages was displayed (for example, hoardings positioned around the pitch)<sup>9</sup>. a

22. The Code, which bars all forms of discrimination between French and foreign alcoholic beverages, calls upon advertisers, agents, sporting federations and television broadcasters to exercise the maximum vigilance against similar advertising being shown during sporting events held abroad. In such cases, the broadcasters transmitting the images of the events in France must not be lenient with regard to advertising displayed at the venue of the event, by not acquiescing to the placing of advertisements and avoiding as far as possible their being filmed. b

23. That general rule is then further qualified by drawing a distinction between 'international events' and 'other events taking place abroad'. In the case of 'international events', the images of which are broadcast in a large number of countries and can therefore not be considered to be aimed primarily at the French public, the broadcasters cannot be accused of leniency when transmitting images, the filming of which they do not control, even if the advertising appears on the screen. 'Other events', the broadcasting of which is considered to be aimed specifically at the French public, are treated differently, however. Here, if the legislation of the host country authorises the advertising of alcoholic beverages at the venue of the competition, the parties negotiating with the holders of television rights must use 'all available means' to prevent the advertising of alcoholic beverages from appearing in France and must notify their foreign counterparts of the legislation applying there. c

24. Although not relevant for the purposes of the decision in the present case, it should be noted that the Code of Conduct has been amended several times since 1999. Principally, an annex was added listing 'binational events' (previously termed 'other events'). The list, which is subject to periodic review, comprised: friendly matches; qualifying matches; Inter-toto Cup football matches; and the early rounds (those preceding the fourth round) of the UEFA Cup in football. It was also laid down that matches on the list could nevertheless be classed as 'international events' if one of the teams or athletes participating in the competition was 'of special renown'<sup>10</sup>. Lastly, French broadcasters were enabled to ask the CSA for an opinion on the 'international' or 'binational' status of the sporting event to be broadcast. e

25. The case file shows that further amendments to the Code of Conduct were made in 2000 and 2001. In particular, the list of 'binational events' was reduced<sup>11</sup>; the procedure for consulting the CSA was extended and clarified, with all interested parties being given the right to ask that body about the conditions for applying the Code and to receive a reply within a maximum of three weeks; and finally the Code was widely disseminated by publication in the Bulletin officiel du Ministère de la jeunesse et des sports, in the periodic 'CSA newsletter' and on the CSA's website. f

<sup>10</sup> In the version of the Code of Conduct notified to broadcasters on 9 October 1999, 'special renown' is defined as 'the fame enjoyed by a national team, a club or a French or foreign athlete outside his or its country of origin'. h

<sup>11</sup> As a result of that amendment, the list comprises: friendly matches, qualifying matches and the early rounds (those preceding the third round) of the UEFA Cup. i

a II—FACTS AND PROCEDURE

Case C-262/02

26. Since 1995 the Commission has received numerous complaints from individuals reporting the difficulties that the Loi Evin caused for the transmission in France of sporting events held in other member states and for the purchasing, by producers of alcoholic beverages, of space on advertising hoardings at the venues of such events.

27. As a result of those complaints, the Commission served formal notice on France on 21 August 1995. This was followed on 21 November 1996 by a reasoned opinion in which the Commission accused France of infringing art 59 of the EC Treaty (now art 49 EC).

28. As it was not satisfied by the reply from France or by the amendments made to the Code of Conduct after service of the reasoned opinion, the Commission lodged an application on 16 July 2002 asking the court to declare that—

‘by making the televised broadcasting in France by French television channels of sporting events taking place in the territory of other member states conditional upon the prior withdrawal of publicity promoting alcoholic beverages, the French Republic has failed to fulfil its obligations under Article 49 EC.’

29. By order of 3 December 2002, the court granted the United Kingdom leave to intervene in the case in support of the Commission in accordance with art 93(1) of the Rules of Procedure.

Case C-429/02

30. The facts at the origin of the main proceedings involve four companies: Bacardi France SAS (hereinafter Bacardi), Télévision Française TF1 SA (hereinafter TF1), Groupe Jean-Claude Darmon SA (hereinafter Darmon) and Giroport SARL (hereinafter Giroport). Bacardi is a French company that produces and markets alcoholic beverages; TF1 is a French television broadcaster; Darmon and Giroport are two companies governed by French law whose activity consists in the negotiation of television rights for sporting events.

31. The documents before the court show that in order to comply with the Code of Conduct drawn up by the CSA, TF1 warned Darmon and Giroport to ‘use every means necessary to prevent the brand names of alcoholic beverages from appearing on television when purchasing the transmission rights [of sporting events] on behalf of TF1’<sup>12</sup>.

32. It also appears from the documents in the case that, in connection with sporting events taking place abroad and broadcast in France, some football clubs refused to place advertising for alcoholic beverages produced by Bacardi on the hoardings in the stadia.

33. Bacardi held that that refusal was due to pressure exerted on the foreign clubs by Darmon and Giroport at the request of TF1 and that such pressure was applied only when the advertising to be displayed concerned French beverages. It therefore applied to the Tribunal de commerce (Commercial Court) de Paris for an order requiring the said companies to cease that discriminatory behaviour. a

34. As that application was dismissed both in the court of first instance and upon appeal, Bacardi made an application to the Cour de Cassation (Court of Cassation). The latter, having doubts as to the compatibility of the French legislation with Directive 89/552 and art 49 EC, submitted the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty): b

‘(1) [Does] Directive 89/552/EEC of 3 October 1989 (“Television without Frontiers”) in the version prior to that of Directive 97/36/EC of 30 June 1997, [preclude] national legislation, such as Articles L. 17 to L. 21 of the French Code des débits de boissons and Article 8 of Decree No 92–280 of 27 March 1992, which prohibits, for reasons relating to the protection of public health and on pain of criminal penalties, advertising for alcoholic drinks, whether of national origin or from other Member States of the Union, on television, whether in the form of advertising spots within the meaning of Article 10 of the directive or of indirect advertising as a result of hoardings advertising alcoholic drinks appearing on television without constituting surreptitious advertising within the meaning of Article 1(c) of the directive[?]’ c

(2) [Are] Article 49 EC and the principle of the free movement of television broadcasts within the Union be interpreted as precluding a national provision such as that in Articles L. 17 to L. 21 of the French Code des débits de boissons and Article 8 of Decree No 92–280 of 27 March 1992 which prohibits, for reasons relating to the protection of public health and on pain of criminal penalties, advertising for alcoholic drinks, whether of national origin or from other Member States of the Union, on television, whether in the form of advertising spots within the meaning of Article 10 of the directive or of indirect advertising as a result of hoardings advertising alcoholic drinks appearing on television without thereby constituting surreptitious advertising within the meaning of Article 1(c) of the directive, from having the effect that operators responsible for the broadcasting and distribution of television programmes: (a) refrain from broadcasting television programmes, such as in particular retransmissions of sporting events, whether taking place in France or in other countries of the Union, where they show prohibited advertisements within the meaning of the French Code des débits de boissons, or (b) broadcast them on condition that prohibited advertisements within the meaning of the French Code des débits de boissons do not appear, thereby preventing the conclusion of advertising contracts concerning alcoholic drinks, whether of national origin or from other Member States of the Union[?]’ d

35. Bacardi, TF1, the French and United Kingdom governments and the Commission submitted written observations in the proceedings thus instituted.

a III—LEGAL ASSESSMENT

Introduction

37. As I have already indicated, the central questions in the two cases coincide to a large extent. I shall therefore examine them together; but first I must make a number of remarks with regard to the questions submitted for a preliminary ruling in Case C-429/02.

b 38. As has been stated, in that case two questions have been submitted to the court, asking whether Directive 89/552 and art 49 EC preclude a law, such as the French law, which prohibits the advertising of alcoholic beverages on television either directly in the form of advertising spots or indirectly as a result of the filming of advertising hoardings displayed during sporting events.

c 39. In my opinion, the wording of these questions calls for comment.

d 40. First, I must make clear that in order to provide a useful reply to the court of reference the assessment by the Court of Justice cannot be confined to arts L. 17 to L. 21 of the CDB and art 8 of Decree 92–280, which are explicitly mentioned by the national court, but must also of necessity extend to the measures taken by the CSA to implement those provisions. In particular, e consideration must be given to the Code of Conduct drawn up by that authority, which, as has been stated and as can be deduced from the documents of the case, requires the parties negotiating the purchase of television rights to sporting events that are to take place abroad but will not be broadcast ‘in a large number of countries’ and which concern ‘specifically French viewers’ (so-called ‘other events’) to use every ‘means available’ to prevent f advertisements for alcoholic beverages shown during such events from appearing in France.

41. Indeed, the conduct giving rise to the dispute in the main proceedings, namely that of TF1, Darmon and Girosport, and which is contested by Bacardi, is the result of the desire of those parties to conform to the practice embodied in the interpretation and application of arts L. 17 to L. 21 of the CDB and art 8 of Decree 92–280. I therefore believe that that practice—the relevance of which for the interpretation of the said articles is essentially acknowledged by the court making the reference and which is the main subject of the Commission’s complaints in Case C-262/02—must be taken into account when assessing the two questions from the national court. Furthermore, a reply from the court that did not take that practice into account would ultimately become a mere g advisory opinion unconnected with the reality of the dispute in the main proceedings and thus in clear contradiction with the function of the preliminary reference procedure<sup>13</sup>.

42. Secondly, I consider that in assessing that legislation the court should concentrate on evaluating whether the prohibition of the indirect advertising h during sporting events is compatible with Community law. As I have already said, the main proceedings turn on whether the conduct adopted by TF1, Darmon and Girosport in order to comply with that prohibition was lawful. On the other hand, the prohibition of direct television advertising, which is also i 13 In this regard I would point out that according to settled case law ‘the justification for a preliminary reference, and hence for the jurisdiction of the Court, is not that it enables advisory opinions on general or hypothetical questions to be delivered ..., but rather that it is necessary for the effective resolution of a dispute’. See, among many others, Zabala Erasun v Instituto Nacional de Empleo Joined cases C-422–424/93 [1995] All ER (EC) 758, [1995] ECR I-1567 (para 29) and Djabali v Caisse d’Allocations Familiales de l’Essonne Case C-314/96 [1998] All ER (EC) 426, [1998] ECR I-1149 (paras 17–20).

therefore seems to me that a reply from the court on the compatibility of the latter prohibition with Community law is not necessary for resolving the dispute in the main proceedings.

43. For those reasons I therefore consider that the questions submitted by the Cour de Cassation should be understood as requiring the Court of Justice to assess whether Directive 89/552 and art 49 EC preclude legislation of a member state, such as the French legislation, which prohibits the television broadcasting on national territory of sporting events taking place in other member states but which are not broadcast in a large number of countries but which specifically concern, rather, the viewers of that state, where advertising hoardings displayed at the venue of such events to promote products (in this case alcoholic beverages) that may not be advertised on television in the first state are shown. b c

44. Read in this way, the second question in Case C-429/02 and the application in the infringement proceedings brought by the Commission in Case C-262/02 end up by coinciding, because in both instances it is necessary to establish whether the said legislation, as interpreted and applied by the CSA, d is compatible with art 49 EC.

45. This is clearly the central issue in the two cases and, I repeat, it is common to both. Before beginning to examine it, however, I must mention an aspect that arises only in the case concerning a reference for a preliminary ruling. What is required is a determination of whether the French legislation in question can right away be deemed unlawful on the ground of infringement of e Directive 89/552.

Directive 89/552

46. I shall confine myself to only a few remarks on this matter, however, because I agree with all the parties to the proceedings for a preliminary ruling f
(with the sole exception of TF1), who argue that the directive is not applicable to the case in question in that the filming of advertising hoardings displayed during sporting events cannot be considered 'television advertising' and cannot therefore fall within the scope of the directive.

47. That conclusion can be deduced clearly, in my view, from arts 1, 10 and 11 of the directive. g

48. Article 1(b) defines 'television advertising' as 'any form of announcement broadcast in return for payment or for similar consideration ... in order to promote the supply of goods or services'<sup>14</sup>.

49. That provision thus refers to the sequence of television images specifically intended as advertising, for which the television broadcaster receives payment. It does not, however, include other kinds of announcement, such as those exhibited on placards filmed during the transmission of a sporting event, for which the broadcasters receive no remuneration. h

50. Articles 10 and 11 lay down that advertising 'shall be ... kept quite separate from other parts of the programme service' (art 10(1)) and that in— i

'programmes consisting of autonomous parts, or in sports programmes and similarly structured events and performances comprising intervals, [it] shall only be inserted between the parts or in the intervals.' (Article 11(2).)

- a 51. As the United Kingdom and the Commission have rightly pointed out, only announcements intended to promote goods or services on television can meet the conditions for being inserted, in accordance with the directive, between the autonomous parts or in the intervals of sports programmes so that they are clearly separated from the programmes themselves.
- b 52. In contrast, images of advertising hoardings shown during the televising of a sporting event because they are placed alongside the playing area on which the competition is being conducted necessarily appear throughout the event without it being possible to separate them clearly from the images of the action on the field. It would therefore be illogical to consider that Directive 89/552 also governs that form of indirect advertising, which by its very nature cannot comply with the provisions of the directive.
- c 53. I therefore conclude in this regard that Directive 89/552 does not preclude legislation of a member state, such as the French legislation, which prohibits the television broadcasting on national territory of sporting events taking place in other member states, where advertising hoardings displayed at the venue of such events to promote products (in this case alcoholic beverages)
- d that may not be advertised on television in the first state are shown.

Article 49 EC

- e 54. As I have already remarked several times, the infringement proceedings instituted by the Commission and the second question submitted by the Cour de Cassation for a preliminary ruling raise the same issue. Essentially the court is asked to establish whether the French legislation, as interpreted and applied by the CSA, is compatible with art 49 EC.
- f 55. The Commission, the United Kingdom and Bacardi consider that the measures in question constitute a restriction on the provision of various cross-border services that is disproportionate in relation to the objectives of protecting public health and preventing evasion of the law. France, by contrast, while acknowledging that the legislation under examination entails a restriction on the freedom to provide services, considers that it is justified on grounds of public health and complies with the principle of proportionality.
- g (1) Restriction on the freedom to provide services
- i 56. The first matter to settle is therefore whether the measures adopted by the CSA, and in particular the original version of the Code of Conduct, constitute a restriction on the freedom to provide services under art 49 EC.
- h 57. In truth, there appears to be no genuine difference between the parties in the two proceedings as regards the existence of such a restriction, as France does not, actually, contest the argument put forward by Bacardi, the Commission and the United Kingdom on this point.
- i 58. In particular, it is not disputed that the measures taken by the CSA restrict the freedom to provide three different types of service across national borders: (i) the transmission by French broadcasters of 'binational' sporting events held abroad at which advertising for alcoholic beverages is present; (ii) the sale of the television rights by the organisers of such events to French broadcasters; and (iii) the sale by the operators of advertising hoardings displayed at such events of space to promote alcoholic beverages. In the infringement proceedings, the Commission also raised the possibility of a restriction on the sponsorship of teams taking part in 'binational' events (for example, through the display of the trademark of alcoholic beverages on the athletes' jerseys). As the Commission itself has acknowledged, however, that objection was not contained in the reasoned opinion and cannot therefore be taken into account in Case C-262/02<sup>15</sup>.

59. That being so, it also seems to me that the legislation in question, although imposing requirements solely on French persons, directly impedes access to the market in the services in question by both French operators and those from other member states.

60. Indeed, as seen above, in the case of 'other events' the Code of Conduct requires the parties negotiating with the holders of television rights to use every 'means available' to prevent advertising for alcoholic beverages from appearing on French television screens.

61. It seems to me that the 'means' that the Code requires such persons to employ to achieve that outcome include an obligation not to purchase the television rights for the broadcasting of 'other events' if advertising for alcoholic beverages is not first removed. There can be no doubt that such a 'means' is also among those 'available' to persons negotiating television rights.

62. If that is the case, it would be difficult to deny that the legislation in question constitutes an obstacle to access to the above-mentioned services. Indeed, a request to remove the advertising in question may lead to one of the following two situations: if the organisers of the sporting event maintain the advertising, they will not be able to sell the television rights to the event and consequently it cannot be broadcast in France; alternatively, if they have such advertising removed or prohibit its placing on the playing area, the operators of the advertising hoardings will not be able to sell the available space to the producers of alcoholic beverages and, thus, the latter will not be able to buy it. In either case, the conduct that the Code imposes on those negotiating television rights prevents several parties from offering or benefiting from one or more services 'across Community frontiers'.

63. Furthermore, there is no merit in the argument that French broadcasters, rather than forgoing the transmission of 'binational events' owing to the presence of the advertising in question, could selectively obscure the placards advertising alcoholic beverages, thanks to modern image masking techniques. As the Commission has rightly maintained and as was admitted by France at the hearing, these are highly sophisticated techniques derived from missile guidance systems, which would be excessively costly for television broadcasters.

64. Neither can it be claimed that the national legislation under examination does not constitute a restriction prohibited under art 49 EC on the ground stated by the court of reference that it concerns without distinction all alcoholic beverages and is applied to such beverages by 'operators responsible for the broadcasting and distribution of television programmes', irrespective of whether they are of 'national origin or from other Member States of the Union'<sup>16</sup>.

<sup>15</sup> In this regard I would point out that the court has consistently held that, 'the subject-matter of an application under Article [226 EC] is limited to that defined during the pre-litigation procedure provided for by that article. Consequently, the Commission's reasoned opinion and the application must be based on the same arguments and submissions'. See EC Commission v Belgium Case 298/86 [1988] ECR 4343 (para 10).

<sup>16</sup> My emphasis. In this regard I note that the Cour de Cassation thus appears to share the opinion expressed by the Cour d'Appel in the judgment of 23 September 1997, in which Bacardi's claims regarding discrimination against French products were held to be unfounded (Annex No 42 to Bacardi's observations, pp 10 and 11).

a 65. It must be borne in mind that art 49 EC prohibits not only discrimination based on nationality but also more generally any restriction on the freedom to provide services by persons established in another member state<sup>17</sup>. The rule therefore also precludes national provisions which, even if they apply without distinction, are capable of directly affecting access to the market in services in the other member states<sup>18</sup>.

b 66. As I have just stated, this is precisely the situation in the present case.

67. I am therefore able to conclude on this point that the measures adopted by the CSA to implement the Loi Evin, requiring persons negotiating with the holders of television rights to 'other events' to employ every 'available means' to prevent advertising for alcoholic beverages from appearing in France constitutes a restriction on the freedom to provide services under art 49 EC.

(2) The proportionality of the French legislation

d 68. That said, it is necessary to ascertain whether the above-mentioned restriction can be justified in the light of the needs that Community law permits the member states to safeguard in derogation from even the principle of the freedom of movement.

e 69. In this regard, I note first that all the parties involved in the two proceedings acknowledge the findings of the court, according to which measures such as those under examination 'restricting the advertising of alcoholic beverages in order to combat alcoholism', despite constituting restrictions on the provision of services, '[reflect] public health concerns'<sup>19</sup> and may therefore be justified by this 'ground of general interest recognised by art [46 EC], which is applicable to the provision of services in accordance with Article [55 EC]'<sup>20</sup>.

f 70. Nevertheless, again according to the case law of the court, national provisions authorised by art 46 EC are lawful only on condition that they are not 'disproportionate to the intended objective'<sup>21</sup>. Hence, while it is true that, in the absence of Community rules governing the advertising of alcoholic beverages in general, in this field too 'it is for the member states to decide on the degree of protection which they wish to afford to public health and on the way in which that protection is to be achieved', it is equally true that they may do so only 'within the limits set by the Treaty and must, in particular, comply with the principle of proportionality'<sup>22</sup>, which requires that the provisions adopted 'must be appropriate for securing the attainment of the objective which they pursue and must not go beyond what is necessary in order to attain it'.<sup>23</sup> a

71. The real crux of the infringement proceedings instituted by the Commission against France and of the reference for a preliminary ruling from the Cour de Cassation is the very proportionality of the French legislation. In order to resolve both cases it is therefore necessary to establish whether that legislation (i) is appropriate for attaining the public health objective that it pursues and (ii) does not go beyond what is necessary to attain that objective. b

(i) The appropriateness of the French legislation for attaining the public health objective pursued c

72. According to the Commission and Bacardi, the French provisions in question are an inappropriate means of attaining the objective of protecting public health in that they are based on legislative choices and criteria that are inconsistent with that objective, for a number of reasons which I shall now examine individually.

73. Bacardi and the Commission identify a first inconsistency by comparing the rules on tobacco with those on alcoholic beverages. In the case of tobacco French legislation imposes a general prohibition on advertising, except for Formula 1 races. In that of alcoholic beverages, however, it permits various forms of advertising (for example in the printed press, on radio and on hoardings) but imposes a ban on television advertising which, under the Code of Conduct, is extended to the televising of hoardings advertising alcoholic beverages. d

74. According to the Commission, if I understand correctly, there is inconsistency between the two in that a general prohibition, such as that laid down for tobacco, is limited by means of a derogation, whereas a partial prohibition, such as that for alcoholic beverages, is broadened by its extensive application to television broadcasts. e

75. Bacardi and the Commission then find a second inconsistency in the fact that the Loi Evin permits advertising for alcoholic beverages consisting in the placing of advertising hoardings in sports stadia but prohibits the televising of such hoardings. From this point of view as well, according to these parties, there is inconsistency in that on the one hand consent is granted for advertising such as that on advertising hoardings that can be seen for the entire duration of the event by anyone present, while on the other the appearance of these same hoardings on television is prohibited, although they are captured occasionally by the television cameras and are therefore visible to television viewers only for a few instants. f

76. The French government replies to these objections by maintaining that it took legislative policy decisions which, in keeping with the objective of protecting public health, graduate the prohibition on advertising according to the harmfulness of the product marketed and the impact of the advertising method used. g

77. In particular, the French government claims that there is no contradiction in establishing derogations for tobacco advertising that are not provided for h a alcohol, a product with a different degree of harmfulness for human health. Moreover, according to the French government, it is entirely logical to permit the advertising of alcoholic beverages on hoardings that will be seen only by persons physically present at the venues of sporting competitions but to ban the appearance of the same hoardings on television, given that this medium reaches a far larger number of people.

b 78. For my part, I have no difficulty in conceding that some decisions of the French legislature may indeed appear questionable. There can be no doubt that to allow significant derogations from an advertising ban or to limit the appearance of images of advertising hoardings on television without prohibiting the placing of those hoardings in the stadia may reduce the effectiveness of the state's action to protect public health.

c 79. I am nevertheless of the view that these decisions fall within the freedom of the member states to 'decide on the degree of protection which they wish to afford to public health and on the way in which that protection is to be achieved'<sup>24</sup>, and are therefore among the options available to member states for attaining that objective. By contrast, what falls outside the discretion of the member states and thus within the purview of the court is, as we have seen, d the appropriateness and necessity of such decisions in relation to attainment of the declared objectives, given that only compliance with those conditions can justify the restrictions deriving from those decisions.

e 80. Accordingly, what must be ascertained is not which measures would be feasible and more effective in abstract terms but whether the actual measures adopted by France in the exercise of its discretionary power to impede the televising of binational sporting events at which advertising for alcoholic beverages is displayed are appropriate for achieving the degree of protection of public health pursued by that state.

f 81. It seems to me that, even subject to the limitations I have indicated, the appropriateness of the measures cannot be denied. The measures in question reduce the instances in which television viewers can see images of hoardings advertising alcoholic beverages, that is to say images displayed on pitches with the obvious aim of encouraging consumers to buy such products. It is therefore reasonable to maintain that by limiting the opportunities for propagating the message those measures may also reduce the instances in which television viewers consume alcoholic beverages in response to the g blandishments of advertising.

h 82. But the main objection of Bacardi and the Commission from the standpoint that is of interest here is really something other. It relates to the Code of Conduct, of which I have spoken above (paras 19 to 23), and in particular to the distinction between 'international events' and 'other events', on which is based the prohibition on the broadcasting of sporting events taking place abroad.

i 83. According to Bacardi and the Commission, that distinction is not only imprecise but also contradictory. They maintain that where there are hoardings advertising alcoholic beverages at the venues of sporting competitions it prohibits the broadcasting of 'other events', which have a smaller following among the French public, but not that of 'international events', which are more widely followed in France. As a result, it introduces a less strict regime precisely for the broadcasting of events with a larger audience and which can therefore, thanks to the advertising, encourage a larger number of persons to consume alcohol. a

84. In my opinion, however, that objection cannot be endorsed, for the reasons that I shall explain below.

85. First, after the introduction of the ban on the television advertising of alcoholic beverages under the Loi Evin, the CSA, which was entrusted with ensuring compliance, found that in some cases producers of alcoholic beverages had evaded the prohibition by purchasing advertising space on hoardings displayed during sporting events broadcast in France which, although taking place abroad, did not have a particularly high international profile but in reality were of specific interest to the French public. b

86. As it considered that this conduct circumvented the prohibition on the television advertising of alcoholic beverages under the Loi Evin and hence undermined the objective of protecting public health pursued by that law, the CSA decided in 1995 to prohibit the transmission in France of 'other events' at which such advertising was present. In this way it extended the prohibition to cover the transmission even of events that are not broadcast 'in a large number of countries' and concern 'specifically the French public', which in the past had been the subject of misconduct. c

87. The logic underlying that decision appears to me to be even more obvious and consistent with the purpose of the French legislation if one considers that as 'other events' are aimed 'specifically at the French public', producers of alcoholic beverages and advertisers may, by choosing the product to promote and defining the message to display on the hoardings, arrange advertising at such events that is targeted at French television viewers, and for that reason more incisive and thus more harmful. d

88. Furthermore, the effectiveness of the prohibition in question appears to be greater in the case of 'other events'. As these are broadcast in a small number of countries, their transmission to a large audience such as public French viewing is particularly important to the holders of television rights and advertising agencies, which will therefore agree more easily to comply with the ban. e

89. I could also add that the distinction between 'international events' and 'other events' makes it easier to reconcile the objective of protecting public health with the principle of the freedom to provide services, because it reduces the number of instances in which it is forbidden for sporting events taking place abroad to be broadcast in France. As a result of that distinction the restriction is limited only to 'other events', which, as I have said, are not broadcast in a large number of countries and hold particular interest only for a French audience. f

90. It is true that a general prohibition on the broadcasting of all sporting events would have been more effective in the campaign against alcoholism and consequently a more appropriate means of protecting public health. It is clear, however, that this would have created a far greater obstacle to the provision of services than that caused by the legislation in question. g

91. As to the argument that a general prohibition would have better ensured legal certainty, I would observe that legal certainty can also be safeguarded by means of a prohibition targeted on 'other events'. These are identified on the basis of two precise criteria (the number of countries in which they are broadcast and their specific interest to French audiences), the combination of which, in my view, enables television broadcasters and other operators in the h

b 92. I would add that French broadcasters, the parties primarily interested in the televising of sports meetings, can dispel any uncertainty about an event's classification as international or binational by consulting the CSA, even informally. All the more so as the latter, being the authority responsible for applying the Loi Evin and supervising the television sector in general, maintains frequent and regular contacts with broadcasters<sup>26</sup>.

c 93. I note, moreover, that the objection of Bacardi and the Commission about the greater legal certainty and hence greater Community 'tolerability' of a total prohibition reveals a paradox that runs through several aspects of the application and the observations submitted in the cases under examination. It emerges from that objection that the French measure in question should be held to be incompatible with the Treaty because it imposes too little restriction on the advertising of alcoholic beverages; whereas a total ban on advertising, despite impeding the freedom to provide services to a far greater extent, is paradoxically deemed compatible with Community law.

d 94. In order to refute the appropriateness of the French legislation as a means of attaining the objective of protecting public health, in the infringement proceedings the Commission lastly criticises the actual manner in which the CSA allegedly applied the Loi Evin and the Code of Conduct. In the Commission's opinion, by adopting the contested measures the CSA impeded the transmission in France of sporting events only when hoardings promoting alcoholic beverages marketed in France were on display at the competition venues. If the CSA had wished to pursue consistently the objective of protecting public health, the Commission observes, it should have applied the prohibition if there were any advertising of alcoholic beverages, regardless of whether or not they were marketed in France.

f 95. The French government rebuts the accusation of discriminatory application of the Code of Conduct, maintaining instead that the French legislation was applied without making any distinction between products marketed in France and in other member states.

g 96. For my part, even leaving aside the peculiarity of an argument, which I have already dealt with, that once again criticises the French measures as insufficiently restrictive, I note that neither the Loi Evin nor the Code of Conduct limit the prohibition on the television advertising of alcoholic beverages to products marketed in France. Indeed, the former prohibits the advertising on television of all beverages with an alcohol content of more than 1.2%, while the latter explicitly requires 'equal monitoring ... of all alcoholic beverages, whether French or of foreign origin', specifying moreover that h 'French producers and advertisers may not be treated differently from their foreign competitors'.

97. Leaving that aside, I wish to observe that in its action the Commission has not even proved that the CSA applied the Loi Evin and the Code of Conduct only to the advertising of alcoholic beverages marketed in France.

i 25 In this regard I would point out that after service of the Commission's reasoned opinion the distinction between 'international events' and 'other events' was made clearer. In addition, an annex was added to the Code listing the events in the latter category (see paras 24, 25, above).

26 In this regard I would also point out that after service of the Commission's reasoned opinion the Code of Conduct was amended by allowing any interested party to ask the CSA about the conditions for applying the Code and entitling them to expect a reply within a maximum of three weeks (see paras 24, 25, above).

Indeed, the documents in the case contain no certain evidence to support the assertion that the application of the principle of non-discrimination laid down in the Code 'wavered, in the sense that primary consideration was given [only] to alcoholic beverages marketed in France'<sup>27</sup>, or was actually disregarded, permitting the appearance on French television of only 'advertising for certain foreign brands of alcohol'<sup>28</sup>. On the contrary, the documents that the Commission itself annexed to the application (which partly relate to events subsequent to those contested in the reasoned opinion) show that on several occasions the French legislation impeded the sale of advertising space for all alcoholic beverages and was therefore also applied to beverages produced in other member states<sup>29</sup>.

98. In concluding on this point, I therefore consider that the French legislation under examination is appropriate for attaining the objective of protecting public health that it pursues.

(ii) The necessity of the French legislation

99. In order to assess the proportionality of the French legislation in relation to its intended purpose of protecting public health, it must also be ascertained whether, as well as being appropriate, it does not go beyond what is necessary in order to attain that objective.

100. According to the Commission, this second requirement of the principle of proportionality is not met in the present case. It contends that in order to prevent the periodic appearance of hoardings advertising alcoholic beverages on television the French legislation impedes the televising of the entire sporting event at which they are displayed.

101. Bacardi and the United Kingdom reach the same conclusion, although for different reasons. They point out that the objective pursued by the legislation in question could be attained by means of less restrictive measures aimed at limiting the advertising content or warning the public of the harm caused by excessive alcohol consumption. In addition, the United Kingdom objects that the French legislation at issue applies to all beverages with an alcohol content of more than 1.2°, regardless of their alcoholic strength, and that it impedes the broadcasting in France of advertising that already complies with the law of another member state, thereby duplicating the controls already performed in that state.

102. In my opinion, such arguments cannot be accepted.

a 103. First, the Commission's objection cannot be accepted; as I have already mentioned above, television broadcasters do not at present have the technical means selectively to obscure hoardings advertising spirits during filming. Modern techniques for masking television images, which would permit this less restrictive solution, cannot be used by broadcasters on account of their excessive cost.

b 104. But the objections raised by Bacardi and the United Kingdom are not convincing either. France has—in my opinion, rightly—retorted that excessive consumption of alcoholic beverages is harmful to human health, regardless of their alcoholic strength, and that the type of advertising prohibited by the Code of Conduct (the televising of hoardings promoting alcoholic beverages) appears on screens unexpectedly and for only a few seconds, which means that it is not possible either to control the content of the advertising broadcast or to insert warnings about the dangers of excessive alcohol consumption at the same time as the advertising message.

c 105. As regards the risk of duplicating the control of advertising that is already compliant with the laws of another member state, France rightly argues that either the member state in which the sporting event is taking place prohibits the transmission of the images of advertising hoardings promoting alcoholic beverages, in which case the event can be broadcast in France without the need for controls, or no ban exists in that state, in which case the ban imposed by the French authorities will constitute the only control.

d 106. For my part, I would add that even if there were an overlap between the French legislation and the more permissive provisions of other member states, the French legislation could not be considered disproportionate on that ground and hence incompatible with Community law. Indeed, the court has already made clear that 'the fact that one member state imposes less strict rules than another member state does not mean that the latter's rules are disproportionate'<sup>30</sup>. The French rules can therefore not be held to infringe the principle of proportionality solely because another member state applies less strict provisions with regard to the advertising of alcoholic beverages.

e 107. I therefore feel able to conclude on this point that the French legislation under examination does not go beyond what is necessary in order to attain the objective of protecting public health which it pursues.

f 108. Lastly, I would observe that, since in my view the legislation under examination must be held to be justified by the objective of protecting public health and proportionate thereto, it is not necessary to determine whether that legislation is also justified by the overriding need to prevent evasion of the law, which was also raised by the parties in the course of the two proceedings.

g 109. In conclusion I consider that:

h —in Case C-429/02 the reply to the Cour de Cassation must be that Directive 89/552 and arts 46, 49 and 55 EC do not preclude legislation of a member state, such as the French legislation, which prohibits the television broadcasting on national territory of sporting events taking place in other member states but which are not broadcast in a large number of countries and which specifically concern national viewers, if advertising hoardings displayed at the venue of such events to promote products (in this case alcoholic beverages) that may not be advertised on television in the first state are shown;

i —the Commission's application in Case C-262/02 must be dismissed.

30 See the Alpine Investments case (para 51), cited in footnote 18, above.

IV—COSTS IN CASE C-262/02

110. Under art 69(2) of the Rules of Procedure, in infringement proceedings the unsuccessful party is to be ordered to pay the costs if they have been applied for in the successful party's pleadings. Since France applied for costs to be awarded against the Commission and the latter has been unsuccessful, it must be ordered to pay the costs.

111. Article 69(4) of the Rules of Procedure provides that the member states that intervene in the proceedings are to bear their own costs. Consequently, the United Kingdom is to bear its own costs.

V—CONCLUSION

In the light of the foregoing conclusions, I propose that the Court of Justice should:

—rule in Case C-429/02 that Directive 89/552 and arts 46, 49 and 55 EC do not preclude legislation of a member state, such as the French legislation, which prohibits the television broadcasting on national territory of sporting events taking place in another member state but which are not broadcast in a large number of countries and which specifically concern the national public, if advertising hoardings displayed at the venue of such events to promote products (in this case alcoholic beverages) that may not be advertised on television in the first state are shown;

—in Case C-262/02:

- (1) dismiss the Commission's application;
- (2) order the Commission to pay the costs;
- (3) order the United Kingdom to bear its own costs.

13 July 2004. The COURT OF JUSTICE (Grand Chamber) delivered the following judgment in European Commission (supported by the United Kingdom, intervening) v France Case C-262/02.

1. By application lodged at the Registry of the Court of Justice of the European Communities on 16 July 2002, the Commission of the European Communities brought an action under art 226 EC (formerly art 169 of the EC Treaty) for a declaration that, by making television broadcasting in France by French television channels of sporting events taking place in other member states conditional on the prior removal of advertising for alcoholic beverages, the French Republic has failed to fulfil its obligations under art 59 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, art 49 EC).

LEGAL BACKGROUND

2. Law No 91-32 of 10 January 1991 on the campaign against smoking and alcoholism (Loi Evin) (JORF of 12 January 1991, p 6615) amended, inter alia, arts L.17 to L. 21 of the Code des débits de boissons et des mesures contre l'alcoolisme (Code of licensed premises and measures against alcoholism), which restrict advertising for certain alcoholic beverages, namely beverages whose alcoholic content exceeds 1.2°.

3. According to those provisions television advertising for alcoholic beverages, whether direct or indirect, is prohibited and that prohibition is repeated in art 8 of Decree No 92-280 of 27 March 1992, which was adopted to implement art 27 of the Law of 30 September 1986 on freedom of a communication and laying down the general principles concerning the rules applicable to advertising and sponsorship (JORF of 28 March 1992, p 4313).

4. Other forms of advertising are, however, permitted by French legislation. Thus it is permissible, for example, to advertise alcoholic beverages in the press, on the radio (except at certain times) or in the form of posters and signboards, including on advertising hoardings placed in sports stadia, etc.

b 5. An infringement of the Loi Evin is classified as a 'délit' (misdemeanour) by French criminal law.

Procedural rules

c 6. According to the first paragraph of art 42 of Law No 86-1067 of 30 September 1986 on the freedom of communication, the 'Loi Léotard' (JORF of 1 October 1986, p 11755), it is for the Conseil supérieur de l'audiovisuel (the Audiovisual Authority; the CSA) to ensure the application of the Loi Evin. In that context, the CSA may call on the distributors of television services to comply with their obligations and, where they do not comply with the requirements imposed on them, it may order administrative penalties against them. Furthermore, the CSA may refer any infringements committed by distributors to the Procureur de la République (Public Prosecutor).

Implementing measures

e 7. In 1995 the French authorities, that is to say the CSA and the Ministry for Youth and Sports, and the French television channels drew up a Code of Conduct, published in the Bulletin Officiel du Ministère de la Jeunesse et des Sports, on the interpretation of the rules of the Loi Evin so far as concerns their application to television broadcasting of sporting events taking place abroad (that is, live broadcasts or retransmissions) in which advertising for alcoholic beverages is visible, for example on advertising hoardings or on sports shirts, and which are, accordingly, likely to contain indirect television advertising for alcoholic beverages within the meaning of that law.

f 8. Although it is not legally binding, the Code of Conduct states that in the case of bi-national events taking place abroad, which are described in the Code as 'other events', French broadcasters and any other party subject to French law (referred to collectively as 'French broadcasters'), who do not control filming conditions, must use all available means to prevent the appearance on their channels of brand names of alcoholic beverages. Thus, a French broadcaster must, at the time when it acquires the retransmission rights, inform its foreign partners of the requirements of French law and the rules laid down by the Code of Conduct. Likewise, it must make inquiries, so far as is materially possible and before the sporting event is broadcast, of the holder of the retransmission rights about the advertisements which will be displayed at the venue where that event is to take place. Finally, the French broadcaster must use all the technical means available to avoid showing hoardings advertising alcoholic beverages.

g 9. However, in the case of multinational events taking place abroad French broadcasters are not to be suspected of complicity with respect to advertising appearing on the screen where they have no control over the filming conditions of the pictures broadcast.

i 10. In the version applicable to the dispute in the main proceedings, the Code of Conduct defined multinational events as those 'in respect of which the images being retransmitted in a large number of countries cannot be regarded as being aimed principally at the French public'. Bi-national events were defined as 'events taking place abroad other than those mentioned in the previous category, where the transmission is specifically aimed at a French audience'.

11. Besides drawing up the Code of Conduct, the CSA approached French broadcasters to persuade them to insist on the removal of such hoardings advertising alcoholic beverages or not to retransmit the event at all. In at least one case the CSA referred a case to the state Prosecutor for proceedings to be brought against a French broadcaster. However, since the Code was adopted the CSA has taken action against such a broadcaster only once, in 1996.

PRE-LITIGATION PROCEDURE

12. After inviting the French Republic to submit its observations the Commission sent it a reasoned opinion, on 21 November 1996, stating that the prohibition on television advertising for alcoholic beverages sold in France, in the case of indirect television advertising resulting from the appearance on screen of hoardings visible during the retransmission of bi-national sporting events taking place in other member states, appeared to be incompatible with the freedom to provide services. Furthermore, the French Republic was called on to take the measures necessary to comply with that reasoned opinion within a period of two months from the date of notification thereof.

13. Contact between the Commission and the French authorities continued thereafter, leading to various modifications of the Code of Conduct.

14. However, since it found that there were still practical problems with the application of the Loi Evin and that the amendments proposed by the French authorities were not sufficient to remedy them, the Commission decided to bring the present infringement proceedings.

15. By order of the President of the court of 3 December 2002 the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland was given leave, in accordance with the first paragraph of art 37 of the EC Statute of the Court of Justice and art 93(1) of the Rules of Procedure, to intervene in support of the forms of order sought by the Commission.

THE ACTION

16. In support of its action the Commission relies on a single plea in law, alleging that the French rules prohibiting television advertising for alcoholic beverages sold in France, in the case of indirect television advertising resulting from the appearance on screen of hoardings visible during the retransmission of bi-national sporting events held in other member states ('the television advertising rules at issue'), is incompatible with art 59 of the Treaty.

Arguments of the parties

17. The Commission and the United Kingdom government argue that the French rules on television advertising are contrary to art 59 of the Treaty.

18. They entail restrictions on the freedom to provide advertising services and television broadcasting services.

19. Furthermore, although they may in principle be justified for reasons relating to the protection of public health, as art 56(1) of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, art 46(1) EC) read in combination with art 66 of the EC Treaty (now art 55 EC) permits, such rules are disproportionate.

20. The French government contends that the French rules on television advertising are not contrary to art 59 of the Treaty.

- a 21. Even if they entail a restriction within the meaning of art 59 of the Treaty, they are in any event justified by reasons relating to the protection of public health and the need to prevent evasion of the applicable rules. Furthermore, the French government submits that such rules are proportionate to the objectives pursued.
- b Findings of the court
22. Article 59 of the Treaty requires the elimination of any restriction on the freedom to provide services, even if it applies to national providers of services and to those of other member states alike, when it is liable to prohibit or otherwise impede the activities of a provider of services established in another member state where he lawfully provides similar services (see to that effect Säger v Dennemeyer & Co Ltd Case C-76/90 [1991] ECR I-4221 (para 12) and Criminal proceedings against Corsten Case C-58/98 [2000] ECR I-7919 (para 33)). Moreover, freedom to provide services is enjoyed by both providers and recipients of services (see to that effect Luisi v Ministero del Tesoro Joined cases 286/82 and 26/83 [1984] ECR 377 (para 16)).
- c
- d 23. The freedom to provide services may, however, in the absence of Community harmonisation measures, be limited by national rules justified by the reasons mentioned in art 56(1) of the EC Treaty, read together with art 66, or for overriding requirements of the general interest (see, to that effect, Criminal proceedings against Gambelli and Case C-243/01 (2003) Transcript (opinion), 13 March, (2003) Transcript (judgment), 6 November).
- e 24. In that context, it is for the member states to decide on the degree of protection which they wish to afford to public health and on the way in which that protection is to be achieved. They may do so, however, only within the limits set by the Treaty and must, in particular, observe the principle of proportionality (see Aragonesa de Publicidad Exterior SA v Departamento de Sanidad y Seguridad Social de la Generalitat de Cataluña Joined cases C-1/90 and C-176/90 [1991] ECR I-4151 (para 16)), which requires that the measures adopted be appropriate to secure the attainment of the objective which they pursue and not go beyond what is necessary in order to attain it (see, in particular, Säger's case (para 15), Criminal proceedings against Arblade, Criminal proceedings against Leloup Joined cases C-369/96 and C-376/96 [1999] ECR I-8453 (para 35), Corsten's case (para 39) and Canal Satélite Digital SL v Administración General del Estado Case C-390/99 [2002] ECR I-607 (para 33)).
- g 25. In order to assess the merits of the Commission's plea in this case, since there are no Community harmonisation measures on the matter, three points must be examined in turn, namely, whether there is a restriction within the meaning of art 59 of the Treaty, whether there may be justification for French rules on television advertising such as those at issue in the main proceedings under art 56(1) of the Treaty, read together with art 66, and whether those rules are proportionate.
- h
- i 26. In the first place, it must be observed that the French rules on television advertising constitute a restriction on freedom to provide services within the meaning of art 59 of the Treaty. They entail a restriction on freedom to provide advertising services in so far as the owners of the advertising hoardings must refuse, as a preventive measure, any advertising for alcoholic beverages if the sporting event is likely to be retransmitted in France. They also impede the provision of broadcasting services for television programmes. French broadcasters must refuse all retransmission of sporting events in which hoardings bearing advertising for alcoholic beverages marketed in France may be visible. Furthermore, the organisers of sporting events taking place outside France cannot sell the retransmission rights to French broadcasters if the transmission of the television programmes of such events is likely to contain indirect television advertising for those alcoholic beverages. a

27. In that regard, the arguments relied on by the French government against classing the rules as 'restrictive' within the meaning of art 59 cannot be accepted. b

28. Although it is true that it is technically possible to mask the images in order selectively to conceal the hoardings showing advertising for alcoholic beverages, the use of such techniques involves substantial additional costs for the French broadcasters, as the French government admitted at the hearing.

29. As regards the argument that the French rules on television advertising at issue concern, without discrimination, not only alcoholic beverages produced in France, but also alcoholic beverages regardless of their origin, so long as they are sold on French territory, it is sufficient to recall that in the context of the freedom to provide services it is only the origin of the service at issue which may be relevant to the case. c

30. Second, the French rules on television advertising pursue an objective relating to the protection of public health within the meaning of art 56(1) of the Treaty, as Advocate General Tizzano stated in para 69 of his opinion. Measures restricting the advertising of alcoholic beverages in order to combat alcohol abuse reflect public health concerns (see EC Commission v France Case 152/78 [1980] ECR 2299 (para 17), the Aragonesa de Publicidad case (para 15) and Konsumentombudsmannen (KO) v Gourmet International Products AB Case C-405/98 [2001] All ER (EC) 308, [2001] ECR I-1795 (para 27)). d

31. Third, the French rules on television advertising are appropriate to ensure their aim of protecting public health. Furthermore, they do not go beyond what is necessary to achieve such an objective. They limit the situations in which hoardings advertising alcoholic beverages may be seen on television and are therefore likely to restrict the broadcasting of such advertising, thus reducing the occasions on which television viewers might be encouraged to consume alcoholic beverages. e

32. In that regard, the arguments set out by the Commission and the United Kingdom to establish the disproportionate nature of those rules cannot be accepted. f

33. As far as concerns the argument that the French rules on television advertising are inconsistent, since they apply only to alcoholic beverages whose alcohol content exceeds 1.2°, concern only television advertising, and do not apply to advertising for tobacco, it is sufficient to reply that that option lies within the discretion of the member states to decide on the degree of protection which they wish to afford to public health and on the way on which that protection is to be achieved (see the Aragonesa de Publicidad case (para 16)). g

34. As regards the argument that the rules mean in practice that whole events cannot be broadcast, although there are less restrictive measures to ensure the protection of public health, it must be observed that, for the reasons given by Advocate General Tizzano in paras 103 and 104 of his opinion, having regard, first, to the technical means currently available and, second, to their excessive cost, there is not currently any measure which is less restrictive which can exclude or conceal indirect television advertising for alcoholic beverages resulting from hoardings visible during the retransmission of sporting events. Since that advertising appears on screen only sporadically and only for a few seconds, it is not possible either to control its content or to insert warnings at h

a the same time as the appearance of the advertisement on the screen on the dangers resulting from an excessive consumption of alcohol.

35. As regards the argument that the French rules on television advertising have the result that television advertising for alcoholic beverages is authorised where the French audience is overall very high (multinational events), but prohibited where the French audience is not so high (bi-national events), it is sufficient to observe that by limiting the prohibition to indirect advertising broadcast during the retransmission of sporting events which specifically target a French audience and when the advertising is therefore capable of specifically targeting that audience alone, the rules can only make the measure less prejudicial to the freedom to provide services and, therefore, more proportionate to the objective pursued.

36. The same is true as regards the argument that the French rules on television advertising at issue are, in practice, only applied to advertising for alcoholic beverages marketed in France. Limiting the prohibition at issue to advertising for products which are marketed in France, and thus restricting the scope of that prohibition, reduces the impediment to the freedom to provide services and makes it therefore more proportionate to the objective pursued.

37. As regards the argument that advertising for alcoholic beverages is permitted in certain member states, it must be observed that, as Advocate General Tizzano stated in para 106 of his opinion, the fact that one member state imposes less strict rules than another member state does not mean that the latter's rules are disproportionate (see Alpine Investments BV v Minister van Financiën Case C-384/93 [1995] All ER (EC) 543, [1995] ECR I-1141 (para 51)).

38. As regards the argument that the application of the French rules on advertising might duplicate controls already carried out in the context of the procedures in force in another member state, it must be observed that, as Advocate General Tizzano states in para 105 of his opinion, if the member state in which the sporting event is taking place prohibits the transmission of the images of hoardings displaying advertising for alcoholic beverages, that event can be broadcast in France without the need for controls. If, on the other hand, such a ban does not exist in the member state in which the sporting event is taking place, the control imposed by the French authorities will be the only one.

39. Finally, as far as concerns the argument that some of the rules are ambiguous, it is sufficient to state that for the reasons stated by the Advocate General in para 91 of his opinion, the provisions in question are sufficiently clear and precise. The rules on television advertising at issue define with sufficient precision, for the broadcasters concerned, the cases in which the retransmission of sporting events is prohibited.

40. It is clear from all the foregoing considerations that in those circumstances the single plea relied on by the Commission in support of its action cannot be accepted and, therefore, it must be rejected.

COSTS

i 41. Under art 69(2) of the Rules of Procedure, the unsuccessful party is to be ordered to pay the costs if they have been applied for in the successful party's pleadings. Since the French Republic has applied for costs and the Commission has been unsuccessful, the Commission must be ordered to pay the costs. In accordance with the first subparagraph of art 69(4), the United Kingdom is to pay its own costs.

On those grounds, the Court of Justice (Grand Chamber) hereby:

- (1) Dismisses the action;
- (2) Orders the Commission of the European Communities to pay the costs;
- (3) Orders the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to bear its own costs.

13 July 2004. The COURT OF JUSTICE (Grand Chamber) delivered the following judgment in Bacardi France SAS v Télévision Française 1 SA (TF1) Case C-429/02.

1. By decision of 19 November 2002, received at the Court of Justice of the European Communities on 27 November 2002, the French Cour de Cassation (Court of Cassation) referred to the court for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) two questions on the interpretation of Council Directive (EEC) 89/552 (on the co-ordination of certain provisions laid down by law, regulation or administrative action in member states concerning the pursuit of television broadcasting activities) (OJ 1989 L298 p 23) and art 59 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, art 49 EC).

2. Those questions were raised in proceedings between Bacardi France SAS, formerly Bacardi-Martini SAS (Bacardi), and Télévision Française 1 SA (TF1), Groupe Jean-Claude Darmon SA (Darmon) and Giro Sport SARL (Giro Sport), seeking an order that the latter three undertakings cease to put pressure on foreign clubs to refuse advertising for alcoholic beverages produced by Bacardi on advertising hoardings placed in venues hosting bi-national sporting events taking place in other member states.

Community legislation

3. Directive 89/552 aims to abolish restrictions on the free movement of services in the broadcasting of television programmes. To that end, it lays down the principle of freedom to receive and transmit programmes across borders and co-ordinates the laws applicable thereto in the different member states in fields such as television advertising. According to the system put in place by that directive, it is for the originating member state to regulate and monitor broadcasts transmitted across borders while observing the minimum rules laid down by the directive. By contrast, in the fields co-ordinated by the directive the receiving member states are, generally, no longer competent.

Definitions

4. 'Television advertising' is defined in art 1(b) of Directive 89/552 as—

'any form of announcement broadcast in return for payment or for similar consideration by a public or private undertaking in connection with a trade, business, craft or profession in order to promote the supply of goods or services, including immovable property, or rights and obligations, in return for payment.'

Substantive rules

5. The first sentence of art 2(2) of Directive 89/552 provides:

'Member States shall ensure freedom of reception and shall not restrict retransmission on their territory of television broadcasts from other Member States for reasons which fall within the fields coordinated by this Directive.'

a 6. Article 10(1) of the directive states:

'Television advertising shall be readily recognizable as such and kept quite separate from other parts of the programme service by optical and/or acoustic means.'

b 7. The first sentence of art 11(1) of the directive provides that 'Advertisements shall be inserted between programmes'.

8. According to art 11(2) of Directive 89/552:

'In programmes consisting of autonomous parts, or in sports programmes and similarly structured events and performances comprising intervals, advertisements shall only be inserted between the parts or in the intervals.'

c

d 9. Law No 91-32 of 10 January 1991 on the campaign against smoking and alcoholism (Loi Evin) (JORF of 12 January 1991, p 6615) amended, inter alia, arts L. 17 to L. 21 of the Code des débits de boissons et des mesures contre l'alcoolisme (Code of licensed premises and measures against alcoholism), which restrict advertising for certain alcoholic beverages, namely beverages whose alcoholic content exceeds 1.2°.

e 10. According to those provisions television advertising for alcoholic beverages, whether direct or indirect, is prohibited and that prohibition is repeated in art 8 of Decree No 92-280 of 27 March 1992, which was adopted to implement art 27 of the Law of 30 September 1986 on freedom of communication and laying down the general principles concerning the rules applicable to advertising and sponsorship (JORF of 28 March 1992, p 4313).

f 11. Other forms of advertising are, however, permitted by French legislation. Thus it is permissible, for example, to advertise alcoholic beverages in the press, on the radio (except at certain times) or in the form of posters and signboards, including on advertising hoardings placed in sports stadia, etc.

12. An infringement of the Loi Evin is classified as a 'délit' (misdemeanour) by French criminal law.

g Procedural rules

h 13. According to the first paragraph of art 42 of Law No 86-1067 of 30 September 1986 on the freedom of communication, the 'Loi Léotard' (JORF of 1 October 1986, p 11755), it is for the Conseil supérieur audiovisuel (the Audiovisual Authority; the CSA) to ensure the application of the Loi Evin. In that context, the CSA may call on the distributors of television services to comply with their obligations and, where they do not comply with the requirements imposed on them, it may order administrative penalties against them. Furthermore, the CSA may refer any infringements committed by distributors to the Procureur de la République (Public Prosecutor).

14. In 1995 the French authorities, that is to say the CSA and the Ministry for Youth and Sports, and the French television channels drew up a Code of Conduct, published in the Bulletin Officiel du Ministère de la Jeunesse et des Sports, on the interpretation of the rules of the Loi Evin so far as concerns their application to television broadcasting of sporting events taking place abroad (that is, live broadcasts or retransmissions) in which advertising for alcoholic beverages is visible, for example on advertising hoardings or on sports shirts, and which are, accordingly, likely to contain indirect television advertising for alcoholic beverages within the meaning of that law. a

15. Although it is not legally binding, the Code of Conduct states that in the case of bi-national events taking place abroad, which are described in the Code as 'other events', French broadcasters and any other party subject to French law (referred to collectively as 'French broadcasters'), who do not control filming conditions, must use all available means to prevent the appearance on their channels of brand names of alcoholic beverages. Thus, a French broadcaster must, at the time when it acquires the retransmission rights, inform its foreign partners of the requirements of French law and the rules laid down by the Code of Conduct. Likewise, it must make inquiries, so far as is materially possible and before the sporting event is broadcast, of the holder of the retransmission rights about the advertisements which will be displayed at the venue where that event is to take place. Finally, the French broadcaster must use all the technical means available to avoid showing hoardings advertising alcoholic beverages. b

16. However, in the case of multinational events taking place abroad French broadcasters are not to be suspected of complicity with respect to advertising appearing on the screen where they have no control over the filming conditions of the pictures broadcast.

17. In the version applicable to the dispute in the main proceedings, the Code of Conduct defined multinational events as those 'in respect of which the images being retransmitted in a large number of countries cannot be regarded as being aimed principally at the French public'. Bi-national events were defined as 'events taking place abroad other than those mentioned in the previous category, where the transmission is specifically aimed at a French audience'. e

18. Besides drawing up the Code of Conduct, the CSA approached French broadcasters to persuade them to insist on the removal of such hoardings advertising alcoholic beverages or not to retransmit the event at all. In at least one case the CSA referred a case to the state Prosecutor for proceedings to be brought against a French broadcaster. f

THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND THE QUESTIONS REFERRED g

19. Bacardi is a French company belonging to the international group Bacardi-Martini, which produces and markets numerous alcoholic beverages in most countries of the world, including Bacardi rum, Martini and Duval pastis.

20. Darmon and Girosport are companies which negotiate on behalf of TF1 for television retransmission rights for football matches. h

21. Relying on the alleged fact that Darmon and Girosport put pressure on foreign clubs to refuse to allow Bacardi's brand names to appear on advertising hoardings around sports stadia, Bacardi sought an order that Darmon, Girosport and TF1 should cease that conduct as being incompatible with art 59 of the Treaty.

22. After that application was rejected both at first instance and on appeal, Bacardi appealed on a point of law. i

23. As it was in doubt as to the compatibility with Community law of the French rules prohibiting television advertising for alcoholic beverages marketed in France, in the case of indirect television advertising resulting from the appearance on screen of hoardings visible during the retransmission of a bi-national sporting events taking place in other member states ('the television advertising rules at issue in the main proceedings'), the Court of Cassation decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

b (1) [Does] Directive 89/552/EEC of 3 October 1989 ("Television without frontiers"), in the version prior to that of Directive 97/36/EC of 30 June 1997, [preclude] national legislation, such as Articles L.17 to L. 21 of the French Code des débits de boissons and Article 8 of Decree No 92-280 of 27 March 1992, which prohibits, for reasons relating to the protection of public health and on pain of criminal penalties, advertising for alcoholic drinks, whether of national origin or from other Member States of the Union, on television, whether in the form of advertising spots within the meaning of Article 10 of the directive [direct advertising] or of indirect advertising as a result of hoardings advertising alcoholic drinks appearing on television without constituting surreptitious advertising within the meaning of Article 1(c) of the directive[?]

d (2) [Are] Article 49 EC and the principle of the free movement of television broadcasts within the Union to be interpreted as precluding a national provision such as that in Articles L.17 to L. 21 of the French Code des débits de boissons and Article 8 of Decree No 92-280 of 27 March 1992 which prohibits, for reasons relating to the protection of public health and on pain of criminal penalties, advertising for alcoholic drinks, whether of national origin or from other Member States of the Union, on television, whether in the form of advertising spots within the meaning of Article 10 of the directive [direct advertising] or of indirect advertising as a result of hoardings advertising alcoholic drinks appearing on television without constituting surreptitious advertising within the meaning of Article 1(c) of the directive, from having the effect that operators responsible for the broadcasting and distribution of television programmes: (a) refrain from broadcasting television programmes, such as in particular retransmissions of sporting events, whether held in France or in other countries of the Union, where they show prohibited advertisements within the meaning of the French Code des débits de boissons, or (b) broadcast them on condition that prohibited advertisements within the meaning of the French Code des débits de boissons do not appear, thereby preventing the conclusion of advertising contracts concerning alcoholic drinks whether of national origin or from other Member States of the Union[?]

THE QUESTIONS REFERRED

h The first question: the obligation to ensure freedom of reception and retransmission

24. By its first question the national court asks, essentially, whether the first sentence of art 2(2) of Directive 89/552 precludes a member state from prohibiting television advertising for alcoholic beverages marketed in that state, in the case of indirect television advertising resulting from the appearance on screen of hoardings visible during the retransmission of bi-national sporting events taking place in other member states.

i In that context, the national court wishes to know whether such indirect television advertising must be classified as 'television advertising' within the meaning of arts 1(b), 10 and 11 of the directive.

25. The first sentence of art 2(2) of Directive 89/552 requires member states to ensure freedom of reception and not to restrict retransmission on their territory of television broadcasts from other member states for reasons which fall within the fields co-ordinated by the directive. Articles 10 to 21 harmonise the rules on television advertising. a

26. By the definition given in art 1(b) of Directive 89/552, 'television advertising' comprises—

'any form of announcement broadcast in return for payment or for similar consideration by a public or private undertaking in connection with a trade, business, craft or profession in order to promote the supply of goods or services, including immovable property, or rights and obligations, in return for payment.' b

Under art 10(1) 'television advertising shall be readily recognisable as such and kept quite separate from other parts of the programme service by optical and/or acoustic means'. The first sentence of art 11(1) provides that 'advertisements shall be inserted between programmes' and art 11(2) states that 'in programmes consisting of autonomous parts, or in sports programmes and similarly structured events and performances comprising intervals, advertisements shall only be inserted between the parts or in the intervals'. c

27. In this case, for the reasons set out by Advocate General Tizzano in paras 48 to 52 of his opinion, the indirect television advertising for alcoholic beverages resulting from hoardings visible on screen during the retransmission of sporting events does not constitute a separate announcement broadcast in order to promote goods or services. For obvious reasons, it is impossible to show such advertising only during the intervals between the different parts of the television broadcast concerned. The images on the advertising hoardings which appear in the background of the pictures broadcast, in a random and unpredictable fashion according to the requirements of the retransmission, do not have any distinct character in that context. d

28. Such indirect television advertising cannot, therefore, be regarded as 'television advertising' within the meaning of Directive 89/552, and accordingly the directive is not applicable to it. e

29. Consequently, the answer to the first question must be that the first sentence of art 2(2) of Directive 89/552 does not preclude a member state from prohibiting television advertising for alcoholic beverages marketed in that state, in the case of indirect television advertising resulting from the appearance on screen of hoardings visible during the retransmission of bi-national sporting events taking place in other member states. f

That kind of indirect television advertising is not to be classed as 'television advertising' within the meaning of arts 1(b), 10 and 11 of the directive. g

Second question: freedom to provide services h

30. By its second question, the national court asks, essentially, whether art 59 of the Treaty (now, after amendment, art 49 EC) precludes a member state from prohibiting television advertising for alcoholic beverages marketed in that state, in the case of indirect television advertising resulting from the appearance on screen of hoardings visible during the retransmission of bi-national sporting events taking place in other member states. i

31. Article 59 of the Treaty requires the elimination of any restriction on the freedom to provide services, even if it applies to national providers of services and to those of other member states alike, when it is liable to prohibit or otherwise impede the activities of a provider of services established in another member state where he lawfully provides similar services (see to that effect

a Säger v Dennemeyer & Co Ltd Case C-76/90 [1991] ECR I-4221 (para 12) and Criminal proceedings against Corsten Case C-58/98 [2000] ECR I-7919 (para 33)). Moreover, freedom to provide services is enjoyed by both providers and recipients of services (see to that effect Luisi v Ministero del Tesoro Joined cases 286/82 and 26/83 [1984] ECR 377 (para 16)).

b 32. The freedom to provide services may, however, in the absence of Community harmonisation measures, be limited by national rules justified by the reasons mentioned in art 56(1) of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment art 46(1) EC) read together with art 66 of the EC Treaty (now art 55 EC), or for overriding requirements of the general interest (see, to that effect, Criminal proceedings against Gambelli Case C-243/01 (2003) Transcript (opinion), 13 March, (2003) Transcript (judgment), 6 November).

c 33. In that context, it is for the member states to decide on the degree of protection which they wish to afford to public health and on the way in which that protection is to be achieved. They may do so, however, only within the limits set by the Treaty and must, in particular, observe the principle of proportionality (see Aragonesa de Publicidad Exterior SA v Departamento de Sanidad y Seguridad Social de la Generalitat de Cataluña Joined cases C-1/90 and C-176/90 [1991] ECR I-4151 (para 16)), which requires that the measures adopted be appropriate to secure the attainment of the objective which they pursue and not go beyond what is necessary in order to attain it (see, in particular, Säger's case (para 15), Criminal proceedings against Arblade, Criminal proceedings against Leloup Joined cases C-369/96 and C-376/96 [1999] ECR I-8453 (para 35), Corsten's case (para 39) and Canal Satélite Digital SL v Administración General del Estado Case C-390/99 [2002] ECR I-607 (para 33)).

d 34. In the main proceedings, since there are no Community harmonisation measures on the matter, three points must be examined in turn, namely, whether there is a restriction within the meaning of art 59 of the Treaty, whether there may be justification for rules on television advertising such as those at issue in the main proceedings under art 56(1) of the Treaty, read together with art 66, and whether those rules are proportionate.

e 35. In the first place, it must be observed that rules on television advertising such as those at issue in the main proceedings constitute a restriction on freedom to provide services within the meaning of art 59 of the Treaty. They entail a restriction on freedom to provide advertising services in so far as the owners of the advertising hoardings must refuse, as a preventive measure, any advertising for alcoholic beverages if the sporting event is likely to be retransmitted in France. They also impede the provision of broadcasting services for television programmes. French broadcasters must refuse all retransmission of sporting events in which hoardings bearing advertising for alcoholic beverages marketed in France may be visible. Furthermore, the organisers of sporting events taking place outside France cannot sell the retransmission rights to French broadcasters if the transmission of the television programmes of such events is likely to contain indirect television advertising for those alcoholic beverages.

f 36. In that context, as is clear from paras 28 and 29 of today's judgment in European Commission (supported by the United Kingdom, intervening) v France Case C-262/02 [2005] All ER (EC) 157, the arguments of the French government concerning, first, the technical possibility of masking images in order selectively to conceal the hoardings showing advertising for alcoholic beverages and, second, the non-discriminatory application of the rules on television advertising to all alcoholic beverages, whether they are produced in France or abroad, cannot be accepted. Although it is true that such technical means exist, they involve substantial additional costs for the French broadcasters. Furthermore, in the context of the freedom to provide services, it is only the origin of the service at issue which may be relevant in the case in these proceedings. a

37. Second, rules on television advertising such as those at issue in the main proceedings pursue an objective relating to the protection of public health within the meaning of art 56(1) of the Treaty, as Advocate General Tizzano stated in para 69 of his opinion. Measures restricting the advertising of alcoholic beverages in order to combat alcohol abuse reflect public health concerns (see EC Commission v France Case 152/78 [1980] ECR 2299 (para 17), the Aragonesa de Publicidad case (para 15) and Konsumentombudsmannen (KO) v Gourmet International Products AB Case C-405/98 [2001] All ER (EC) 308, [2001] ECR I-1795 (para 27)). b

38. Third, rules on television advertising such as those at issue in the main proceedings are appropriate to ensure their aim of protecting public health. Furthermore, they do not go beyond what is necessary to achieve such an objective. They limit the situations in which hoardings advertising alcoholic beverages may be seen on television and are therefore likely to restrict the broadcasting of such advertising, thus reducing the occasions on which television viewers might be encouraged to consume alcoholic beverages. d

39. In that regard, as is clear from paras 33 to 39 of today's judgment in Commission v France, the arguments set out by the Commission and the United Kingdom government to establish the disproportionate nature of that regime must be rejected. e

40. As far as concerns the one argument raised by Bacardi which was not considered in today's judgment in Commission v France, namely the argument that the rules on television advertising at issue in the main proceedings are not consistent because they do not cover advertising for alcoholic beverages visible in the background on film sets, that option lies within the discretion of the member states to decide on the degree of protection which they wish to afford to public health and on the way in which that protection is to be achieved (see the Aragonesa de Publicidad case (para 16)). f

41. Accordingly, the answer to the second question is that art 59 of the Treaty does not preclude a member state from prohibiting television advertising for alcoholic beverages marketed in that state, in the case of indirect television advertising resulting from the appearance on screen of hoardings visible during the retransmission of bi-national sporting events taking place in other member states. g

COSTS

42. The costs incurred by the French and United Kingdom governments and the Commission, which have submitted observations to the court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main action, a step in the proceedings before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. h

On those grounds, the Court of Justice (Grand Chamber), in answer to the questions referred to it by the Cour de Cassation by judgment of 19 November 2002, hereby rules: i

(1) The first sentence of art 2(2) of Council Directive (EEC) 89/552 (on the co-ordination of certain provisions laid down by law, regulation or

- a* administrative action in member states concerning the pursuit of television broadcasting activities) does not preclude a member state from prohibiting television advertising for alcoholic beverages marketed in that state, in the case of indirect television advertising resulting from the appearance on screen of hoardings visible during the retransmission of bi-national sporting events taking place in the territory of other member states.
- b* That kind of indirect television advertising is not to be classed as 'television advertising' within the meaning of arts 1(b), 10 and 11 of the directive.
- (2) Article 59 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, art 49 EC) does not preclude a member state from prohibiting television advertising for alcoholic beverages marketed in that state, in the case of indirect television advertising resulting from the appearance on screen of hoardings visible during the retransmission of bi-national sporting events taking place in other member states.

7 NOVEMBER 2002, 23 JANUARY 2003, 29 APRIL 2004

Medicine – Product licence – Generic product – Essential similarity – Demonstrating essential similarity – Use of originator's confidential information – Originator supplying details of research and testing in development of drug when applying to licensing authority for product licence – Originator granted product licence for similar generic product by reference to original product – Generic company subsequently applying for product licence for similar generic product by reference to originator's first product – Whether confidential information provided originator in course of product licencing procedure for second generic product to be accorded further period of protection – Council Directive (EEC) 65/65, art 4(8)(a).

An applicant for a marketing authorisation for a medicinal product granted by the competent authorities of the United Kingdom was not required to provide the results of pharmacological and toxicological tests and of clinical trials of the medicinal product concerned where the abridged procedure under art 4(8)(a)<sup>a</sup> of Council Directive (EEC) 65/65 (on the approximation of provisions laid down by law, regulation or administrative action relating to medicinal products) applied. In order to rely on the abridged procedure, the applicant had to submit data in respect of another 'reference' product which had already been authorised and demonstrate either, pursuant to art 4(8)(a)(i), that the medicinal product was essentially similar to the reference product and that the person responsible for marketing that reference product had consented to the relevant data being used, or, pursuant to art 4(8)(a)(iii), that the medicinal product concerned was essentially similar to a reference product which had been authorised within the Community for not less than ten years. However, by way of a proviso, the abridged procedure did not apply where the medicinal product was intended for a different therapeutic use from that of the reference product and was to be administered by different routes or in different doses. The main proceedings concerned three immuno-suppressant medical products that contained the active ingredient cyclosporine. When diluted to form a solution to be drunk by a patient, those medical products reacted differently: Sandimmun formed a macroemulsion; Neoral formed a microemulsion; and SangCya underwent a process of nano dispersion. As a result of that differing dissolution, the bioavailability (the rate and extent of absorption into the body and transfer to the site of action) of the products differed, which was important because cyclosporine had a narrow therapeutic

- a* index (the dose within which clinical efficacy was observed with an acceptable safety profile). The claimant's product, Sandimmun, had been the first cyclosporine product to have been authorised within the Community. Thereafter, in order to overcome that product's problems of absorption and administration, the claimant had developed Neoral, marketing authorisation for which had been granted by the competent authorities in the United
- b* Kingdom under art 4(8)(a)(i) of the directive as a hybrid abridged application cross-referred to the data relating to Sandimmun. However, after the ten-year period of protection granted in respect of Sandimmun had expired, the competent authorities had granted marketing authorisations in respect of the defendant's product, SangCya, under art 4(8)(a)(iii) of the directive, and by reference to Sandimmun. The defendant had included with its application data
- c* studies showing the bioequivalence between SangCya and Neoral. In due course, the claimant brought judicial review proceedings challenging the decision to grant the marketing authorisation to SangCya, contending that the competent authorities had cross-referred unlawfully to the Neoral file, had erred in finding that SangCya was essentially similar to Sandimmun, and
- d* had infringed the principle of non-discrimination. On an appeal, the national court decided to stay the proceedings and refer to the Court of Justice of the European Communities a number of questions concerning whether the dispensation from providing the pharmacological, toxicological and clinical documentation laid down by art 4(8)(a)(iii) applied in conjunction with the proviso, or whether the documentation provided by the claimant in the course
- e* of the marketing authorisation procedure for Neoral had to be accorded a further period of protection of ten years, so that it could not be used by the claimant in assessing the application for marketing authorisation for SangCya.

Held – (1) Products were not to be regarded as essentially similar for the purposes of the application of art 4(8)(a)(i) or (iii) of the directive where they

f were not bioequivalent (see judgment paras 33, 35, below); R v Licensing Authority established by the Medicines Act 1968, ex p Generics (UK) Ltd (ER Squibb & Sons Ltd, intervener) Case C-368/96 (1998) 48 BMLR 161 applied.

(2) For the purposes of the procedure laid down by art 4(8)(a)(i) and (iii) of the directive, in determining the pharmaceutical form of a medicinal product, account had to be taken of the form in which it was presented and the form in which it was administered, including the physical form (according to the list of reference terms of the European Pharmacopoeia). In the main proceedings, the fact that the three products formed, when mixed for administering to a patient, respectively, a macroemulsion, a microemulsion and a nanodispersion, did not preclude those products being treated as having the same

g pharmaceutical form, provided that the differences in the form of h administration were not significant in scientific terms (see judgment paras 39, 41, 42, below).

(3) The proviso in the form of the hybrid abridged procedure laid down by the final subparagraph of art 4(8)(a) applied to applications for marketing authorisation based on art 4(8)(a)(i) or (iii). If it was ethically and scientifically

i inappropriate to repeat all tests for an application which otherwise satisfied all the requirements under art 4(8)(a)(iii), it was also inappropriate to repeat those tests for an application which otherwise satisfied the requirements set out in art 4(8)(a)(i) (see judgment paras 46, 47, below).

(4) An application for marketing authorisation for a medicinal product might be made under the proviso with reference to an authorised medicinal product provided that the medicinal product in respect of which marketing authorisation was sought was essentially similar to the authorised medicinal product, unless one or more of the differences set out in the proviso applied. If recourse to the proviso were only possible where the medicinal product in question was essentially similar to the reference medical product and, therefore, inter alia, bioequivalent to it, the proviso would be largely effective in the case of medicinal products to be administered by different routes or in different doses from those of other medicinal products on the market. Where those differences existed, the purpose of the applicant's obligation under the proviso to provide the results of appropriate pharmacological and toxicological tests and clinical trials was to prove the safety and efficacy of that medicinal product (see judgment paras 52, 54, 55, below); R v Licensing Authority established by the Medicines Act 1968, ex p Generics (UK) Ltd (ER Squibb & Sons Ltd, intervenor) Case C-368/96 (1998) 48 BMLR 161 applied. a

(5) When considering an application for marketing authorisation for a new product C under art 4(8)(a)(iii) by reference to a product A (which had been authorised for more than six or ten years), the competent authority of a member state was entitled, with a view to granting marketing authorisation, to refer without the consent of the person responsible for marketing to data submitted in support of a product B (which had been authorised within the previous six or ten years under the hybrid abridged procedure laid down by art 4(8)(a), by reference to product A), where those data consisted of clinical trials provided in order to demonstrate that product B, though suprabioavailable to product A when administered in the same dose, was safe. A medicinal product that was to be administered by a different route or in a different dose to a medicinal product on the market was a development of that latter reference medicinal product in the same way as was a medicinal product intended for a different therapeutic use from that of the original or reference medicinal product. If product B resulting from the development of the reference product A was essentially similar to that reference product, apart from its bioavailability, since that difference was nevertheless not attributable to a difference in the route of administration or the dose, the applicant for marketing authorisation for product C was entitled to refer to the clinical documentation in respect of product B. Further, if, the applicant for marketing authorisation for product C might refer to the pharmacological, toxicological and clinical documentation in respect of product B, which was the product of the development of the reference product A and essentially similar thereto, apart from the route of administration or the dose, since the differences in those two factors generally implied that products A and B were not bioequivalent, it had to be able to do so where products A and B were distinguishable only by their different bioavailability, even though the route of administration and dose remain unchanged (see judgment paras 60, 63–67, below). d

(6) In considering two hybrid applications for marketing authorisation for products B and C brought under art 4(8) of the directive and referring to product A, the competent authority of a member state did not infringe the principle of non-discrimination where, as a precondition for the grant of marketing authorisation, it had required full clinical data on the bioavailability of product B, but, having examined the data filed in support of product B, did not require the same data for product C. The situation of the applicant for marketing authorisation for product B was not comparable to that of the applicant for marketing authorisation for product C because, when the latter i

- a applicant had applied for marketing authorisation, product B was authorised and the authorities were assured of the safety and efficacy of that product (see judgment paras 70, 72, below).

Reference

- By order of 22 February 2001, the Court of Appeal (Civil Division) of England and Wales referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) six questions (set out at judgment para 23, below) on the interpretation of art 4(8)(a) of Council Directive (EEC) 65/65 (on the approximation of provisions laid down by law, regulation or administrative action relating to medicinal products), as amended. Those questions were raised in proceedings between Novartis Pharmaceuticals UK Ltd (Novartis) and the Medicines Control Agency (MCA) concerning the issue by the MCA of two marketing authorisations in respect of a medicinal product to SangStat UK Ltd, another pharmaceuticals company, and Imtix-SangStat UK Ltd, its distributor in the United Kingdom, in respect of two medicinal products, SangCya Oral Solution and Acceptine Oral Solution. Written observations were submitted on behalf of: Novartis, by I Dodds-Smith and R Hughes, Solicitors, D Anderson QC, and J Stratford, Barrister; SangStat UK Ltd and Imtix-SangStat UK Ltd, by T Cook and J Mutimear, Solicitors; the United Kingdom government, by JE Collins, acting as agent, P Sales, Barrister and R Singh QC; the Danish government, by J Molde, acting as agent; the French government, by G de Bergues and R Loosli-Surrans, acting as agents; the Portuguese government, by LI Fernandes, acting as agent; the Commission of the European Communities, by HC Støvlbæk and R Wainwright, acting as agents. Oral observations were made on behalf of: Novartis, SangStat UK Ltd and Imtix-SangStat UK Ltd, the United Kingdom government, represented by K Manji, acting as agent, and P Sales; the Danish government, the Netherlands government, represented by JGM van Bakel, acting as agent; and the Commission, represented by HC Støvlbæk and M Shotter, acting as agent. The language of the case was English. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General.

1. In the present case the Court of Appeal (Civil Division) of England and Wales asks the Court of Justice of the European Communities six questions concerning the conditions which must be met under Community law before the competent authority in a member state may authorise the marketing of a medicinal product in that member state. b

2. In particular, the proceedings raise three issues relating to art 4 of Council Directive (EEC) 65/65 (on the approximation of provisions laid down by law, regulation and administrative action relating to medicinal products)<sup>2</sup>, as amended by Council Directive (EEC) 87/21<sup>3</sup>. They allow the court to consider further the interpretation of that article which it developed in R v Licensing Authority established by the Medicines Act 1968, ex p Generics (UK) Ltd (ER Squibb & Sons Ltd, interveners)<sup>4</sup>. The first issue concerns the circumstances in which a national licensing authority, processing an application for the marketing authorisation of a medicinal product pursuant to point (8)(a)(iii) of the third paragraph<sup>5</sup> of art 4 of Directive 65/65 (point (8)(a)(iii)), may make use of data submitted to it by a different applicant in respect of another product authorised within the six or ten year period specified in that provision. The second issue is whether, in order to obtain authorisation of a new product in reliance on the proviso contained in the final subparagraph of point (8)(a) (the proviso) in conjunction with point (8)(a)(i) of the third paragraph of art 4 (point (8)(a)(i)) or point (8)(a)(iii), it is necessary to demonstrate the essential similarity of the new product to the reference product specified pursuant to those latter provisions. The third issue relates to the circumstances in which one product can be said to be 'essentially similar' to another for the purposes of points (8)(a)(i) and (iii). c

LEGAL FRAMEWORK f

3. Given the obvious need to regulate the marketing of medicinal products in the interests of public health, and in order to reduce obstacles to the free movement of such products within the Community resulting from divergences between national systems of control, the Community institutions have adopted numerous rules to harmonise controls on the marketing of medicinal products. g

4. The primary method for verifying whether a medicinal product conforms with the requirements associated with the protection of public health is the marketing authorisation, of which there are two types: Community-wide authorisations<sup>6</sup> and national authorisations. h

1 Original language: English

4 Case C-368/96 (1998) 48 BMLR 161, [1998] ECR I-7967.

5 The paragraph in question was originally the second of art 4, but became the third in consequence of an amendment effected by art 1(2) of Council Directive (EEC) 93/39 (OJ 1993 L214 p 22).

6 Community-wide authorisations are governed by Council Regulation (EEC) 2309/93 (laying down Community procedures for the authorisation and supervision of medical products for human and veterinary use and establishing a European Agency for the Evaluation of Medicinal Products) (OJ 1993 L214 p 1).

- a* 5. The present proceedings are concerned exclusively with the Community rules relating to national authorisations, which at the material time<sup>7</sup> were primarily contained in Ch II of Directive 65/65 as amended, in particular, by Directive 87/21. Article 3 of the directive provides that, in the absence of a Community-wide authorisation, a medicinal product may be marketed in a member state only after authorisation has been obtained from the competent authority in that member state.
- b* 6. Article 4 defines in detail the procedure, documents and information needed in order to obtain a marketing authorisation from the competent authority of a member state. In effect, it creates several possible procedural routes for obtaining a national marketing authorisation. Under the full procedure, an application for a marketing authorisation must, by point (8) of the third paragraph of that article (point (8)), be accompanied by the results of:
- c* —physico-chemical, biological or microbiological tests;
—pharmacological and toxicological tests;
—clinical trials.
- d* 7. Point (8)(a) of the third paragraph of art 4 (point (8)(a)) provides for an alternative, abridged procedure, whereby, in certain specified circumstances, an applicant for a marketing authorisation may be relieved of the obligation to provide the results of pharmacological and toxicological tests and of clinical trials ordinarily required by point (8), and may rely instead on data submitted in respect of another 'reference' product which has already been authorised.
- e* The obligation to provide full particulars of the physico-chemical nature of the product is not affected. In order to avail itself of the 'abridged procedure' an applicant must demonstrate:
- f* (i) either that the medicinal product is essentially similar to a product authorised in the country concerned by the application and that the person responsible for the marketing of the original medicinal product has consented to the pharmacological, toxicological or clinical references contained in the file on the original medicinal product being used for the purpose of examining the application in question ...
- g* (iii) or that the medicinal product is essentially similar to a product which has been authorised within the Community, in accordance with Community provisions in force, for not less than six years and is marketed in the Member State for which the application is made ... a Member State may ... extend this period to 10 years by a single Decision covering all the products marketed on its territory where it considers this necessary in the interests of public health.'
- h* 8. The final subparagraph of point (8)(a) contains the following proviso to the abridged procedure established by that provision:
- i* 'However, where the medicinal product is intended for a different therapeutic use from that of the other medicinal products marketed or is to be administered by different routes or in different doses, the results of appropriate pharmacological and toxicological tests and/or of appropriate clinical trials must be provided.'

<sup>7</sup> The Community legislative framework for medicinal products has with effect from 18 December 2001 been codified and consolidated in EP and Council Directive (EC) 2001/83 (on the Community code relating to medicinal products for human use) (OJ 2001 L311 p 67).

9. The proviso thus has the effect of establishing a further procedure for obtaining marketing authorisation, often termed and hereafter referred to as the hybrid abridged procedure. a

10. Under that procedure, the applicant is required to provide only the results of such pharmacological and toxicological tests and clinical trials as are appropriate in the light of the difference in therapeutic use, route of application or dose from the other medicinal products marketed. Otherwise, the applicant relies upon the data relating to the reference product which it is required to specify under point (8)(a)(i) or (iii). b

11. The hybrid abridged procedure is therefore intermediate between the abridged and the normal procedure as regards the evidential burden which it imposes on the applicant. The fresh data which an applicant is required to submit pursuant to the hybrid abridged procedure are referred to as bridging data. c

12. Guidance as to the nature of the tests and trials required in order to satisfy the various procedures laid down by art 4 of the directive is set out in the annex to Council Directive (EEC) 75/318 (on the approximation of the laws of member states relating to analytical, pharmacotoxicological and clinical standards and protocols in respect of the testing of proprietary medicinal products)<sup>8</sup> as amended by Council Directive (EEC) 91/507<sup>9</sup>. The annex to Directive 75/318 requires the particulars and documents accompanying an application for marketing approval to take account of the guidance published by the European Commission in 'The Rules governing Medicinal Products in the European Community', including vol 2 (known as the notice to applicants) and vol 3 (known as the Community guidelines). d

'After 6 or 10 years' knowledge and experience with a medicinal product, it would be inappropriate for ethical and scientific reasons to require a second applicant to repeat all tests, studies and trials, which are already known to the authorities. For a medicinal product which does not fall within the strict requirements of essential similarity, and therefore does not benefit from the exception from providing results of pharmacological, toxicological and clinical trials, [the proviso] requires results of appropriate pharmacological and toxicological tests and/or appropriate clinical trials.' f

That passage has, however, been omitted from subsequent editions of the notice to applicants. g

14. The purposes underlying art 4 are apparent from the preambles to the directive and to Directive 87/21, which introduced the abridged procedures in their current form. The first recital of the preamble to the directive makes clear that the primary purpose underlying all the rules governing the marketing authorisation of medicinal products is the protection of public health. As appears from the second and fourth recitals of the preamble to Directive 87/21, point (8)(a)(iii) is also aimed at ensuring that innovative firms are not placed at a disadvantage and at avoiding unnecessary medical testing on humans and animals. h

15. Article 5 of Directive 65/65 provides that an application for a marketing authorisation must be refused— i

- a* 'if, after verification of the particulars and documents listed in Article 4, it proves that the medicinal product is harmful in the normal conditions of use, or that its therapeutic efficacy is lacking or is insufficiently substantiated by the applicant, or that its qualitative or quantitative composition is not as declared.'
- b* Authorisation must likewise be refused if 'the particulars and documents submitted in support of the application do not comply with Article 4'.
16. Annex II to Commission Regulation (EC) 541/95 (concerning the examination of variations to the terms of a marketing authorisation granted by a competent authority of a member state)<sup>10</sup> provides that certain changes to a marketing authorisation, a list of which is set out in that annex, are to be considered fundamentally to alter the terms of that authorisation and therefore to require an application to vary the terms of the marketing authorisation. The types of change identified in the annex in respect of medicinal products for human use are changes to the active substance(s) of a product, changes to the therapeutic indications, and changes to dose, pharmaceutical form and route of administration.
- d* 17. In the United Kingdom, the licensing authority established by the Medicines Act 1968 is designated as the competent authority for the purposes of Directive 65/65. It operates administratively through an executive agency of the Department of Health, the Medicines Control Agency (the MCA), and it is the MCA which processes applications for marketing authorisations on behalf of the licensing authority. Point (8) is implemented in the United Kingdom by the Medicines for Human Use (Marketing Authorisations etc) Regulations 1994, SI 1994/3144. By reg 4(6), the United Kingdom has exercised its option, pursuant to point (8)(a)(iii), to extend the period specified in that provision from six to ten years.
- e* 18. The Court of Justice was called upon to consider the interpretation of point (8)(a)(iii) in Ex p Generics<sup>11</sup>, which arose out of a challenge brought by several pharmaceutical companies against the decisional practice of the MCA when considering applications for authorisation to market generic copies of existing medicinal products pursuant to that provision. The MCA had been granting authorisations not only for such indications, dosage schedules, doses or dosage forms as had been authorised in respect of the reference product for at least ten years, but also for additions or changes authorised more recently. The MCA would only decline to authorise a generic product for such additions or changes if they were deemed to constitute major therapeutic innovations, such as would necessitate a new application for marketing authorisation under annex II to Regulation 541/95.
- g* 19. The High Court referred various questions as to when two products would be considered essentially similar under point (8)(a) and as to how extensive an authorisation a competent authority was entitled to grant following an application made under point (8)(a)(iii).
- h* 20. As regards the meaning of essential similarity, the Court of Justice held (para 36) that one medicinal product is essentially similar to another—
- i* 'where it satisfies the criteria of having the same qualitative and quantitative composition in terms of active principles, of having the same pharmaceutical form and of being bioequivalent, unless it is apparent in the light of scientific knowledge that it differs significantly from the original product as regards safety or efficacy.’ a

21. As the court explained, two products are regarded as being bioequivalent if they are pharmaceutical equivalents or alternatives and if their bioavailabilities (ie the rate and extent of their absorption into the body and transfer to the site of action) after administration in the same molar dose are similar to such a degree that their effects, with respect to both efficacy and safety, will be essentially the same<sup>12</sup>. b

22. As regards the extent of any authorisation granted under the abridged procedure provided for in point (8)(a)(iii), the court held that a medicinal product which is essentially similar to a product which has been authorised for not less than six or ten years in the Community and is marketed in the member state for which the application is made may be authorised under that provision for all therapeutic indications, dosage forms, doses and dosage schedules already authorised for the reference product, including those authorised for less than six or ten years. c

FACTS d

23. In the present case, Novartis Pharmaceuticals Ltd (Novartis) challenges the validity of marketing authorisations granted by the MCA to SangStat UK Ltd, another pharmaceuticals company, and Imtix-SangStat UK Ltd, its distributor in the United Kingdom, in respect of two medicinal products, SangCya Oral Solution and Acceptine Oral Solution (for present purposes identical, and henceforward referred to collectively as SangCya). e

24. SangCya competes on the market with two of Novartis’ products, Sandimmun and Neoral. All three products are immuno-suppressants, and contain the same active ingredient, cyclosporine, used to prevent rejection of organs or tissue in patients who have undergone transplant surgery, and in the treatment of various auto-immune diseases. f

25. Each of the three products is administered orally, in the form of a solution. There are, however, differences between Novartis’ first product, Sandimmun, its second product, Neoral, and SangStat’s products, SangCya. When diluted for administration to the patient, they react differently. Whereas Sandimmun forms a macroemulsion in an aqueous environment, Neoral forms a microemulsion, and SangCya undergoes a nanodispersion process. As a consequence, the three products are not bioequivalent: they vary in their bioavailability, that is, the rate and extent of their absorption into the body and transfer to the site of action. This is significant because cyclosporine has a narrow therapeutic index. If the patient receives too much or too little of it, it will not be effective, and may be detrimental to health. As a consequence, the actual level of cyclosporine in the blood of a patient has to be monitored and the dosage adjusted as necessary. g

26. Sandimmun was the first cyclosporine product to be authorised within the European Union. It was authorised in the United Kingdom in 1983 following submission by Sandoz Pharmaceuticals (UK) Ltd, now Novartis, of the complete dossier of information required under the full procedure. h

27. Neoral was first authorised for marketing within the European Union in Germany in 1994. A United Kingdom marketing authorisation was granted in 1995, following what was apparently a hybrid abridged procedure, made i

- a pursuant to point (8)(a)(i) in conjunction with the proviso, using Sandimmun as the reference product. The application therefore partly rested upon data filed in respect of the Sandimmun application, consent having been given (by Novartis as the developer of Sandimmun to itself as the developer of Neoral), and partly on bridging data prepared specifically in relation to Neoral. During the application process, and following meetings between Novartis and the MCA at which the MCA indicated that authorisation would not be granted without the submission of long-term clinical trial data, Novartis extended its clinical trials so as to be able to provide more substantial bridging data. Neoral was approved for all of the same indications as Sandimmun, and in 1997 received approval for a further set of indications. Sandimmun remains on the market in the United Kingdom but represents only a small percentage of the total cyclosporine market as compared with Neoral.

- c 28. The authorisations in respect of SangCya, which are at issue in the present proceedings, were also granted under the hybrid abridged procedure, pursuant to point (8)(a)(iii) in conjunction with the proviso. The reference product identified by SangStat in its application was Sandimmun, which had been authorised more than ten years previously.

- d 29. The MCA granted marketing authorisations to SangCya in January 1999. It based its decisions on the essential similarity of SangCya to Sandimmun. However, it relied not only upon the data submitted by Novartis in respect of Sandimmun, but also upon the data which Novartis had supplied five years previously in respect of Neoral. It did not require SangStat to submit further and more extensive bridging data regarding SangCya equivalent to the data which Novartis had been required to submit regarding Neoral.

NATIONAL PROCEEDINGS AND QUESTIONS REFERRED

30. Novartis has brought proceedings for judicial review in the United Kingdom courts, seeking an annulment of the MCA's decisions to authorise SangCya on the basis that they are in breach of Community law on one or more of the following three grounds. First, it argues that the MCA was not entitled under point (8)(a)(iii) to have regard to data submitted in respect of Neoral prior to the tenth anniversary of Neoral's first authorisation within the EU (the cross-reference issue). Secondly, it argues that the MCA was precluded, as a matter of law, from finding that SangCya was essentially similar to Sandimmun, thereby excusing SangStat from the requirement to demonstrate that its product was safe notwithstanding its lack of bioequivalence with Sandimmun (the essential similarity issue). Thirdly, it argues that, even if otherwise lawful, the contested decisions should be annulled because they infringe the general principle of non-discrimination, that similar situations (in this case, the assessment of Neoral and SangCya) should not be treated differently in terms of the data required for authorisation unless such differentiation is objectively justified (the non-discrimination issue).

- h 31. At first instance, Novartis' application for judicial review was dismissed. On appeal, however, the Court of Appeal has decided to stay the national proceedings and refer a number of questions to the Court of Justice. The first two questions, which relate to the cross-reference issue, are as follows:

i (1) In considering a marketing authorisation for a new product (C) under [point (8)(a)(iii)], referencing a product (A) authorised more than 6/10 years ago, is a national competent authority ever entitled to cross-refer, without consent, to data submitted in support of a product (B) which was authorised within the last 6/10 years?

(2) If so, may such cross reference be made in circumstances where: a
(a) product B was authorised under the [point (8)(a)] hybrid abridged procedure, referencing product A; and (b) the data to which reference is made consists of clinical trials which the national competent authority indicated would be necessary if the marketing authorisation was to be granted and which were submitted in order to demonstrate that product B, though supra-bioavailable to product A when administered in the same dose, is safe? b

32. As regards the first of those two questions, the Court of Appeal notes in the order for reference that under art 5 of Directive 65/65, a competent authority, when deciding upon an application, must consider both whether the medicinal product is safe and efficacious, and whether the applicant has submitted all the particulars and documents required by art 4 of Directive 65/65. In the Court of Appeal's view, when considering the former issue, it should be open to the competent authority to consider all the data in its possession, regardless of their source. The Court of Appeal therefore requests that, if the Court of Justice concurs, the answer to the first question referred should indicate that any restriction on the data to which the authority may make reference relates only to the latter part of art 5. c

33. The third question relates to the proper interpretation of the proviso, and is as follows:

'(3)(a) Does the final subparagraph of [point (8)(a)] ("the proviso") apply only to applications made under [point (8)(a)(iii)] or to applications made under point [8(a)(i)] also? (b) Is essential similarity a prerequisite for the use of the proviso?' e

34. Questions (4) and (5) seek clarification of the meaning of essential similarity:

'(4) Can products ever be essentially similar for the purposes of [points (8)(a)(i) and (iii)] when they are not bioequivalent, and if so in what circumstances? f

(5) What is the meaning of the term pharmaceutical form, as used by the Court in its judgment in [Ex p Generics]? In particular, do two products have the same pharmaceutical form when they are administered to the patient in the form of a solution diluted to a macro-emulsion, micro-emulsion and nano-dispersion respectively?' g

35. The sixth and final question relates to the non-discrimination issue, and asks whether it is consistent with the general principle of non-discrimination for a national competent authority, faced with hybrid applications for marketing authorisations under point (8)(a) referencing product A for two other products, neither of which is bioequivalent to product A: h

'(i) to indicate that it is necessary for a marketing authorisation to be granted for product B to be supported by full clinical data of the type required by Part 4(F) of the Annex to Directive 75/318/EEC; but

(ii) having considered the data filed in support of product B, to grant a marketing authorisation for product C if that application is supported by trials not meeting the requirements of Part 4(F) of the Annex to Directive 75/318/EEC.' i

36. The court has received written observations from Novartis, SangStat, the United Kingdom, French, Danish and Portuguese governments and from

- a the Commission of the European Communities. Novartis, SangStat, the United Kingdom, Danish and Netherlands governments and the Commission made oral submissions at the hearing.

ASSESSMENT

b Questions (1) and (2) the cross-reference issue

37. The first two questions raise the issue of when, if at all, a competent authority, considering an application made under point (8)(a) in respect of a new product (product C), referencing a product (product A) which has been licensed for at least the six- or ten-year period specified in point (8)(a)(iii), may have regard without consent to data provided in respect of another product (product B) which has been licensed for less than six or ten years.

- c 38. The parties agree that a competent authority may have regard to all data in its possession, regardless of their source, when assessing the safety and efficacy of a medicinal product. The various approaches suggested by the submissions are therefore all consistent with Directive 65/65's overriding objective of promoting public health.

- d 39. Where the parties differ is as to whether, as the Court of Appeal suggests in the order for reference, a competent authority must also assess whether the applicant has submitted sufficient evidence to demonstrate that the product is safe and efficacious having regard to the requirements of art 4, and, if so, whether the competent authority may at that stage take account of data provided in respect of product B. Three approaches can be distinguished.

- e 40. On the first approach, advanced by the United Kingdom government, a competent authority need not consider the adequacy of the evidence submitted in support of an application when deciding whether to grant a marketing authorisation. That is because, the United Kingdom argues, the expert assessors employed by a competent authority cannot realistically be expected, having used all available data to verify that a product is safe and efficacious, then to put those data out of their minds in order to determine whether the applicant has itself sufficiently demonstrated safety and efficacy.

- f 41. In the United Kingdom's view, a competent authority may therefore rely on data submitted in respect of product B in order to authorise product C, a conclusion which accords with Directive 65/65's primary objective of safeguarding public health, as well as with the objective of minimising unnecessary testing on humans and animals. It thus proposes that the first and second questions should both receive affirmative answers.

- g 42. According to the second approach, favoured by Novartis, the competent authority must verify the adequacy of the evidence submitted by the applicant, and in so doing, may not cross-refer to data submitted in respect of product B, or in the alternative may do so only where products A and B are essentially similar.

- h 43. Novartis' primary submission is that such cross-reference is never permitted, on the basis that it would be contrary to the wording of point (8)(a)(iii), under which only data relating to a reference product authorised for at least six or ten years maybe used, and also that it would be inconsistent with the balance of objectives underlying Directive 65/65, and in particular, the aim of ensuring that innovative firms are not placed at a disadvantage. Novartis therefore submits that the first question should be answered in the negative, with the consequence that the second question does not arise.

- i 44. As an alternative submission, Novartis suggests that cross-reference is permitted only where products A and B meet in full the requirements of essential similarity to one another. Novartis derives support for its alternative submission from para 55 of the court's judgment in Ex p Generics, in which the court held that the authorisation of a generic product could extend to additions or changes to the authorisation of its reference product as regards dosage form, dose and dosage schedule granted within the six- or ten-year period 'assuming that the terms dosage form, dose and dosage schedule as used by the national court do not preclude essential similarity between the medicinal products'.

45. Novartis' alternative submission would support an affirmative answer to the first question, but a negative response to the second, given that a difference of bioavailability between products A and B would, in the light of Novartis' proposed solution to question (4), necessarily result in a finding that those two products lacked essential similarity.

46. The third approach, like the second, attributes to the competent authority an obligation to assess the adequacy of the particulars and documents submitted in support of the application. In contrast with the second approach, however, it allows the competent authority, when performing the latter assessment, to take account of data relating to product B even where that product does not meet in full the requirements of essential similarity in relation to product A, provided that any lack of similarity relates to pharmaceutical form, therapeutic indication or dose, in other words the types of difference permitted under the proviso where appropriate bridging data have been supplied. In such circumstances, it is argued, products A and B should still be regarded as essentially the same reference product for the purposes of an application under the abridged procedures.

47. The third approach is favoured by SangStat, the Danish, French, and Netherlands governments and the Commission. However, those parties differ somewhat in how they formulate the approach.

48. The Danish government suggests that the judgment in Ex p Generics should extend not only to all additions or changes to therapeutic indications, dosage forms, doses and dosage schedules authorised in respect of an essentially similar version of product A, but also to such additions and changes to product A which result in a variant product B lacking essential similarity with the original product.

49. The French government, SangStat and the Commission prefer instead a formulation whereby cross-reference is permitted if product B constitutes a 'line extension' of product A. They draw in that regard on the most recent version of the notice to applicants<sup>13</sup> (in vol 2A, ch 1, at para 4.2.2), which states that—

'the requirement for authorisation for at least six/ten years in the Community does not apply to line extensions used as reference products beyond the six/ten years data exclusivity period of the original medicinal product.'

50. A line extension is defined by the notice to applicants (in vol 2A, ch 1, at para 5.2) as any variation on an original product which would fall within the

b 51. The difference between the two formulations of the third approach is more apparent than real. The types of variation which are listed in annex II to Regulations 541/95 and 542/95, and which would not involve the insertion of a new active substance, are changes to the therapeutic indication, changes to dose, pharmaceutical form and route of administration. The 'line extension' formulation would therefore permit cross-reference in the same circumstances as those specified by the Danish government.

c 52. Similarly, both formulations in my view necessitate an acceptance that products A and B need not be essentially similar for cross-reference to be made to product B's data. This is because, with the exception of changes relating to therapeutic indication, the types of change by which product B may be differentiated from product A without preventing cross-reference to product B's data will exceed the limits of essential similarity as defined in Ex p Generics, given that variations to dosage will result in changes to the quantitative composition of a drug, that alterations to the form of dosage may affect pharmaceutical form, and that both types of change may have implications for bioequivalence. The Danish government acknowledged as much in its written observations, whilst the Commission and SangStat accepted the point in their oral submissions before the court.

53. It appears to me that the third approach is the correct one.

e 54. In my view, the Court of Appeal and the parties to the present case are right to assert that a competent authority may have regard to all available data, irrespective of their source, when verifying that a product is safe and efficacious. A competent authority must clearly be permitted to decline an application on the strength of data showing a product to be unsafe or lacking in efficacy even if those data were submitted in respect of another product and continue to enjoy protection pursuant to point (8)(a)(iii).

f 55. However, it is in my opinion untenable to assert, as the first approach does, that, as a consequence of the freedom to refer to all data in verifying safety and efficacy, a competent authority cannot also perform a separate and independent assessment of an application in order to verify the adequacy of the documents and particulars submitted in support of that application. Such an approach would remove any element of data protection from the authorisation procedure and is therefore contrary to point (8)(a)(iii).

g 56. It is also incompatible with the wording of art 5, which requires the competent authority to verify the adequacy of the particulars and documents submitted in support of the application in accordance with art 4. There is in my opinion no practical reason why a competent authority should not be able to perform that task after having first satisfied itself as to the safety and efficacy of a product.

h 57. I find the second approach equally unconvincing. On its primary submission, Novartis would deny the possibility of cross-referring to data submitted in respect of product B even when products A and B are essentially similar to one another. That submission appears to me flatly inconsistent with the court's conclusions in Ex p Generics, which were based on the notion that the essential similarity of the original reference product and its subsequent variants rendered them the same product for the purposes of point (8)(a)(iii). Following Ex p Generics, therefore, cross-reference to product B's data would undoubtedly be possible where product B was essentially similar to product A. To exclude the application of the Ex p Generics decision whenever a subsequently authorised variant of a reference product had been given a new designation would elevate form over substance, and would create an easy route for applicants to gain additional data protection in circumvention of Ex p Generics. a

15 Concerning the examination of variations to the terms of a marketing authorisation falling within the scope of Regulation 2309/93 (OJ 1995 L55 p 15).

58. Novartis' alternative submission, which would allow cross-reference to product B's data only if products A and B were essentially similar, is consistent with Ex p Generics, but none the less appears to me to be unsatisfactory for the following reasons. b

59. First, whether a modification of a reference product resulted in a new variant which remained within the bounds of essential similarity would not appear to correlate with the cost or difficulty involved in developing the modification and testing the variant. To accord access to data only where the limits of essential similarity had not been surpassed would therefore introduce an arbitrary distinction into the marketing authorisation regime. c

60. Moreover, to limit the application of the Generics decision to cases where essential similarity could be shown between the original and the variant product would in practice largely confine it to new therapeutic indications, given the impact of dosage change on quantitative composition, dosage form on pharmaceutical form, and both such changes on bioequivalence. d

61. The third approach therefore seems to me the most compatible with the scheme of Directive 65/65 as interpreted in Ex p Generics. It best succeeds in balancing the conflicting objectives of data protection and the avoidance of unnecessary testing on humans and animals by reserving additional data protection for the most significant modifications to an original product, namely those which involve the introduction of a new active substance. That approach is also consistent with, and supportive of, my opinion delivered in AstraZeneca A/S v Lægemiddelstyrelsen<sup>16</sup>. e

Question (3)

62. The third question referred consists of two parts. Question (3)(a) asks whether the proviso applies only to applications made under point (8)(a)(iii) or to applications under point 4(8)(a)(i) also. Question (3)(b) asks whether essential similarity is a prerequisite for the use of the proviso. f

63. It is not clear whether question (3)(a) raises an issue of any practical significance. An applicant who had consent to use data relating to an essentially similar product would be able to submit and to rely on the probative value of those data as part of a new application under the normal procedure even if there were no possibility of making a hybrid abridged application with consent under point (8)(a)(i). g

64. In any event, I agree with France, the United Kingdom, SangStat and Novartis that the proviso can be relied upon in combination with either point (8)(a)(i) or (iii). First and foremost, it is separated by a paragraph break from the text of point (8)(a)(iii). Nor, furthermore, has any policy argument been advanced as to why it should not apply in combination with both provisions. h a 65. As to question (3)(b), the Commission, the Danish and the United Kingdom governments, Novartis and SangStat (having modified its position in its oral submissions) submit that the requirement for essential similarity is relaxed in the case of the hybrid abridged procedure laid down in the proviso. Only the French government clearly maintains that essential similarity is a requirement under the proviso.

b 66. In my view, essential similarity in all respects is not required in order for an application to proceed under the proviso.

c 67. The purpose of the proviso is to allow an applicant whose product is essentially similar to an existing product except insofar as it differs in one or more of the respects stipulated by the proviso to submit additional or bridging data only with regard to that difference. The relaxation of the criterion of essential similarity in respect of the differences specified in the proviso is possible precisely because the proviso then requires additional bridging data to be submitted, thereby assuring that the safety and efficacy of the new product can none the less be assessed.

d 68. The interpretation of the proviso which I propose here accords with that adopted by the 1993 version of the notice to applicants<sup>17</sup>. Whilst subsequent versions of the notice to applicants have not explicitly endorsed such an interpretation, nor would they appear to have said anything to contradict it.

e 69. Any other reading of the proviso would render largely inapplicable two of the three categories of difference which it identifies given the definition of essential similarity laid down by the court's judgment in Ex p Generics. A change to the dose of a medicinal product will preclude essential similarity, given that it will constitute a change to the quantitative composition of the product. Similarly, an alteration to the route of administration will in many instances amount to a modification of pharmaceutical form.

f Questions (4) and (5) the essential similarity issue

g 70. The fourth and fifth questions concern the meaning of essential similarity in point (8). Question (4) asks whether bioequivalence is always required for a finding that two products are essentially similar. Question (5) asks what is meant by pharmaceutical form, and more particularly whether products have the same pharmaceutical form where they are administered to the patient in the form of a solution diluted to a macroemulsion, microemulsion and nano dispersion respectively.

h 71. The questions relating to the essential similarity issue remain relevant to the resolution of the present proceedings despite the proposed answers to questions (1) and (2), given that even assuming the possibility of cross-referring to the data submitted in respect of Neoral, the validity of SangCya's marketing authorisation would none the less depend on its being shown either that SangCya is essentially similar to Neoral or Sandimmun or that appropriate bridging data have been submitted in accordance with the proviso.

i 72. As is clear from the court's previous case law, the starting point when interpreting the meaning of essential similarity, as with the other requirements laid down by point (8)(a), must be to ensure that the requirements of safety and efficacy are at all times maintained in respect of applications pursuant to point

(8)(a)(i) and (iii)<sup>18</sup> through the specification of standards which are sufficiently precise and detailed to ensure a harmonised level of protection. a

73. To that end, the court in Ex p Generics adopted a definition of essential similarity drawn from the minutes of the meeting of the Council in December 1986 at which Directive 87/21 was adopted. As set out in the operative part of the judgment, its definition specifies bioequivalence together with pharmaceutical form and qualitative and quantitative composition as criteria which the competent authority of a member state may not disregard when determining whether two products are essentially similar. Novartis, the Danish and Portuguese governments, and the Commission accordingly submit that bioequivalence is a necessary requirement for essential similarity. b

74. It is true, as the United Kingdom and SangStat point out, that the formulation contained in the council's minutes and reproduced at para 25 of the judgment in Ex p Generics states that— c

‘the criteria determining the concept of essential similarity between medicinal products are that they have the same qualitative and quantitative composition in terms of active principles and the same pharmaceutical form, and, where necessary, bioequivalence of the two products has been established by appropriate bioavailability studies.’<sup>19</sup> d

In reliance on the italicised passage, the United Kingdom and SangStat assert that bioequivalence is not an invariable requirement for a finding of essential similarity. I do not accept their interpretation of that passage. In my view, it is intended only to indicate that bioavailability studies will not always be required in order to demonstrate bioequivalence in cases where bioequivalence is in any event clear. e

75. The United Kingdom government and SangStat submit also that bioequivalence will not always be a relevant criterion in order to determine whether two products are equally safe and efficacious, and that therefore it should not constitute an inflexible requirement of essential similarity. Such is the case, they suggest, with cyclosporine products, given that doctors must regularly measure the levels of cyclosporine in a patient's blood and adjust doses accordingly. I am unconvinced, however, that it would not be necessary, at least when fixing for a patient the initial dosage of a new product claiming essential similarity to an existing product, to be confident of the two products' bioequivalence. f

76. The United Kingdom further submits that in respect of certain types of product, the criterion of bioequivalence is inapplicable because they owe their therapeutic effect to topical application rather than transmission via systemic circulation. I find that submission equally unconvincing. It appears from the Community guidelines relating to the investigation of bioavailability and bioequivalence that whilst the approach commonly used to determine systemic bioavailability cannot be employed in such cases, local availability may still be assessed using measurements quantitatively reflecting the presence of the g a active substance at the site of action, arrived at by methods specially chosen for the particular combination of active substance and localisation in question<sup>20</sup>.

77. It is therefore my opinion that bioequivalence is a necessary requirement of essential similarity.

b 78. As regards the proper meaning of pharmaceutical form, Advocate General Ruiz-Jarabo Colomer in Ex p Generics defined it, in my view correctly, as the combination of the form in which a pharmaceutical product is presented by a manufacturer (the form of presentation) and the form in which it is administered (the form of administration)<sup>21</sup>. He drew the definition from the European Pharmacopoeia, inaugurated by the Council of Europe in 1964 for the purposes of laying down common standards for the composition and preparation of substances used in the manufacture of medicines. Applicants are required in a number of respects by the annex to Directive 75/318 to prepare the particulars and documents for submission pursuant to art 4 of Directive 65/65 in accordance with the standards laid down by the European Pharmacopoeia.

c 79. The definition supplied by the European Pharmacopoeia does not, however, indicate with what degree of specificity the form of presentation and the form of administration must be described. It therefore does not in itself resolve the disagreement between the parties to the present proceedings as to whether the products in question may all be given the label of oral solution or whether it is instead necessary to qualify them as solutions diluted for oral administration to a macroemulsion, a microemulsion and nano dispersion respectively.

d 80. As the notice to applicants indicates, further guidance may be obtained regarding the appropriate level of detail required by Community law from the European Pharmacopoeia list of standard terms<sup>22</sup>. It would appear from the file that the list does not distinguish between oral liquids depending upon whether on dilution they undergo a macroemulsion, microemulsion or nano dispersion process. On that basis, to insist upon such a level of detail would appear to exceed the requirements of Community law. Of the parties who address the issue, only Novartis asserts otherwise.

e 81. Such a conclusion appears consistent with the purpose of ensuring safety and efficacy which underlies the notion of essential similarity. Thus, the Commission submits that the pharmacokinetics (the time course of the absorption, distribution and excretion of the medicinal product) of oral liquid pharmaceutical forms is generally so similar that they deserve to be regarded as a single pharmaceutical form.

f 82. Novartis disagrees with the Commission, pointing out that differences between products resulting from their respective processes of dispersion or emulsion may affect their comparative bioavailability and may therefore impact upon their safety and efficacy. I am not, however, convinced of the relevance of Novartis' argument. Given that bioequivalence is in any event an independent requirement of essential similarity, it seems to me that the interpretation of pharmaceutical form need not be influenced by a concern to ensure bioequivalence.

20 See the 'Guideline on Investigation of Bioavailability and Bioequivalence' at para 1, in vol 3C of the Community Guidelines.

22 In vol 2A, ch 1, para 4.2.

83. In my opinion, therefore, the pharmaceutical form of a given product is the combination of the form of presentation and the form of administration of that product. Products administered orally in the form of a solution are to be regarded as having the same pharmaceutical form irrespective of whether they are diluted to a macroemulsion, microemulsion or nano dispersion.

Question (6) the non-discrimination issue

84. By its sixth question, the Court of Appeal seeks to ascertain whether there is any breach of the general principle of non-discrimination for a competent authority, considering two hybrid applications referencing product A for two products, B and C, neither of which is bioequivalent to product A, to require full clinical data relating to bioavailability in respect of product B as a condition of authorisation, but, having considered the data filed in support of product B, not to require the same data in respect of product C.

85. In my view, the sixth question does not raise any issue independent of those already discussed in relation to the preceding five questions. If the competent authority were otherwise entitled as a matter of Community law to rely on the data submitted in support of product B when considering the application in respect of product C, the applicant seeking authorisation of product C would not be similarly situated to the applicant seeking authorisation of product B, and the general principle of non-discrimination would be of no application. If, however, the competent authority were not otherwise entitled as a matter of Community law to rely on the data submitted in support of product B, the holder of the authorisation for product B could challenge any authorisation of product C on that basis, without resort to the principle of non-discrimination. Accordingly, in my opinion, an answer to the sixth question is not required in order to enable the referring court to proceed to a determination of the case.

CONCLUSION

86. I am therefore of the opinion that the questions referred for a preliminary ruling by the Court of Appeal (Civil Division) of England and Wales should be answered as follows:

(1) In considering whether to grant a marketing authorisation in respect of a new product under art 4 of Council Directive (EEC) 65/65 (on the approximation of provisions relating to medicinal products), a competent authority may refer to all available data when assessing the safety and efficacy of that product. If the application pertains to a new product C and is made under point (8)(a)(iii) of the third paragraph of art 4, making reference to a product A which is authorised more than six/ten years previously, a competent authority is entitled, when verifying that the documents and particulars submitted in support of the application comply with art 4, to cross-refer to data submitted in support of product B which was authorised within the previous six/ten years, without consent of the person responsible for the marketing of product B, provided that products A and B are essentially similar or differ only in respect of their pharmaceutical form, dose, or therapeutic use.

(2) The proviso in the final subparagraph of point (8)(a) of the third paragraph of art 4 of Directive 65/65 applies to applications made under point (8)(a)(i) and (iii) of that paragraph. In order for an application to be made under the proviso in respect of a new product C making reference to a a product A, product C must be essentially similar to product A except insofar as it differs in one or more of the respects specified by the proviso.

(3) For two products to be essentially similar within the meaning of point (8)(a) of the third paragraph of art 4 of Directive 65/65, they must be bioequivalent.

b (4) Pharmaceutical form is the combination of the form in which a pharmaceutical product is presented by the manufacturer and the form in which it is administered, including the physical form. Products administered orally to the patient in the form of a solution diluted to a macroemulsion, microemulsion or nano dispersion are all to be regarded as having the same pharmaceutical form.

c 29 April 2004. THE COURT OF JUSTICE (Sixth Chamber) delivered the following judgment.

1. By order of 22 February 2001, received at the Court of Justice of the European Communities on 5 March 2001, the Court of Appeal (Civil Division) of England and Wales referred to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) six questions on the interpretation of art 4(8)(a) of Council Directive (EEC) 65/65 (on the approximation of provisions laid down by law, regulation or administrative action relating to medicinal products) (OJ, English Sp Edn 1965–1966 p 20), as amended by Council Directive (EEC) 87/21 (OJ 1987 L15 p 36), Council Directive (EEC) 89/341 (OJ 1989 L142 p 11), and Council Directive (EEC) 93/39 (OJ 1993 L214 p 22) (hereinafter Directive 65/65, as amended).

e 2 Those questions were raised in proceedings between Novartis Pharmaceuticals UK Ltd (Novartis) and the Medicines Control Agency (MCA) concerning the issue by the MCA of two marketing authorisations in respect of a medicinal product.

3. Article 3 of Directive 65/65, as amended, requires a marketing authorisation to be obtained before a medicinal product may be placed on the market in a member state.

4. Article 4 of the same directive provides:

g 'In order to obtain an authorisation to place a medicinal product on the market as provided for in Article 3, the person responsible for placing that product on the market shall make application to the competent authority of the Member State concerned ...

h The application shall be accompanied by the following particulars and documents ...

8. Results of:

—physico-chemical, biological or microbiological tests,

—pharmacological and toxicological tests,

—clinical trials. However, and without prejudice to the law relating to the protection of industrial and commercial property:

i (a) The applicant shall not be required to provide the results of pharmacological and toxicological tests or the results of clinical trials if he can demonstrate:

(i) either that the medicinal product is essentially similar to a product authorised in the country concerned by the application and that the person responsible for the marketing of the original medicinal product has consented to the pharmacological, toxicological or clinical references contained in the file on the original medicinal product being used for the purpose of examining the application in question ... a

(iii) or that the medicinal product is essentially similar to a product which has been authorised within the Community, in accordance with Community provisions in force, for not less than six years and is marketed in the Member State for which the application is made; this period shall be extended to 10 years in the case of high-technology medicinal products within the meaning of Part A in the Annex to Directive 87/22/EEC or of a medicinal product within the meaning of Part B in the Annex to that directive for which the procedure laid down in Article 2 thereof has been followed; furthermore, a Member State may also extend this period to 10 years by a single decision covering all the products marketed on its territory where it considers this necessary in the interest of public health. Member States are at liberty not to apply the abovementioned six-year period beyond the date of expiry of a patent protecting the original product. b

However, where the medicinal product is intended for a different therapeutic use from that of the other medicinal products marketed or is to be administered by different routes or in different doses, the results of appropriate pharmacological and toxicological tests and/or of appropriate clinical trials must be provided.' d

5. The procedures established by art 4(8)(a)(i), (ii) and (iii) of Directive 65/65, as amended, are commonly known as 'abridged procedures'. The specific procedure for obtaining marketing authorisation laid down by the last subparagraph of art 4(8)(a) (the proviso) is known as the 'hybrid' abridged procedure. e

6. The United Kingdom has exercised the option conferred on member states by art 4(8)(a)(iii) of Directive 65/65, as amended, to extend the period referred to therein to ten years. f

7. Lastly, art 5 of Directive 65/65, as amended, provides:

'The authorisation provided for in Article 3 shall be refused if, after verification of the particulars and documents listed in Article 4, it proves that the medicinal product is harmful in the normal conditions of use, or that its therapeutic efficacy is lacking or is insufficiently substantiated by the applicant, or that its qualitative and quantitative composition is not as declared. g

Authorisation shall likewise be refused if the particulars and documents submitted in support of the application do not comply with Article 4.'

THE DISPUTE IN THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND THE QUESTIONS REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING h

8. Sandimmun, Neoral, SangCya and Acceptine are all immuno-suppressants containing the active ingredient cyclosporine. Sandimmun and Neoral are produced by Novartis. SangCya and Acceptine, which may be regarded as identical for the purposes of the present proceedings and are hereinafter referred to collectively as SangCya, are produced by SangStat UK Ltd and Imtix-SangStat UK Ltd (hereinafter, collectively, SangStat). i

9. Cyclosporine is primarily used to prevent rejection of organs or tissues in transplantation surgery. It is also used in the treatment of autoimmune diseases, including severe psoriasis, severe active rheumatoid arthritis, severe nephrotic syndrome and eczema.

a 10 Sandimmun, Neoral and SangCya are administered to patients orally. They are presented in their final form as a solution, and are taken by the patient in a drink. There are, however, differences between the products. They react differently when diluted for administration to the patient. Sandimmun forms a macroemulsion in an aqueous solution, whilst Neoral forms a microemulsion and SangCya undergoes a process of nano dispersion. That, in turn, has an effect on their bioavailability, that is, the rate and extent of their absorption into the body and of their transfer to the site of action.

b 11. Bioavailability is important because cyclosporine has a narrow therapeutic index (the dose range within which clinical efficacy is observed with an acceptable safety profile). If the blood levels of cyclosporine in a transplant patient are too low, the risk of acute and chronic organ rejection increases. Conversely, if the levels are too high there is the risk of deteriorating kidney function and the patient's immune system may be suppressed and the patient prone to the development of opportunistic infections and possibly lymphoma. For each of the products, after an initial dose at recommended levels has been given, the actual level of cyclosporine in the blood is monitored in individual patients and the maintenance dosage to be administered to the individual on a long-term basis may be adjusted accordingly to ensure that the level remains within the therapeutic index.

c 12. Sandimmun was the first cyclosporine product to be authorised within the Community. It was approved in 1983 following the submission by Sandoz Pharmaceuticals (UK) Ltd, now Novartis, of the full file of information required under Directive 65/65, as amended. Consequently, more than ten years have elapsed since the first marketing authorisation for Sandimmun in the Community, and the ten-year period of data protection afforded to Novartis under the directive has expired. Patent protection in respect of Sandimmun has also expired.

d 13. Novartis embarked on a research and development programme with a view to producing a more powerful cyclosporine-based product than Sandimmun which would overcome Sandimmun's problems of absorption and administration.

e 14. Novartis therefore developed the product called Neoral and obtained a patent for the cyclosporine formulation in that product. Neoral first received marketing authorisation within the European Union in Germany on 3 May 1994. Marketing authorisation in the United Kingdom was granted on 29 March 1995. The application made to the MCA as a 'hybrid' abridged application cross-referred, with the consent of the person responsible, to the data relating to Sandimmun, under art 4(8)(a)(i) of Directive 65/65, as amended. However, it also included, under the proviso, data from further studies and clinical trials, in recognition of the fact that Neoral differed in some respects from the reference product. The approved indications for Neoral include all those approved for Sandimmun. In addition, as from January 1997 Neoral has been authorised for the treatment of steroid-dependent or steroid-resistant nephrotic syndrome in adults and children. Sandimmun and Neoral are both available on the market in the United Kingdom, but the former product represents only a small percentage of the total cyclosporine market, as compared with Neoral.

f 15. Neoral is absorbed into the bloodstream of patients more quickly and consistently than Sandimmun. The influence of concomitant food intake and other variable factors is significantly reduced in Neoral as compared with Sandimmun. Tests have shown that Neoral has approximately 29% higher bioavailability than Sandimmun. a

16. On 27 January 1999, the MCA granted two marketing authorisations to SangStat in respect of SangCya by the hybrid abridged procedure under art 4(8)(a)(iii) of Directive 65/65, as amended. The reference product was Sandimmun, which, unlike Neoral, had been authorised in the Community for more than ten years. b

17. SangCya, which was not developed as a copy of Sandimmun or Neoral, is not identical to the latter. It is covered by patent applications and patents granted in the United States of America.

18. SangStat included with its application data to demonstrate the suprabioavailability of SangCya by comparison with Sandimmun and the essential similarity of those products. Studies showing bioequivalence between SangCya and Neoral sold in the United States were also included with the application. c

19. For the purposes of granting marketing authorisations for SangCya the MCA also relied on data submitted by Novartis in support of its Neoral application. d

20. The national proceedings concern the marketing authorisations granted to SangStat by the MCA in respect of SangCya on 27 January 1999. Novartis applied for judicial review of the decision of the MCA to grant those marketing authorisations, but its application was dismissed.

21. Novartis lodged an appeal before the Court of Appeal seeking to have the contested marketing authorisations set aside. In support of its appeal Novartis submitted that the MCA had: (a) cross-referred unlawfully to the Neoral file (the cross-reference issue); (b) erred in finding that SangCya was essentially similar to Sandimmun, thereby exempting SangStat from the requirement to demonstrate that its product was safe notwithstanding its lack of bioequivalence with Sandimmun (the essential similarity issue); (c) infringed the principle of non-discrimination between Novartis and SangStat in terms of the authorisation procedure (the non-discrimination issue). e

22. The MCA contended that: (a) it was entitled to cross-refer to all information in its possession in assessing whether a product for which marketing authorisation was sought was safe; (b) questions of essential similarity were inherently questions of fact, degree and expert opinion for the competent national authorities, which enjoy a margin of discretion in deciding issues such as whether two products have the same pharmaceutical form. In any event, bioequivalence is not always required in order to demonstrate essential similarity; (c) there was no infringement of the principle of non-discrimination since Novartis and SangStat were not in the same position and, in any event, there was an objective and reasonable basis for distinguishing them. f

23. In those circumstances the Court of Appeal (Civil Division) of England and Wales decided to stay the proceedings and to seek a preliminary ruling from the Court of Justice on the following questions: g

(1) In considering a marketing authorisation for a new product (C) under Article 4.8(a)(iii) of Directive 65/65, referencing a product (A) authorised more than 6/10 years ago, is a national competent authority ever entitled to cross-refer, without consent, to data submitted in support of a product (B) which was authorised within the last 6/10 years? h a (2) If so, may such cross-reference be made in circumstances where:

(a) product B was authorised under the Article 4.8(a) hybrid abridged procedure, referencing product A; and (b) the data to which reference is made consists of clinical trials which the national competent authority indicated would be necessary if the marketing authorisation was to be granted and which were submitted in order to demonstrate that product B, though suprabioavailable to product A when administered in the same dose, is safe?

b (3)(a) Does the final subparagraph of Article 4.8(a) of Directive 65/65 ("the proviso") apply only to applications made under Article 4.8(a)(iii) or to applications made under Article 4.8(a)(i) also? (b) Is essential similarity a prerequisite for the use of the proviso?

c (4) Can products ever be essentially similar for the purposes of Article 4.8(a)(i) and (iii) of Directive 65/65 when they are not bioequivalent, and if so in what circumstances?

d (5) What is the meaning of the term pharmaceutical form, as used by the Court in its judgment in [R v Licensing Authority established by the Medicines Act 1968, ex p Generics (UK) Ltd (ER Squibb & Sons Ltd, intervener) Case C-368/96 (1998) 48 BMLR 161, [1998] ECR I-7967]? In particular, do two products have the same pharmaceutical form when they are administered to the patient in the form of a solution diluted to a macroemulsion, microemulsion and nanodispersion respectively?

e (6) Is it consistent with the general principle of non-discrimination for a national competent authority, faced with hybrid applications for marketing authorisations under Article 4.8(a) of Directive 65/65 referencing product A for two products, neither of which is bioequivalent to product A: (i) to indicate that it is necessary for a marketing authorisation to be granted for product B to be supported by full clinical data of the type required by Part 4(F) of the Annex to Directive 75/318/EEC; but (ii) having considered the data filed in support of product B, to grant a marketing authorisation for product C if that application is supported by trials not meeting the requirements of Part 4(F) of the Annex to Directive 75/318/EEC?

PRELIMINARY REMARKS

g 24. Pursuant to art 4(8)(a)(iii) of Directive 65/65, as amended, the applicant is not required to provide the results of pharmacological and toxicological tests or of clinical trials if it is demonstrated that the medicinal product is essentially similar to a product which has been authorised within the Community for at least six or ten years and marketed in the member state in respect of which the application is made. According to the final subparagraph of that provision—h 'where the medicinal product is intended for a different therapeutic use from that of the other medicinal products marketed or is to be administered by different routes or in different doses, the results of appropriate pharmacological and toxicological tests and/or of appropriate clinical trials must be provided.'

i 25. The dispute in the main proceedings concerns, inter alia, the question whether the MCA was entitled by that provision to exempt SangStat from providing such results by basing its decision on the results already provided by Novartis in the course of the procedures resulting in the grant to that company of marketing authorisations for Sandimmun and Neoral.

26. The following factors should be taken into account in relation to that question: a

- Neoral and SangCya are not bioequivalent since their bioavailability differs;
- Neoral had been authorised for less than ten years;
- Neoral is a development of Sandimmun since Novartis obtained marketing authorisation for Neoral under the hybrid abridged procedure.

27. The questions referred for a preliminary ruling ask, more particularly, whether in such circumstances the dispensation from providing the pharmacological, toxicological and clinical documentation applies, as laid down by art 4(8)(a)(iii) of Directive 65/65, as amended, in conjunction with the proviso, or whether the documentation provided by Novartis in the course of the marketing authorisation procedure for Neoral must be accorded a further period of protection of six or ten years, so that it cannot be used by SangStat in assessing the application for marketing authorisation for SangCya. b

28. In R v Licensing Authority established by the Medicines Act 1968, ex p Generics (UK) Ltd (ER Squibb & Sons Ltd, intervener) Case C-368/96 (1998) 48 BMLR 161, [1998] ECR I-7967, the court interpreted art 4(8)(a)(iii) of Directive 65/65, as amended, ruling inter alia that: d

—the procedure established by that provision enables a second applicant for marketing authorisation for a given product to save the time and expense necessary in order to gather the pharmacological, toxicological and clinical data. In accordance with the fourth recital in the preamble to Directive 87/21, it also avoids, on public policy grounds, the repetition of tests on humans or animals where not absolutely necessary (see Ex p Generics (para 4)); e

—under the abridged procedure, the obligation to carry out pharmacological, toxicological and clinical tests is replaced by an obligation to show that the medicinal product is so similar to a product which has been authorised for not less than six or ten years in the Community and is marketed in the member state for which the application is made that it does not differ significantly from that product as regards safety and efficacy, and that it is therefore essentially similar to the product already authorised (see Ex p Generics (para 24)); f

—a medicinal product is essentially similar, within the meaning of art 4(8)(a)(iii) of Directive 65/65, as amended, to an original medicinal product where it satisfies the criteria of having the same qualitative and quantitative composition in terms of active principles, of having the same pharmaceutical form and of being bioequivalent, unless it is apparent in the light of scientific knowledge that it differs significantly from the original product as regards safety or efficacy (see Ex p Generics (para 36)); g —a medicinal product that is essentially similar to a product which has been authorised for not less than six or ten years and is marketed in the member state for which the application is made may be authorised, under the abridged procedure, for all therapeutic indications already authorised for that product, even if those indications have been authorised for less than six or ten years (see Ex p Generics (para 53)). The court stated in this connection that it is, where appropriate, for the Community legislature to adopt measures to reinforce the rules for the protection of innovating undertakings in the harmonised area with which the case is concerned (see Ex p Generics (para 52)). h

29. It should be added that the Court of Appeal rightly points out in the order for reference that the competent authority of a member state in making a decision on an application for marketing authorisation must examine the safety and efficacy of the medicinal product, and that it is therefore permissible

- a for that authority to take account of all data in its possession, from whatever source, to the extent that such data demonstrate that the product is harmful or that it lacks efficacy.

30. As stated in the first recital in the preamble to Directive 65/65, as amended, the primary purpose of any rules concerning the production and distribution of medicinal products must be to safeguard public health.

- b 31. Accordingly, and pursuant to the first subparagraph of art 5 of Directive 65/65, as amended, an application for marketing authorisation must be refused, inter alia, where, on the basis of data in the possession of the competent authority, it appears that a medicinal product is harmful or lacks efficacy. Clearly that authority is not precluded from basing its refusal on data submitted by other applicants, even if that data is protected within the meaning of art 4(8)(a)(iii) of Directive 65/65, as amended.

c 32. Finally, the court considers it appropriate to reply, first, to the fourth and fifth questions; second, to the third question; third, to the first and second questions and, lastly, to the sixth question.

- d THE FOURTH AND FIFTH QUESTIONS

33. Pursuant to art 4(8)(a)(iii) of Directive 65/65, as amended, as interpreted by the court, a medicinal product cannot be regarded as essentially similar to an original medicinal product if it does not satisfy the criteria of having the same qualitative and quantitative composition in terms of active principles, of having the same pharmaceutical form and of being bioequivalent (see Ex p Generics (paras 36, 37)).

- e 34. The same applies in respect of art 4(8)(a)(i) of Directive 65/65, as amended. The two abridged procedures in question are only distinguishable by the fact that the right to refer to the pharmacological, toxicological or clinical documentation contained in the file on the reference medicinal product is dependent, in the first case, on the consent of the person responsible for the marketing of that medicinal product and, in the second case, on the elapse of six or ten years from the date on which the medicinal product was authorised in the Community.

- f 35. Consequently, the reply to the fourth question must be that products cannot be regarded as essentially similar for the purposes of the application of art 4(8)(a)(i) or (iii) of Directive 65/65, as amended, where they are not bioequivalent.

- h 36. Neither Directive 65/65, as amended, nor, more generally, the Community legislation on medicinal products in force at the time of the facts in the main proceedings, defines the concept of pharmaceutical form.

- i 37. According to the list of reference terms of the European Pharmacopoeia, drawn up under the auspices of the Council of Europe, pharmaceutical form is defined as the combination of the form in which a pharmaceutical product is presented by the manufacturer and the form in which it is administered, including the physical form.

38. Pursuant to the annex to Commission Directive (EEC) 91/507 (modifying the annex to Council Directive (EEC) 75/318 on the approximation of the laws of member states relating to analytical, pharmacotoxicological and clinical standards and protocols in respect of the testing of medicinal products) (OJ 1991 L270 p 32), applicants for marketing authorisation are required in several respects to prepare the documentation and information to be submitted pursuant to art 4 of Directive 65/65, as amended, in accordance with the requirements set out in the European Pharmacopoeia. In particular, in Pt 2, section E, point 1 of that annex, it is provided, inter alia, that the provisions of the monographs of the European Pharmacopoeia on pharmaceutical forms apply to the products defined therein.

39. In those circumstances, the list of reference terms of the European Pharmacopoeia is capable of providing useful guidelines for the purpose of defining the concept of the pharmaceutical form of a medicinal product in order to address the question whether the medicinal products in question are essentially similar.

40. Consequently, for that purpose, account must be taken of the form in which the pharmaceutical product is presented by the manufacturer and the form in which it is administered, including the physical form.

41. Sandimmun, Neoral and SangCya are presented in the form of a solution to be mixed in a drink for administration to the patient. The fact that, when mixed, these three products form, respectively, a macroemulsion, a microemulsion and a nano dispersion, may provide information as to the form of administration but does not preclude their being treated as having the same pharmaceutical form for the purposes of addressing the question whether they are essentially similar within the meaning of art 4(8)(a)(i) or (iii) of Directive 65/65, as amended, provided that, as the United Kingdom government and the Commission of the European Communities essentially submit, the differences in the form of administration are not significant in scientific terms.

42. The reply to the fifth question must therefore be that, for the purposes of the procedure laid down by art 4(8)(a)(i) and (iii) of Directive 65/65, as amended, in determining the pharmaceutical form of a medicinal product, account must be taken of the form in which it is presented and the form in which it is administered, including the physical form. In that context, medicinal products such as those at issue in the main proceedings, which are presented in the form of a solution to be mixed in a drink for administration to the patient and which, after mixing, form, respectively, a macroemulsion, a microemulsion and a nano dispersion, are to be treated as having the same pharmaceutical form, provided that the differences in the form of administration are not significant in scientific terms.

THE THIRD QUESTION

The first part of the third question

43. SangStat and Novartis, and the French and United Kingdom governments, submit that the proviso applies not only to applications made under art 4(8)(a)(iii) but also to those made under art 4(8)(a)(i).

44. That argument must be upheld.

45. It does not appear that the difference between those two abridged procedures, as identified at para 34 of the present judgment, is such as to justify restricting the hybrid abridged procedure provided for under the proviso to the situation covered by art 4(8)(a)(iii) of Directive 65/65, as amended.

46. It should be noted in this connection that, according to the fourth recital in the preamble to Directive 87/21, there are reasons of public policy for not repeating tests on humans or animals without imperative need. If it is ethically and scientifically inappropriate to repeat all tests for an application which otherwise satisfies all the requirements under art 4(8)(a)(iii) of Directive 65/65, a as amended, it is also inappropriate to repeat those tests for an application which otherwise satisfies the requirements set out in art 4(8)(a)(i).

47. Consequently, the reply to the first part of the third question must be that the proviso, that is, the hybrid abridged procedure laid down by the final subparagraph of art 4(8)(a) of Directive 65/65, as amended, applies to applications for marketing authorisation based on art 4(8)(a)(i) or (iii).

The second part of the third question

48. SangStat, the Danish and United Kingdom governments and the Commission submit that recourse to the proviso is not restricted to cases in which the medicinal product in respect of which marketing authorisation is sought is essentially similar to an authorised product.

49. It should be noted in this regard that according to the express wording of art 4(8)(a)(iii) of Directive 65/65, as amended, relating to the abridged procedure, read in conjunction with the proviso, the essential similarity between the medicinal product in respect of which marketing authorisation is sought and the reference medicinal product is, as the Commission submits, the trigger for the application of the proviso.

50. Thus, the situation covered by the proviso, in which the new medicinal product differs from the reference medicinal product only in terms of its therapeutic indications, covers essentially similar medicinal products, that is, medicinal products having the same qualitative and quantitative composition in terms of active principles and the same pharmaceutical form and which are bioequivalent (see Ex p Generics (paras 36, 42)).

51. By contrast, as SangStat, the Danish and United Kingdom governments and the Commission stated, the same does not apply in respect of a medicinal product which is to be administered by routes or in doses different from those of the reference medicinal product, since the former generally does not have the same bioavailability as the latter and is not therefore bioequivalent to the reference medicinal product.

52. Accordingly, if recourse to the proviso were only possible where the medicinal product in question is essentially similar to the reference medicinal product and therefore, inter alia, bioequivalent to that product, the proviso would be largely ineffective in the case of medicinal products to be administered by routes or in doses different from those of other medicinal products on the market.

53. Moreover, in the notice to applicants for marketing authorisation for medicinal products for human use in the member states of the European Community, published by the Commission in 1993, it was expressly stated that the proviso could be applied where the new medicinal product did not satisfy the strict criteria for essential similarity when compared with the reference medicinal product.

54. Where the new medicinal product must be administered by routes or in doses different from those of the reference medicinal product, the purpose of the applicant's obligation under the proviso to provide the results of appropriate pharmacological and toxicological tests and clinical trials is to prove the safety and efficacy of that medicinal product (see, to that effect, Ex p Generics (para 23)).

55. In the light of the foregoing, the reply to the second part of the third question must be that an application for marketing authorisation for a medicinal product may be made under the proviso with reference to an authorised medicinal product provided that the medicinal product in respect of which marketing authorisation is sought is essentially similar to the authorised medicinal product, unless one or more of the differences set out in the proviso apply, as the case may be. a

THE FIRST AND SECOND QUESTIONS

56. By these two questions, which should be read together, the referring court asks essentially whether, in considering an application for marketing authorisation for a new product C under art 4(8)(a)(iii) of Directive 65/65, as amended, with reference to a product A authorised for more than six or ten years, the competent authority of a member state is entitled, with a view to granting marketing authorisation, to refer, without the consent of the person responsible for marketing, to data submitted in support of a product B which was authorised within the previous six or ten years under the hybrid abridged procedure of art 4(8)(a) of Directive 65/65, as amended, with reference to product A, where those data consist of clinical trials provided in order to demonstrate that product B, though suprabioavailable to product A when administered in the same dose, is safe. b

57. It should be noted that an applicant for marketing authorisation for a medicinal product essentially similar to a product authorised for at least six or ten years in the Community and marketed in the member state for which the application is made is not required, under art 4(8)(a)(iii) of Directive 65/65, as amended, to supply pharmacological, toxicological and clinical documentation for any of the therapeutic indications to which the documentation for the original medicinal product relates, including those authorised for less than six or ten years (see, to that effect, Ex p Generics (paras 43, 44)). d

58. Thus, the pharmacological, toxicological and clinical documentation covering the new therapeutic indications of a medicinal product already authorised cannot be accorded a further period of protection of six or ten years.

59. The same applies in respect of pharmacological, toxicological and clinical documentation which is to be administered by routes or in doses different from those of other medicinal products on the market. f

60. In the light of the proviso, such a medicinal product is a development of the original or reference medicinal product in the same way as a medicinal product intended for a different therapeutic use from that of the original or reference medicinal product. g

61. In that context, as stated at para 51 of the present judgment, it is not decisive that a medicinal product to be administered by routes or in doses different from those of the reference medicinal product does not, unlike a medicinal product intended for a therapeutic use different from that of the reference medicinal product, generally satisfy all the criteria for essential similarity. h

62. It should be noted in that connection that whether or not the product resulting from the development of the reference medicinal product satisfies all the criteria for essential similarity to the latter product does not necessarily bear any relationship to the cost or difficulty involved in that development.

63. Moreover, if the applicant for marketing authorisation for a medicinal product were only permitted to refer to the pharmacological, toxicological and clinical documentation relating to products resulting from the development of the reference medicinal product where all the criteria for essential similarity are met, it would largely be prevented from referring to that documentation where those products are to be administered by routes or in doses different from those i a of the reference medicinal product, whilst such reference is permitted where the product is intended for a therapeutic use different from that of the reference medicinal product.

64. Therefore, the applicant for marketing authorisation for a medicinal product may refer to that documentation where the products resulting from the development of the reference medicinal product and the reference medicinal product are essentially similar, apart from the route of administration or the dose, as the case may be.

65. If product B resulting from the development of the reference product A is essentially similar to that reference product, apart from its bioavailability, since that difference is nevertheless not attributable to a difference in the route of administration or the dose, the applicant for marketing authorisation for product C is entitled to refer to the clinical documentation in respect of product B.

66. If, as stated at para 64 of the present judgment, the applicant for marketing authorisation for product C may refer to the pharmacological, toxicological and clinical documentation in respect of product B, which is the product of the development of the reference product A and essentially similar thereto, apart from the route of administration or the dose, as the case may be, since the differences in those two factors generally imply that products A and B are not bioequivalent (see para 51 of the present judgment), it must, a fortiori, be able to do so where products A and B are distinguishable only by their different bioavailability, even though the route of administration and dose remain unchanged.

67. It follows that, in considering an application for marketing authorisation for a new product C under art 4(8)(a)(iii) of Directive 65/65, as amended, with reference to a product A authorised for more than six or ten years, the competent authority of a member state is entitled, with a view to granting marketing authorisation, to refer without the consent of the person responsible for marketing to data submitted in support of a product B which was authorised within the previous six or ten years under the hybrid abridged procedure laid down by art 4(8)(a) of Directive 65/65, as amended, with reference to product A, where those data consist of clinical trials provided in order to demonstrate that product B, though suprabioavailable to product A when administered in the same dose, is safe.

THE SIXTH QUESTION

68. By this question, the Court of Appeal asks whether, in considering two hybrid applications for marketing authorisation for products B and C brought under the proviso and referring to product A, the competent authority of a member state infringes the principle of non-discrimination if, as a precondition for the grant of marketing authorisation, it requires full clinical data on the bioavailability of product B, but, having examined the data filed in support of product B, does not require the same data for product C.

69. According to settled case law, the principle of non-discrimination requires that comparable situations not be treated differently and different situations not be treated in the same way unless such treatment is objectively justified (see, inter alia, Sermide SpA v Cassa Conguaglio Zuccheri Case 106/83 [1984] ECR 4209 (para 28) and R (on the application of Milk Marque Ltd) (Dairy Industry Federation, third party) v Competition Commission Case C-137/00 [2004] All ER (EC) 410, [2003] ECR I-7975 (para 126)).

70. The situation of the applicant for marketing authorisation for product B is, in any event, not comparable to that of the applicant for marketing authorisation for product C. When the latter applicant applies for marketing authorisation, product B is authorised and the authorities are assured of the safety and efficacy of that product. a

71. That finding does not prejudice the question whether the competent authority of a member state is entitled to base its decision on the data filed in support of product B when considering the application for marketing authorisation for product C. b

72. Consequently, the reply to the sixth question must be that, in considering two hybrid applications for marketing authorisation for products B and C brought under the proviso and referring to product A, the competent authority of a member state does not infringe the principle of non-discrimination where, as a precondition for the grant of marketing authorisation, it requires full clinical data on the bioavailability of product B, but, having examined the data filed in support of product B, does not require the same data for product C. c

COSTS d

73. The costs incurred by the United Kingdom, Danish, French, Netherlands and Portuguese governments and by the Commission, which have submitted observations to the court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. e

On those grounds, the Court of Justice (Sixth Chamber), in answer to the questions referred to it by the Court of Appeal (Civil Division) of England and Wales by order of 22 February 2001, hereby rules:

(1) Products cannot be regarded as essentially similar for the purposes of the application of art 4(8)(a)(i) or (iii) of Council Directive (EEC) 65/65 (on the approximation of provisions laid down by law, regulation or administrative action relating to medicinal products), as amended by Council Directives (EEC) 87/21, 89/341, and 93/39, where they are not bioequivalent. f

(2) For the purposes of the procedure laid down by art 4(8)(a)(i) and (iii) of Directive 65/65, as amended, in determining the pharmaceutical form of a medicinal product, account must be taken of the form in which it is presented and the form in which it is administered, including the physical form. In that context, medicinal products such as those at issue in the main proceedings, which are presented in the form of a solution to be mixed in a drink for administration to the patient and which, after mixing, form, respectively, a macroemulsion, a microemulsion and a nano dispersion, are to be treated as having the same pharmaceutical form, provided that the differences in the form of administration are not significant in scientific terms. g

(3) The proviso, that is, the hybrid abridged procedure laid down by the final subparagraph of art 4(8)(a) of Directive 65/65, as amended, applies to applications for marketing authorisation based on art 4(8)(a)(i) or (iii). An application for marketing authorisation for a medicinal product may be made under the proviso, that is, by the abridged hybrid procedure provided for in the final subparagraph of art 4(8)(a) of Directive 65/65, as amended, with reference to an authorised medicinal product provided that the medicinal product in respect of which marketing authorisation is sought is essentially similar to the authorised medicinal product, unless one or more of the differences set out in the proviso apply, as the case may be. h

- a* (4) In considering an application for marketing authorisation for a new product C under art 4(8)(a)(iii) of Directive 65/65, as amended, with reference to a product A authorised for more than six or ten years, the competent authority of a member state is entitled, with a view to granting marketing authorisation, to refer without the consent of the person responsible for marketing to data submitted in support of a product B which was authorised within the previous six or ten years under the hybrid abridged procedure laid down by art 4(8)(a) of Directive 65/65, as amended, with reference to product A, where those data consist of clinical trials provided in order to demonstrate that product B, though suprabioavailable to product A when administered in the same dose, is safe.

JUDGES WATHELET (RAPPORTEUR) (PRESIDENT), TIMMERMANS, LA PERGOLA, JANN AND VON BAHR

12 DECEMBER 2002, 20 MARCH, 2 OCTOBER 2003

European Community – Taxation – Internal taxation – Recovery of sums paid but not due – Procedural requirements for bringing proceedings for reimbursements – Court of Justice finding national levying of duty on alcoholic beverages contrary to Community law but limiting retroactivity of judgment – National provisions precluding reimbursement where economic burden of duty passed on by taxable person to final consumer – National provisions making claims for reimbursement based on domestic constitutional law more favourable – Whether national provisions compatibility with principle of sincere co-operation – EC Treaty, art 5 (now art 10 EC).

In a dispute in Austria concerning the compatibility with Community law of duty levied on certain beverages, the Court of Justice of the European Communities had ruled on a reference for preliminary ruling pursuant to art 177 of the EC Treaty (now art 234 EC) in Case C-437/97 (see [2001] All ER (EC) 735) that Community law precluded the maintenance of the national duty in so far as it had been applied to alcoholic beverages. However, recognising the existence of the overriding grounds of legal certainty which precluded any retroactive application of its finding, the temporal effects of the judgment were limited by precluding the possibility of repayment of duty that had been paid and not challenged before the date of the judgment<sup>a</sup>. Shortly before delivery of that judgment, and after delivery of the Advocate General's opinion, the national tax code had been amended so that duty levied though not due was not to be repaid or set off where its economic burden had been passed on to third parties. By way of derogation, that amendment did not apply to a taxable person whose case had given rise to a declaration by a national court that the national tax code was unconstitutional, and any other taxable person whose case had been pending before the national court before the declaration of unconstitutionality. In relation to all other taxable persons who had paid duty levied though not due, the tax code was not to be annulled with retroactive effect and it was to remain applicable to the facts that had arisen before the declaration of unconstitutionality. In the main proceedings, although the taxable persons were not precluded from seeking repayment of duty by the temporal effects of the judgment of the Court of Justice, their claims in that regard were rejected on the basis of the amendment to the tax code, namely a that the relevant duty had been passed on to the consumer. On appeal, the taxable persons maintained their right to repayment of the duty, claiming, in particular, that the amendments to tax code infringed the duty of co-operation laid down by art 5<sup>b</sup> of the Treaty (now art 10 EC). The national court decided to stay the proceedings and refer to the Court of Justice for preliminary ruling a question in that regard<sup>c</sup>.

Held – (1) Community law, and more particularly art 5 of the Treaty, precluded the adoption by a member state of rules fixing more restrictive procedural rules on recovery of sums levied though not due, in order to forestall the effects of a judgment of the Court of Justice holding that Community law precluded the maintenance of that duty, but only in so far as the national legislation was specifically aimed at that duty, a point which fell to be determined by the national court. In the main proceedings, it was clear that the purpose of the amendment to the tax code was to preclude the effects of the judgment should the duty on alcoholic beverages be deemed to be incompatible with Community law and should that judgment not limit its temporal effects. However those circumstances did not suffice to determine whether the national legislation impugned sought specifically to reduce the possibilities of bringing proceedings for the duty which had been levied though not due (see judgment paras 86–92, 118, below).

(2) Community law precluded a refusal to repay a charge levied though not due as the result of incompatibility with Community law on the sole ground that the charge had been passed on to third parties, without requiring the establishment of the degree of unjust enrichment that repayment of the charge would entail for the taxable person. The only exception to the obligation of a member state to repay charges levied contrary to Community law was where the national authorities had established that the charge had been borne by someone other than the taxable person and that reimbursement would constitute unjust enrichment to the latter. Such an exception had to be interpreted restrictively, taking into account the fact that passing on a charge to a consumer did not necessarily neutralise the economic effects of the tax on the taxable person. The actual passing on of taxes, either in whole or in part, depended on various factors in each commercial transaction and, even where the charge had been wholly incorporated in the price of goods, a trader might none the less suffer as a result of a fall in the volume of his sales. Accordingly, the existence and the degree of unjust enrichment that repayment of a charge which had been levied though not due might only be established following an economic analysis in which all relevant circumstances were taken into account (see judgment paras 93–102, 118, below).

(3) The principle of equivalence precluded national rules that laid down more favourable procedural rules for claims for repayment of a charge that had been levied though not due than those applicable to similar actions based on certain provisions of domestic law. It was for the national court to determine whether the rules governing repayment of charges held to be incompatible with domestic constitutional law were more favourable than those applicable to actions relating to taxes held to be contrary to Community law (see judgment paras 103–108, 118, below).

b Article 5, so far as is material, is set out at judgment para 3, below

c The question referred to the Court of Justice, so far as is material, is set out at judgment para 34, below

(4) The principle of effectiveness precluded national legislation or a national administrative practice which made the exercise of the rights conferred by the Community legal order impossible in practice or excessively difficult by establishing a presumption of unjust enrichment on the sole ground that the duty was passed on to third parties. In the main proceedings, the conclusion by the national authorities that the economic burden of the duty had not been borne by the taxable persons simply because the price invoiced to consumers had included the duty, might constitute a such a presumption, and it was for the national court to make a determination in that regard. It was also for the national court to determine to what extent the co-operation required on the part of taxable persons in establishing that the economic burden of the duty on had not been passed on to a third party amounted in practice to a presumption that the had been passed on, which presumption was only rebutted where the evidence was adduced to the contrary (see judgment paras 103, 109–118, below).

- i* 20 March 2003. The Advocate General (FG Jacobs) delivered the following opinion<sup>1</sup>.

1. On 9 March 2000, in response to questions from the Austrian Verwaltungsgerichtshof (Administrative Court), the Court of Justice of the European Communities ruled in Evangelischer Krankenhausverein Wien v Abgabenberufungskommission Wien, Wein & Co Handelsges mbH v Oberösterreichische Landesregierung<sup>2</sup> that art 3(2) of Council Directive (EEC) 91/12<sup>3</sup> precluded the maintenance of certain local and regional beverage taxes in Austria, in so far as they applied to alcoholic beverages. However, it limited the effect of that ruling, as regards claims for reimbursement of tax paid or chargeable before the date of the judgment, to claimants who had already initiated legal proceedings or raised an equivalent administrative claim.

2. A week before the judgment, the Wiener Landtag (Vienna regional legislature) had amended the rules governing reimbursement of tax credits. Under that amendment, which applied also to situations which had arisen before its promulgation, tax wrongfully levied could no longer be recovered by the taxable person if the economic burden of the tax had been borne by a third party.

3. The Verwaltungsgerichtshof now wishes to know whether it is compatible with the EKW ruling, and with Austria's duty of co-operation under art 10 EC (formerly art 5 of the EC Treaty), to apply such an amendment to claims raised before the date of that judgment.

BACKGROUND AND PROCEEDINGS

4. Until 2000<sup>4</sup>, various taxes, all apparently comparable in their effects and domestic legal basis, were levied on retail sales of ice cream and beverages by regional and municipal authorities in Austria. They provided a significant proportion of those authorities resources. It appears that (at least in Vienna where the taxes with which the present case is concerned were levied) they were self-assessed: traders calculated the amount as a percentage of their taxable sales and declared it to the authorities.

5. In 1997, following objections by traders casting doubt on the compatibility of those taxes with Community law—specifically with the VAT rules, the excise duty directive and the rules on state aid—the Verwaltungsgerichtshof sought guidance from the court on that aspect in the EKW case, which concerned a hospital cafeteria in Vienna and a wine trader in a municipality in Upper Austria.

6. On 1 July 1999, Advocate General Saggio delivered his opinion in that case, concluding that the court should find the tax incompatible with the excise duty directive and the state aid rules.

7. He also examined the Austrian governments request for a limitation of the temporal effects of the judgment in the event of a finding of incompatibility, but reached the view that there were no exceptional circumstances justifying such a limitation.

8. At paras 66 to 68 of his opinion, he dealt with the argument that to allow claims for reimbursement of tax wrongfully levied in the past would unjustly enrich traders who had in fact passed the tax on to consumers. In that regard, he pointed out that (in accordance with the case law) in order to resist claims for reimbursement the authorities would have to prove that the burden of the a tax had indeed been transferred to consumers. However, not only would such proof be difficult to provide, but it might well be the case that traders had not in fact passed on the burden of the tax and had been obliged to assume it themselves<sup>5</sup>.

b 9. The Advocate General's opinion gave rise to considerable concern that very large sums would have to be reimbursed, seriously compromising local and regional finances. Before the court, the Austrian government had asserted that ATS 22,000m, equivalent to some 0.9% of gross national product, would be due for repayment for the years 1995 to 1998.

c 10. According to the order for reference in the present case, all the Austrian Länder amended their regional tax codes so that tax wrongfully levied need no longer be reimbursed or set off where the burden had been passed on to another person. In all cases those amendments were made after the delivery of the opinion in the EKW case and in all cases but one before the delivery of the judgment, but at a time when the date for the latter had been announced.

d 11. Under para 162 of the Wiener Abgabenordnung (Vienna tax code), tax credits must first be set off against tax debts, then any surplus must be reimbursed. Until 2 March 2000, para 185 read as follows:

'(1) The taxable person may apply for the repayment of credits (Paragraph 162(2)). Repayment may also take place of the authority's own motion.

e '(2) Liabilities to duty whose amount has been determined, and which the taxable person will have to pay not later than three months from the making of the application for repayment, may be set off against the amount of repayment.

12. On 2 March 2000, the following subparagraphs were added by art I of amending Law 9/2000:

f '(3) No entitlement to repayment exists where the economic burden of the duty was borne by someone other than the taxable person ... Where a duty which has thus been passed on has not yet been paid, the tax authority must prescribe this by a separate decision.

g '(4) Paragraph 3 is not applicable to taxable persons who are able to rely on the "Anlaßfallwirkung" as regards the tax provisions held by the Verfassungsgerichtshof [Constitutional Court] to be unlawful.

h 13. The concept of Anlaßfallwirkung relates to the fact that in Austria a law which is declared unconstitutional by the Verfassungsgerichtshof is not immediately or retroactively annulled but remains in force (for a maximum period laid down by that court) pending the enactment of new rules. Essentially, only those who brought proceedings to challenge it (the proceedings giving rise to the declaration of unconstitutionality—the Anlaßfall—or other proceedings having the same object and pending before the same court at the time of judgment) may benefit directly and immediately from the finding of unconstitutionality, unless the Verfassungsgerichtshof decides otherwise.

<sup>5</sup> The possible existence of such a situation, he pointed out, had been accepted by the court in Société Comateb v Directeur général des douanes et droits indirects Joined cases C-192-218/95 [1997] STC 1006, [1997] ECR I-165 (paras 31, 32).

14. Subsequently, on 20 February 2001, the phrase 'nor does the reduction of the determination of duty by self-assessment or an assessment decision result in a credit in this respect' was added to the end of the first sentence of sub-para (3). a

15. Article II of the amending Law stated:

'Article I is applicable also to tax liabilities which arose before promulgation of this Law.' b

16. The explanatory memorandum to the draft amending Law presented to the Vienna regional legislature for adoption referred to Advocate General Saggio's opinion in the EKW case and pointed out that, if the court were to follow his view, refunds amounting to some ATS 3,800m might be claimed in Vienna. Consideration of that possibility had drawn attention to the fact, of general relevance, that the tax code as then worded could allow the unjust enrichment of a taxpayer who had incorporated the amount of an indirect tax in the price of his supplies, by allowing him to recover that amount when the burden of it had in fact been borne by consumers. The proposed art I was intended to deal with that general problem, and not specifically with the possibility that very large sums of beverage tax might have to be reimbursed. c

17. The explanatory memorandum made no mention of the retroactive effect proposed in art II. d

18. The draft Law was given a first reading in the regional legislature on 16 December 1999, when it was strongly criticised by several opposition members who described it as an attempt to circumvent Community law and in itself undoubtedly contrary to that law. The retroactive effect was also criticised, as was the absence of any clear statement that the burden of proof must lie with the authorities since, inter alia, the burden of the tax could not be presumed to have been passed on to customers, and traders could not have been expected to provide themselves with evidence that in fact it had not. It was further asserted that the lawfulness of the tax had been questioned as from Austria's joining the European Union in 1995. e

19. One week after the final adoption of the amendment to the Vienna tax code, the Court of Justice gave judgment in the EKW case. As stated above, it found a tax such as that in issue to be incompatible with art 3(2) of the excise duty directive, but limited the retrospective effect of the ruling to claims—legal proceedings or 'equivalent administrative claims'—raised before the date of the judgment. That limitation was based, according to para 58 of the judgment, on the facts that (i) art 3(2) had not previously been interpreted by the court and (ii) the Commission of the European Communities' conduct might have led the Austrian government reasonably to believe that the tax was in conformity with Community law. f

20. It appears that a large number of claims had in fact been raised, in one form or another, before the date of the judgment in the EKW case (when the court had been informed of a total which might have to be reimbursed if all claims were to succeed, but not of the number of claims estimated to have been brought already). In its observations in the present case, the Austrian government states that 16,000 such claims, representing some ATS 3,000m, are pending for Vienna alone, and suggests that their number is due at least in part to the fact that the Verwaltungsgerichtshof has decided that the concept of 'equivalent administrative claims', used by the court in the EKW judgment, must be given a broad interpretation. g a 21. At least some of those claims have been refused by the tax authorities in Vienna, and at least four of those refusals have been challenged on appeal before the Verwaltungsgerichtshof. They concern two restaurants, a Gasthaus and a wine merchant. It may be assumed that those four cases, which have given rise to the present request for a preliminary ruling, are test cases the result of which will determine the fate of a very large number of other claims b not only in Vienna but throughout Austria<sup>6</sup>. It appears that the taxes in issue here were initially self-assessed and paid, and that the claimants then withdrew their original assessments and claimed reimbursement.

22. The Verwaltungsgerichtshof has decided to stay the proceedings in those appeals and seek a preliminary ruling on the following question:

c 'Do Article 10 EC (formerly Article 5 of the EC Treaty) and point 3 of the operative part of [the EKW judgment]... according to which
 d Article 3(2) of Directive 92/12/EEC may not be relied on in support of claims relating to a tax such as the duty on alcoholic beverages paid or chargeable prior to the date of that judgment, except by claimants who before that date initiated legal proceedings or raised an equivalent e administrative claim, preclude the application of the provision, created by the amendment to the Wiener Abgabenordnung (Vienna Tax Code, WAO) of 2 March 2000, LGBI. No 9/2000, and applicable also to tax liabilities which arose before promulgation of that amendment, in Article 185(3) of the WAO, under which there is no claim to repayment where the economic burden of the duty was borne by a person other than the taxable person?'<sup>7</sup>

23. Article 10 EC, to which the Verwaltungsgerichtshof refers, requires member states in particular to take all appropriate measures to ensure fulfilment of the obligations arising out of the EC Treaty, to facilitate the achievement of the Community's tasks, and to abstain from any measure
 f which could jeopardise the attainment of the objectives of the Treaty.

24. Written and oral observations have been submitted by two of the claimants in the main proceedings—Karl Schlosser and Beta Leasing Gesellschaft mbH, both of whom operate restaurants in Vienna—by the Abgabenberufungskommission der Stadt Wien (Vienna Tax Appeals Board), whose decisions are contested, by the Austrian government and by the g Commission. The Italian government has submitted written observations and a third claimant—Ernestine Rathgeber, who runs a Gasthaus—submitted oral argument at the hearing.

ASSESSMENT

25. As a preliminary point, I consider it appropriate to examine all the aspects
 h of the disputed amendment referred to in the national courts question, and not only the issue of retroactivity which is stressed both in the question itself and in the Verwaltungsgerichtshof's reasoning. The question whether the substantive rule is compatible with Community law logically precedes—and may affect the answer—to the question whether its retroactive effect is compatible.

i 26. Bearing that in mind, there is, as has been pointed out by the referring court and all those who have submitted observations, much in the courts consistent case law which is relevant to the various aspects of the present case.

6 The order for reference mentions at least 300 similar appeals which are pending.

7 The emphasis is that of the referring court.

27. On the one hand, it is established that individuals are entitled to reimbursement of national charges levied in breach of Community law, as a consequence and complement of the rights conferred on them by Community provisions as interpreted by the Court of Justice; member states are therefore required in principle, as a matter of Community law, to repay such charges<sup>8</sup>. a

28. However, in the absence of Community rules on such reimbursement, it is for the domestic legal system of each member state to lay down the detailed procedural rules applicable, provided that they are not less favourable than those governing similar domestic situations (the principle of equivalence) and do not render the exercise of the rights conferred by Community law in practice impossible or excessively difficult (the principle of effectiveness)<sup>9</sup>. b

The principle of equivalence

29. National rules on actions for the recovery of charges which are found to be incompatible with Community law may not be less favourable than those governing similar domestic actions, nor may such a charge be specifically targeted by more restrictive rules adopted following such a finding of incompatibility<sup>10</sup>. c

30. First of all in that regard, nothing in the wording of the amendment explicitly distinguishes between claims based on national law and those based on Community law. Both the Abgabenberufungskommission and the Austrian government have asserted that claims for reimbursement of a range of other taxes which they cite could be affected by the disputed amendment if those taxes were found to be contrary to national law. d

31. Nor do I consider the circumstances of the adoption of the amendment to be of decisive importance in themselves. Whilst it is clear that the imminent likelihood of a judgment of the Court of Justice finding the beverage tax to be incompatible with Community law was an important factor in the genesis and timing of the amendment, that does not mean that it applies or was intended to apply solely to claims for reimbursement of that tax or in general of taxes levied contrary to Community law. e

32. The national court must none the less satisfy itself that the rule in issue does not in fact apply solely to a particular kind of charge declared incompatible with Community law but to 'a whole range of internal charges and taxes'<sup>11</sup>. f

33. In that regard, it is important to verify that factual or procedural circumstances do not transform a prima facie neutral rule, applicable without

8 For recent examples referring to earlier case law, see the judgments in Metallgesellschaft Ltd v IRC, Hoechst AG v IRC joined cases C-397/98 and C-410/98 [2001] All ER (EC) 496, [2001] ECR I-1727 (para 84) and Marks & Spencer plc v Customs and Excise Comrs Case C-62/00 [2002] STC 1036, [2002] ECR I-6325 (para 30). g

9 See, for example, the Metallgesellschaft case (para 85 and the case law cited there), cited in footnote 8, above, and, most recently, Grundig Italiana SpA v Ministero delle Finanze Case C-255/00 [2003] All ER (EC) 176, [2002] ECR I-8003 (para 33). h

10 See for example, with regard to specific targeting, Deville v Administration des Impôts Case 240/87 [1988] ECR 3513 and, more recently, the judgments in Dilexport Srl v Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato Case C-343/96 [2000] All ER (EC) 600, [1999] ECR I-579 (paras 38, 39) and also the Marks & Spencer case (para 36), cited in footnote 8, above. i a distinction, into one which in fact affects one type of claim much more significantly than another. Each rule must be examined in its procedural context<sup>12</sup>.

34. In the present case, Beta Leasing points out that the amendment in issue excludes from its scope claimants 'who are entitled to benefit from Anlaßfallwirkung in respect of a tax provision which has been held by the Verfassungsgerichtshof to be unlawful', but that there is no equivalent exclusion as regards findings of illegality by other national courts following a ruling of the Court of Justice. Thus, it contends, if the Verfassungsgerichtshof had held the beverage tax to be unlawful and had limited its judgment in the same way, the amendment could not have had any effect.

c 35. The Commission explains that, since the effects of a finding that a tax is contrary to national constitutional law extend only to a limited number of parties<sup>13</sup>, problems of massive repayment such as those referred to in the present case cannot arise. There had thus previously been no serious need for any rule precluding unjust enrichment in the manner specified in the disputed amendment.

d 36. In that light, the Commission originally considered that the rules governing reimbursement of taxes found incompatible with national law were not more favourable than in the case of taxes incompatible with Community law. At the hearing however it changed its view and argued that there was a difference in treatment favouring those who claimed reimbursement of a tax found to be unlawful by the Verfassungsgerichtshof; in such cases alone, where e the claimant could benefit from Anlaßfallwirkung, the possibility of unjust enrichment was no longer examined.

37. This aspect has not been discussed before the court in great detail, and it would not be appropriate to express a definitive view which should be based on a full appreciation of national circumstances. However, the contested amendment appears to mean that the rule precluding reimbursement where f the burden of the tax has been passed on applies to all categories of claimant but one: those who have brought proceedings before the Verfassungsgerichtshof challenging a tax declared unconstitutional by that court.

38. If it is the case that entitlement to benefit from Anlaßfallwirkung is g confined to those bringing challenges under national constitutional law, then the rules governing reimbursement of taxes found incompatible with national law might be more favourable, in that regard, than in the case of taxes found incompatible with Community law.

39. For the amendment to comply with the principle of equivalence, it would be necessary either for the benefit of the exception to be extended to all those h who have challenged a tax found to be incompatible with Community law or for the exception to be abolished entirely.

The principle of effectiveness

i 40. The principle of effectiveness—that is to say of the effective enforcement of Community law in national courts and the effective protection by those courts of rights conferred by Community law—has been asserted by the court in many areas, and may be seen as an expression of the generally recognised right to an effective judicial remedy.

41. As the court has consistently expressed the principle, it is for the courts or tribunals of the member states, pursuant to the principle of co-operation laid down by art 10 EC, to ensure the legal protection arising for individuals from the direct effect of Community law<sup>14</sup>. Although the detailed procedural rules to be applied are a matter for national law, they must not render the exercise of rights conferred by Community law—here, the right to reimbursement of charges levied contrary to Community law—in practice impossible or excessively difficult.

42. When considering whether that is so, it is necessary to examine each rule in its context its role in the national procedure viewed as a whole, having regard to all its features<sup>15</sup>.

43. The types of rule which the court has indicated as capable of making it in practice impossible or excessively difficult to recover charges levied contrary to Community law include in particular, in the context of unjust enrichment, certain presumptions or rules of evidence which place a burden of proof on the taxpayer<sup>16</sup> and certain procedural time limits, particularly where they are applied retroactively<sup>17</sup>. I shall deal with those aspects below.

44. First, however, it is necessary to consider the concept of unjust enrichment itself.

Unjust enrichment

45. Although member states must in principle reimburse national charges levied in breach of Community law, they are not required to do so where that would entail the unjust enrichment of the recipient<sup>18</sup>. Legal systems in general do not recognise entitlement to any enrichment which would be unfair or unjustified, and no such entitlement is conferred by Community law.

46. In particular, in a case such as the present a member state need not reimburse a trader where it is established that the burden of the charge paid by him has been passed on in its entirety to some other person and that the trader would be unjustly enriched by reimbursement; if in the same circumstances the burden has been passed on in part, only the amount not passed on must be reimbursed<sup>19</sup>. A trader who has paid a tax but has in fact passed on the whole burden of it to his customers, without himself suffering any concomitant loss, will clearly be unjustly enriched if he then obtains reimbursement of that tax 14 See, for example, see the judgments in the Peterbroeck case (para 12 and the case law cited there), cited in footnote 12, above; more recently, HJ Banks & Co Ltd v The Coal Authority Case C-390/98 [2001] ECR I-6117 (para 121).

15 See footnote 12, above.

16 See, for example, the judgments in Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato v SpA San Giorgio Case 199/82 [1983] ECR 3595 (para 14), the Dilexport case (para 54), cited in footnote 10, above, and Kapniki Mikhailidis AE v Idryma Kinonikon Asphalipseon (IKA) Joined cases C-441 and C-442/98 [2000] ECR I-7145 (para 36 et seq).

17 See, for recent examples, the judgments in the Marks & Spencer case (para 35 et seq), cited in footnote 8, above, and the Grundig Italiana case (para 34 et seq), cited in footnote 9, above.

18 See, for example, the judgments in Hans Just I/S v Danish Ministry for Fiscal Affairs Case 68/79 [1980] ECR 501 (paras 26, 27) and more recently Courage Ltd v Crehan Case C-453/99 [2001] All ER (EC) 886, [2001] ECR I-6297 (para 30; together with the case law cited there).

a because it is found to have been unlawful<sup>20</sup>. A national rule precluding unjust enrichment in those circumstances is thus compatible with Community law.

47. However, even where the burden of the charge has been passed on in whole or in part, repayment to the trader of the relevant amount does not necessarily entail his unjust enrichment<sup>21</sup>.

b 48. For example, the trader may choose to curtail any increase in his retail prices and maintain his volume of sales by limiting his profit margin to absorb all or part of the tax. Or else, having decided not to take that course but to increase his prices by the exact amount of the tax, he may find that his profits drop because he is making fewer sales. And he may even choose to absorb part of the tax himself yet still find a drop in sales. In all such cases—which are plausible in a situation of keen competition between traders—he will have suffered an economic loss as a result of the imposition of an unlawful tax, so that it cannot be said either that he has passed on (all) the burden of that tax to third parties or that he would be unjustly enriched if (an appropriate proportion of) the tax were reimbursed to him<sup>22</sup>.

c 49. Community law thus does not allow a member state to resist claims for reimbursement simply where the burden of a tax has been passed on; it must also be established that unjust enrichment would ensue<sup>23</sup>.

d 50. It is therefore necessary to look at any disputed rule carefully in order to be sure that it is truly limited to preventing unjust enrichment and does not also make it in practice impossible or excessively difficult to obtain reimbursement in other circumstances in which a right to reimbursement is required under Community law.

e 51. The disputed amendment to the Vienna tax code precludes repayment 'where the economic burden of the duty has been borne by someone other than the taxable person'. The substance of that rule thus would not appear to affect any traders other than those who would indeed be unjustly enriched by reimbursement, provided that the concept of 'bearing the economic burden' of a tax includes all suffering of economic loss as a result of being liable to pay it, whether the amount of the tax itself is billed to a third party or not, and provided that the rule is interpreted so that any sharing of the economic burden is taken into account and pro rata reimbursement may be obtained where appropriate. Subject to those provisos, the substantive rule thus appears to respect the principle of effectiveness.

f 52. In that connection, the Commission drew attention at the hearing to an aspect which has not been debated in full detail before the court. If, as may have been the case, the amount of the beverage tax also had the effect of increasing the amount of VAT due on sales and thus the final retail price, traders sales and thus profits may have been further affected. That is one of the

20 That would not be so if his customers were able to reclaim the tax from him in turn, or directly from the tax authorities, but such a procedure may not always be available. In the circumstances of the present case, the nature of retail sales of alcoholic beverages is likely to preclude any such possibility in practice. Cf the judgment in the Comateb case (para 24), cited in footnote 5, above.

i 21 See the Comateb case (para 29) and the Kapniki Mikhailidis case (para 34); see also, with regard to the present circumstances, para 68 of the opinion of Advocate General Saggio in the EKW case, cited in footnote 2, above.

22 Cf, inter alia, the judgments in the Just case (paras 26, 27), cited in footnote 18, above, the Comateb case (para 30), cited in footnote 5, above, and the Kapniki Mikhailidis case (para 35), cited in footnote 16, above.

factors which, if applicable, must be taken into account before it can be decided that unjust enrichment would ensue from reimbursement. a

Burden of proof

53. More serious difficulty may arise with regard to requirements of proof, an aspect which is not governed by the disputed amendment itself. b

54. It is clear from the case law<sup>24</sup> that a rule requiring the claimant to prove that he has not passed on the tax to a third party, or a presumption that the tax has been passed on, does not comply with Community law. Any rule imposing special limitations on the form of evidence which may be adduced also fails to comply.

55. According to the order for reference, the relevant tax code does not contain any special rules on the burden of proof, the evidence admissible or the assessment of that evidence. The general procedural law applicable proceeds from the courts duty to ascertain the material circumstances ex officio. The taxable person must contribute to establishing the facts, but where proof cannot reasonably be expected the law is satisfied with establishment of probability, and admits as evidence anything which is capable of establishing the material facts and is appropriate in the circumstances of the case. The Abgabenberufungskommission and the Austrian government assert that the burden of proof is on the tax authorities. c

56. The claimant Karl Schlosser contends however that under Austrian law, since a claim for reimbursement involves a request for treatment benefiting the claimant and verification that the statutory conditions for according that beneficial treatment are met, the claimant is under a duty to assist in establishing the relevant facts. In particular he must provide documentation to support the calculations involved. In the present cases, the Abgabenberufungskommission reached its decision by concluding, from the uncontested fact that the price charged to customers for alcoholic beverages was inclusive of beverage tax, that the economic burden of the tax had been borne by consumers. That amounts to a presumption whereby reimbursement is rendered impossible or at least excessively difficult. e

57. It is not for this court to say which of those differing views of the implementation in practice of rules of national law is correct. However, in order for the national court to be certain that the disputed amendment complies with Community law as regards requirements of proof, it must satisfy itself that the rules governing the ascertainment of the relevant facts are not biased against the claimant. g

58. On the one hand there must be no obligation on the claimant to prove that he has not passed the burden of the tax on to a third party and no presumption that he has done so simply because his retail price was necessarily deemed to be inclusive of tax, regardless of any other circumstances. h

59. On the other hand it is clear that, where a self-assessed tax is concerned, the tax authorities cannot be expected to prove that the burden has been passed on without the taxable persons co-operation and access to such relevant records as he may have kept<sup>25</sup>.

60. In that context, it is in my view desirable to clarify the case law by pointing out that, whilst Community law precludes any presumption of unjust i

a enrichment to be refuted by the claimant, it does not preclude the possibility of drawing reasonable inferences from existing evidence. Without such a possibility, the balance might be tilted so far in favour of the claimant as to render the justified aim of preventing unjust enrichment in practice impossible to achieve. It must be possible for the deciding body to take all available relevant evidence into consideration and reach a fair decision taking full account of whatever likelihood there may be that the claimant bore any part of the burden of the tax or suffered any economic loss as a result of its imposition.

b 61. To conclude on this aspect, the national court must examine whether, in the context of the national procedural system viewed as a whole<sup>26</sup>, the disputed amendment has the effect in practice of establishing a presumption that the economic burden of the beverage tax was passed on to customers unless the trader can prove otherwise. Such a situation would be contrary to Community law, and could be cured only by disapplying the disputed rule or by interpreting it in such a way that it did not have that effect.

62. With regard to Community measures, the court has repeatedly held that the principle of legal certainty precludes a measure from taking effect from a point in time before its publication, but that it may exceptionally be otherwise where the purpose to be achieved so demands and where the legitimate expectations of those concerned are duly respected<sup>27</sup>.

e 63. In the context of national rules concerning the recovery of charges unduly levied, the court has held that, where it has declared a charge to be contrary to Community law, the member state in question is not precluded from adopting new conditions applying to its reimbursement, such as a shorter time limit, provided that the principles of equivalence and effectiveness are observed<sup>28</sup>.

f 64. With regard to the latter principle, it must not adopt a procedural rule which specifically reduces the possibilities of bringing proceedings for recovery, in particular by retroactively reducing time limits for bringing proceedings without making appropriate transitional arrangements<sup>29</sup>.

g 65. The limitation of the temporal effect of the ruling in the EKW judgment does not mean that whenever a person had raised a claim before the date of the judgment that claim must be free from any other restriction laid down by national law but rather that, in relation to the period specified, no other claims may be allowed to proceed. Nor is there anything in the judgment which itself imposes or implies any general condition as to the date of enactment of any applicable national rules or which precludes any retroactive effect thereof.

h 66. A national rule which does no more than preclude unjust enrichment is compatible with Community law.

67. Where such a rule applies to claims in respect of situations which arose before its enactment, that effect does not seem to me incompatible with

27 See the judgments in Firma A Racke v Hauptzollamt Mainz Case 98/78 [1979] ECR 69 (para 20); more recently Falck SpA v European Commission Joined cases C-74/00 P and C-75/00 P [2002] ECR I-7869 (para 119).

29 See the Deville case, cited in footnote 10, above, and, more recently, the Marks & Spencer case (para 34 et seq), cited in footnote 8, above.

Community law. On the one hand, in so far as it seeks to preclude unjust enrichment, it in fact precludes only enrichment which would have occurred after its enactment, provided that there is no provision for recovery of any amount already reimbursed. On the other hand, there can in any event be no legitimate expectation of any such enrichment, since the very concept of legitimacy cannot embrace what is unjust. a

68. It is true that in other circumstances a retroactive effect may fall foul of the principle of effectiveness: in Marks & Spencer (para 35 et seq)<sup>30</sup> and Grundig Italiana (para 34 et seq)<sup>31</sup>, for example (to cite only the most recent cases), the court has indicated that a retroactive reduction of the period within which reimbursement may be claimed is incompatible with the principle of effectiveness if, in the absence of adequate transitional provisions, it deprives some individuals of their right to reimbursement or allows them too short a period in which to assert that right. b

69. Here, by contrast, since Community law does not require a right to reimbursement at all where unjust enrichment would ensue, the fact that, following a change to national law, a claim which might previously have succeeded can on that ground no longer succeed has no impact on the effectiveness of a right conferred by Community law. d

70. However, the question of retroactivity is relevant to the question of the burden of proof since, as Mr Schlosser points out, claimants who know that they will have to establish certain facts are more likely to ensure that they have specific evidence of those facts than are those who do not<sup>32</sup>.

71. To compile and retain such evidence may be a cumbersome task in situations such as the present, so that a trader might feel justified in not carrying it out if there were no current or foreseeable need to do so in order to be able to obtain reimbursement of a tax which he considered to be clearly incompatible with Community law and the imposition of which he knew caused him a loss. In particular, retail price calculations may not have taken the amount of tax specifically and separately into account if the trader did not expect to have to provide proof of his loss. e

72. A retroactive change in the rules would thus be incompatible with the principle of effectiveness if, by introducing an evidentiary requirement which was not anticipated at the time when the evidence could have been obtained, it made it in practice impossible or excessively difficult for such a trader to obtain reimbursement even when he had in fact borne (part of) the burden of the tax. g

CONCLUSION

73. In view of all the above considerations, I am of the opinion that the Court of Justice should give the following answer to the Verwaltungsgerichtshof: h

A provision of national law which precludes any reimbursement of a tax found incompatible with Community law to a taxable person where the economic burden of the tax has been borne by a third party is not contrary to Community law, even if it applies to situations which arose before its i a enactment and to parties whose right to rely on the incompatibility of the tax was not excluded by a temporal limitation of the effects of the judgment of the Court of Justice from which the incompatibility is deduced, provided that it complies with the principles of equivalence (it must not be less favourable than the rules governing reimbursement in comparable purely domestic situations) and effectiveness (it must not render in practice impossible or excessively difficult the exercise of rights conferred by Community law).

b In order to comply with the principle of effectiveness, the provision must not, in particular:

c —render reimbursement in practice impossible or excessively difficult in respect of any part of the economic burden which has been borne by the taxable person, either because he has not passed on the full amount of the tax or because he has otherwise suffered economic loss as a result of its imposition;

d —entail, in practice, any presumption to the effect that the economic burden has been borne by a third party or any requirement that the claimant establish the contrary;

—introduce any obligation to produce evidence which it is in practice impossible or excessively difficult to obtain at the time when the provision enters into force.

e 2 October 2003. The COURT OF JUSTICE (Fifth Chamber) delivered the following judgment.

f 1. By order of 23 March 2001, received at the Court of Justice of the European Communities on 2 April 2001, the Verwaltungsgerichtshof (Administrative Court) referred to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) a question on the interpretation of art 5 of the EC Treaty (now art 10 EC) and of para (3) of the operative part of the judgment of the court in Evangelischer Krankenhausverein Wien v Abgabenberufungskommission Wien, Wein & Co Handelsges mbH v Oberösterreichische Landesregierung Case C-437/97 [2001] All ER (EC) 735, [2000] ECR I-1157 (the EKW case).

g 2. That question has been raised in proceedings between Weber's Wine World Handels-GmbH, Ms Rathgeber, Mr Schlosser and Beta-Leasing GmbH (the claimants in the main proceedings) and the Abgabenberufungskommission Wien (Tax Appeals Commission for the City of Vienna (Austria)) (the tax authority) concerning the retroactive nature of art 185 of the Wiener Abgabenordnung (Vienna Tax Code; the WAO), which makes a claim for repayment of the duty on alcoholic beverages declared incompatible with h Community law in the EKW case subject to the condition that the duty has not been passed on to third parties.

LEGAL FRAMEWORK

i Community legislation

3. Article 5 of the Treaty provides:

'Member States shall take all appropriate measures, whether general or particular, to ensure fulfilment of the obligations arising out of this Treaty or resulting from action taken by the institutions of the Community. They shall facilitate the achievement of the Community's tasks.

They shall abstain from any measure which could jeopardise the attainment of the objectives of this Treaty.' a

4. Paragraph (3) of the operative part of the EKW judgment is worded as follows:

'The provisions of art 3(2) of [Council] Directive 92/12 [on the general arrangements for products subject to excise duty and on the holding, movement and monitoring of such products (OJ 1992 L76 p 1)] cannot be relied on in support of claims relating to a tax such as the duty on alcoholic beverages paid or chargeable prior to the date of the present judgment, except by claimants who have, before that date, initiated legal proceedings or raised an equivalent administrative claim.' b c

National legislation

5. Paragraph 162 of the WAO provides:

'(1) The taxable person's tax credits shall be applied in payment of the debts which are due. d

(2) In so far as the tax credits are not to be applied as provided for in subparagraph 1, they shall be repaid in accordance with the provisions of Paragraph 185.'

6. Under the provisions in force before 2 March 2000, a taxable person could, pursuant to para 185(1) of the WAO, claim repayment of tax credits not applied in payment of debts which were due. The repayment of such tax credits was not subject to any other precondition. e

7. Paragraph 1 of the Law published on 2 March 2000 (LGBI für Wien No 9/2000) (the amending act), amended the WAO by inserting, inter alia, sub-paras (3) and (4) into para 185 of that code. Furthermore, para 2 of the amending act provided that para 1 thereof was also applicable to tax liabilities which had arisen before promulgation of that act. f

8. A new amending act, dated 20 February 2001 (LGBI für Wien No 7/2001), also supplemented the first sub-subparagraph of para 185(3) of the WAO.

9. Paragraph 185 of the WAO, as amended by the two above-mentioned amending acts, provides: g

'(1) The taxable person may apply for the repayment of credits (Paragraph 162(2)). Repayment may also take place of the authority's own motion.

(2) Liabilities to duty whose amount has been determined, and which the taxable person will have to pay not later than three months from the making of the application for repayment, may be set off against the amount of repayment. h

(3) No entitlement to repayment exists where the economic burden of the duty was borne by someone other than the taxable person; nor does the reduction of the determination of duty by self-assessment or an assessment decision result in a credit in this respect. Where a duty which has thus been passed on has not yet been paid, the tax authority must prescribe this by a separate decision. i

(4) Paragraph 3 is not applicable to taxable persons who are able to rely on the "Anlaßfallwirkung" as regards the tax provisions held by the Verfassungsgerichtshof to be unlawful.'

- a* 10. In Austrian law, the 'Anlaßfallwirkung' is applicable, inter alia, following a judgment of the Verfassungsgerichtshof declaring a law unconstitutional. In such a situation, the law is not annulled with retroactive effect but, unless the Verfassungsgerichtshof decides otherwise, remains applicable to facts which arose before the declaration of unconstitutionality. However, in the case
- b* which gave rise to the examination of constitutionality and also in those pending before the Verfassungsgerichtshof at the time when it began to consider that case, the law in question must no longer be applied.

FACTUAL BACKGROUND

- c* The circumstances prevailing at the time of the adoption of the amending act
11. In 1997 the Verwaltungsgerichtshof, in a dispute between the tax authorities and taxable persons concerning the compatibility with Community law of the duty on beverages—and more particularly with the provisions on value added tax, excise duties and state aid—referred a number of questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling, which the court answered in the EKW judgment.
- d* 12. In his opinion of 1 July 1999 in the EKW case, Advocate General Saggio proposed that the court should rule that both Directive 92/12 and the Community rules on state aid precluded the maintenance of the duty on beverages.
- e* 13. Furthermore, in examining the Austrian government's request that the effects of the forthcoming judgment should be limited in time should the court decide that the duty on beverages was incompatible with Community law, the Advocate General submitted that that request should be refused, since he saw nothing to justify it.
- f* 14. That opinion gave rise to great anxiety among the Austrian local authorities, which feared that they would be compelled to repay very large sums.
15. According to the order for reference, all the Austrian Länder, following delivery of Advocate General Saggio's opinion, amended their tax legislation so that duties levied though not due would not be repaid or set off where they had been passed on to third parties. Those amendments were all introduced
- g* following delivery of the opinion, but, except in one case, before delivery of the EKW judgment, although at a time when the date of delivery had already been announced.
16. In the Land of Vienna, the amending law was enacted on 2 March 2000, one week before delivery of the EKW judgment.
- h* 17. At para (2) of the operative part of that judgment, the court ruled that art 3(3) of Directive 92/12 does not preclude the maintenance of a tax charged on non-alcoholic beverages and ice cream.
18. At the same paragraph of the operative part, however, the court ruled that art 3(2) of Directive 92/12 precludes the maintenance of that tax in so far as it concerns alcoholic beverages.
- i* 19. In answer to the Austrian Federal government, however, which had claimed that a judgment which required reimbursement of the duty on beverages would have serious financial consequences and that, in any event, the taxable persons had passed the duty on to consumers by incorporating the duty in the price of the beverages, the court, at para 59 of the EKW judgment, recognised the existence of—

'overriding grounds of legal certainty [which] preclude calling in question legal relations which have exhausted their effects in the past; [since] to do so would retroactively cast into confusion the system whereby Austrian municipalities are financed.'

20. Consequently, at para (3) of the operative part of the EKW judgment, the court limited the temporal effects of the judgment by precluding any possibility of repayment of the duties paid and not challenged before the date of the judgment.

The main proceedings

21. Weber's Wine World Handels-GmbH is a wine dealer, whereas each of the other claimants in the main proceedings operates a restaurant.

22. In those capacities, they were subject, pursuant to the WAO, to the duty on beverages. As this is a 'self-assessed' duty, it is the taxable person who calculates and, not later than the 15th of each month, pays the duty payable for the previous month, without a prior tax notice from the tax authorities. Subsequently, each taxable person sends, not later than 15 February of each year, a tax return in respect of the tax debt for the previous year.

23. The claimants in the main proceedings calculated and paid the duty on alcoholic and non-alcoholic beverages. Subsequently, however, they withdrew their tax declarations, claiming that the duty was unlawful under Community law, and claimed repayment thereof.

24. In 1998, the claimants in the main proceedings applied to the Abgabenbehörde erster Instanz (the authority competent at first instance for collection of duties) for repayment of the duty on beverages in respect of certain periods between 1995 and 1998, on the ground that the duty was contrary to Directive 92/12 and that it had been wrongfully levied.

25. The Abgabenbehörde erster Instanz held that the claimants in the main proceedings were liable to pay the duty on both alcoholic and non-alcoholic beverages and dismissed the claims for repayment, since in its view the sums already paid by the taxable persons corresponded to the amount payable.

26. The claimants in the main proceedings appealed against those decisions to the tax authority, which, by decisions of 6 September 2000, amended the amount of the duty on beverages set at first instance, on the ground that only sales of non-alcoholic beverages should be taxed, in accordance with the EKW judgment.

27. However, the tax authority rejected the claims for repayment of the duties already paid, since it took the view that the inquiry had revealed that they had been definitively passed on by the taxable persons to the final consumer.

28. The claimants in the main proceedings appealed to the Verwaltungsgerichtshof against the decisions of 6 December 2000, in so far as they dismissed the claims for repayment of the duty on alcoholic beverages for the period 1995 to 1998.

29. All the claimants in the main proceedings maintain that their right to repayment of the duty on alcoholic beverages levied in breach of Community law has been infringed. In particular, they claim that the new amending act, adopted on 20 February 2001, or after delivery of the EKW judgment, infringes the duty of loyal co-operation laid down in art 5 of the Treaty and that the retroactive nature of para 185(3) of the WAO constitutes a breach of the a principle of protection of legitimate expectations. They all further state that the duty was not passed on to consumers.

30. The tax authority has always taken the opposite point of view to that of the claimants in the main proceedings.

THE ORDER FOR REFERENCE AND THE QUESTION FOR THE COURT

b 31. The Verwaltungsgerichtshof considers that the EKW judgment places the Republic of Austria under an obligation, derived from the duty of loyal co-operation laid down in art 5 of the Treaty, to repay the unlawfully levied duty on alcoholic beverages to each taxable person who had initiated legal proceedings or raised an equivalent administrative claim before the date of delivery of that judgment.

c 32. It considers, however, that the fact that repayment of the duty is made subject to its not having been passed on to third parties is not contrary to Community law.

33. On the other hand, the national court is uncertain as to the compatibility with Community law of the retroactive nature conferred on para 185(3) of the d WAO, since, according to para (3) of the operative part of the EKW judgment, any taxable person who before 9 March 2000 had lodged an administrative complaint in respect of the duty on alcoholic beverages should have his claim granted, whereas, under the amending act, the objection might be raised that the economic burden of the duty was borne by the third parties.

e 34. In those circumstances, the Verwaltungsgerichtshof decided to stay proceedings and to refer the following question to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

‘Do Article 10 EC (formerly Article 5 of the EC Treaty) and point 3 of the operative part of the [EKW] judgment, according to which Article 3(2) of Directive 92/12/EEC may not be relied on in support of claims relating to a tax such as the duty on alcoholic beverages paid or chargeable prior to the date of that judgment, except by claimants who before that date initiated legal proceedings or raised an equivalent administrative claim, preclude the application of the provision, created by the amendment to the Wiener Abgabenordnung (Vienna Tax Code, WAO) of 2 March 2000, LGBl. No 9/2000, and applicable also to tax liabilities which arose before promulgation of that amendment, in Article 185(3) of the WAO, under which there is no claim to repayment where the economic burden of the duty was borne by a person other than the taxable person?’

THE QUESTION REFERRED TO THE COURT

h Observations submitted to the court

35. The claimants in the main proceedings begin by referring to the court’s case law on the obligation placed on member states to repay taxes levied in breach of the provisions of Community law.

36. Thus, where the court declares that Community law precludes the maintenance of a national tax, it follows, according to a consistent line of decisions, that the member state concerned is under an obligation, under art 5 of the Treaty, to repay to the individual the tax which has been levied though not due.

i 37. However, in the absence of Community rules on recovery of national taxes which have been levied though not due, it is for the internal legal order of the member states to designate the competent courts and to lay down the procedural rules of judicial proceedings designed to ensure the protection of the rights which individuals derive from Community law. a

38. For reasons of legal certainty, the member states are in principle permitted to limit, at national level, the repayment of taxes which have been levied though not due. Such restrictions should, however, satisfy the principle of equivalence, which requires that the national provisions apply in the same way to purely domestic cases and to those arising under Community law, and to the principle of effectiveness, which requires that the exercise of the rights conferred by the Community legal order is not rendered impossible in practice or excessively difficult. b

40. However, the claimants in the main proceedings claim that the court has held in a number of judgments that Community law precludes a national legislature, subsequent to a judgment of the court, from adopting procedural rules which specifically reduce the possibilities for the taxable person of bringing proceedings for recovery of taxes which were levied though not due. Such rules constitute a breach of the prohibition, deriving from art 5 of the Treaty, on frustrating Community law (see Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato v SpA San Giorgio Case 199/82 [1983] ECR 3595 (para 14), Deville v Administration des Impôts Case 240/87 [1988] ECR 3513 (para 13), Aprile Srl (in liq) v Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato (No 2) Case C-228/96 [2000] 1 WLR 126, [1998] ECR I-7141 (para 16) and Dilexport Srl v Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato Case C-343/96 [2000] All ER (EC) 600, [1999] ECR I-579 (para 39)). d e

41. According to the claimants in the main proceedings, para 185(3) of the WAO, read with para 2 of the amending act, does not fulfil the requirements laid down by the court in its decisions on the recovery of sums levied but not due. f

42. The condition that the tax has not been passed on laid down in art 185(3) of the WAO infringes both the principles of equivalence and effectiveness and the prohibition on frustrating Community law which derives from art 5 of the Treaty. g

43. First, it is contrary to the obligation of co-operation deriving from art 5 of the Treaty because, although it is formulated in general terms, in practice it is aimed at only a small number of indirect taxes which, on the basis of the internal division of powers, are levied by the Länder and the municipalities and, consequently, what is essentially concerned is the duty on alcoholic beverages held to be contrary to Community law. h

44. Next, the retroactive effect conferred on para 185(3) of the WAO by para 2 of the amending act, provided that the tax has not been passed on, is contrary to the principle of effectiveness because it is difficult to establish after the event that the duty on alcoholic beverages was not passed on to the final consumer. i

45. Last, as Beta-Leasing GmbH claimed at the hearing, Austrian law is also contrary to the principle of equivalence, since the WAO provides at para 185(4) that sub-para (3) of that paragraph is not to apply where it is possible to rely on the Anlaßfallwirkung and that a taxable person may obtain repayment of the amount paid by way of duty levied on the basis of tax provisions which have a been declared unconstitutional by the Verfassungsgerichtshof. On the other hand, there is no equivalent provision for repayment of a duty levied on the basis of national provisions which have been held to be contrary to Community law by decision of the Court of Justice, since such repayment is conditional upon the economic burden of the duty not having been passed on to third parties, in application of para 185(3) of the WAO. Consequently, there

b are two types of taxpayers in Austria: those entitled to repayment of a tax which has been levied though not due, provided that certain conditions are satisfied, including the condition that the tax has not been passed on to third parties, and those able to rely on a precedent in the form of a declaration by the Verfassungsgerichtshof that a tax provision is unconstitutional.

c 46. The claimants in the main proceedings further submit that, according to the court's case law, it is not permissible to place on the taxable person the burden of establishing that the tax was not passed on to the final consumer.

d 47. They maintain that the obligation for the competent authority to proceed of its own motion, which is provided for in Austrian law, does not release the claimant from the obligation to co-operate in establishing the facts (judgment of the Verwaltungsgerichtshof of 21 October 1987, 87/01/0137). Even though the Austrian administrative procedure does not expressly place taxable persons under a formal obligation to co-operate in the investigation, the fact remains that, within the framework of the unrestricted power to assess the evidence which is conferred on the tax authority, the latter is free—if the claimant does not co-operate, or does not sufficiently co-operate, in the investigation—to

f 48. The claimants in the main proceedings observe that in its decisions of 6 September 2000 the tax authority found it established that the duty on alcoholic beverages had been passed on to the final consumers, being of the view that according to the undisputed findings of fact made by the appellate body, the price of alcoholic beverages also includes the duty on beverages, so that the economic burden of the duty on beverages was borne by the final consumer.

g 49. The claimants in the main proceedings maintain that the mere fact that their prices included the duty on alcoholic beverages does not permit the conclusion that the duty was passed on to the final consumer. In reality, such a conclusion is a mere presumption, which in practice requires the taxable person himself to establish that the duty was not passed on.

h 50. As regards unjust enrichment, the claimants in the main proceedings observe that, according to the consistent case law of the court, the right to refuse to repay a duty levied in breach of Community law depends not only on proof that the entire burden of the duty was actually borne by a person other than the taxable person but also on the condition that repayment of the duty entails unjust enrichment of the taxable person.

51. In the present case, the claimants in the main proceedings contend that they themselves bore the duty on alcoholic beverages.

i 52. In that regard, although it is true in principle that the duty on alcoholic beverages must be borne by the final consumer because the law provides that it is to be passed on, in practice, however, for reasons relating to competition, it is only in rare cases that Austrian undertakings are able to pass the duty on to the consumer.

53. In most cases, the duty reduces the profit margin of the undertaking liable for the duty and is therefore de facto borne by that undertaking. Statistical studies show that in Europe the Republic of Austria is the state in which beverages bear the highest duty. a

54. The claimants in the main proceedings conclude that, in order to attain normal profitability on the market, the price of beverages in Austria should be increased at least by the amount corresponding to the proportion of the duty on alcoholic beverages. In fact, only undertakings with the greatest number of customers are able to charge such prices. On the other hand, the great majority of undertakings—including the claimants in the main proceedings—do not pass the duty on to the final customers. b

55. That fact is borne out by the annual studies commissioned by the Wirtschaftskammer Österreich (Economic Chamber of Austria), entitled Betriebskennzahlen des Österreichischen Gastgewerbes (data relating to the Austrian catering sector). In 1994, virtually all Austrian catering undertakings made a loss. Their situation has continued to deteriorate. Since then, those undertakings have been constantly overburdened with debt owing to competitive pressure and the need to respond to the demands of the market. c

56. The claimants in the main proceedings also state that in November 2000 the Österreichisches Institut für Wirtschaftsforschung (Austrian Institute for Economic Research), at the request of the Austrian Finance Ministry, carried out a macroeconomic study into the question of passing on the costs of the duty on beverages in the hotel, cafe and restaurant sector. That study did not make it possible to provide general answers to the question of the passing on of the duty on beverages to the final consumer in that sector. It contains no specific answer to the question of the passing on of that duty to the final consumer. The authors of the study observed, in particular, that the question whether, and to what extent, the duty was actually passed on depends on a whole series of factors, including elasticity between prices and assets and also the services concerned, changes in the level of prices and actual demand, market structure and the intensity of competition. d

57. Consequently, according to the claimants in the main proceedings, the question of unjust enrichment can only be answered on a case by case basis, following a specific investigation.

58. Beta-Leasing GmbH also emphasises that, in so far as the duty was actually passed on, it is the consumers that bore the burden of the duty on alcoholic beverages. However, neither the legal order of the Land of Vienna nor that of the Republic of Austria in general offers consumers the possibility of claiming, in the context of the taxation procedure, that a duty thus passed on is unlawful. g

59. Accordingly, if the taxable person were refused repayment of the duty on alcoholic beverages on the ground that he has passed it on to the final consumer, it would ultimately be the municipality concerned that would benefit from unjust enrichment. The municipalities' argument thus amounts to claiming unjust enrichment in favour of the creditors of the duty (the municipalities themselves), while maintaining that the person owing the duty must not benefit from such enrichment. Beta-Leasing GmbH asks what justification there is for the fact that unjust enrichment should be denied the person owing the duty, whereas it is acceptable in the case of the person to whom the duty is owed, a fortiori since it is the latter that adopted the unlawful provision. h

a 60. The tax authority does not agree with that interpretation. It maintains that the condition placed by para 185(3) of the WAO on repayment of a tax levied though not due seeks to prevent persons entitled to claim repayment under domestic law from being enriched owing to particular circumstances related to the fiscal techniques associated with indirect taxation in the city of Vienna. The taxes at issue in the present case are duties in which the person
b paying the tax and the taxable person are two separate persons. The taxable person is the trader who supplies taxable services, whereas the amount of such taxes is in general levied on the recipients of those services. The court approved that interpretation at paras 22 to 24 of its judgment in Société Comateb v Directeur général des douanes et droits indirects Joined cases C-192-218/95 [1997] STC 1006, [1997] ECR I-165.

c 61. It follows that repayment of the amount passed on is no longer required where the taxable person is not required to repay to the purchaser the sums corresponding to the amount of the tax which he has passed on to the latter.

d 62. On that point, the tax authority claims that under the Austrian legal order the purchaser cannot claim repayment of those sums directly from the national authorities. In the case of the duty on alcoholic beverages, repayment to consumers of the amounts they have paid is precluded in practice, owing to the time which has elapsed, the large number of transactions involved, evidential difficulties or other matters.

e 63. Consequently, the tax authority maintains that para 185(3) of the WAO is not inconsistent with para (3) of the operative part of the EKW judgment but, on the contrary, it is consistent with what was held by the court, since it provides that unjust enrichment of the trader in the form of repayment to him of the duty which he has paid is precluded when the legal relationship, which constitutes the taxable event, between the consumer who has borne the economic burden of the duty on beverages and the trader who has paid it has f already exhausted its effects and when the consumer can no longer take action against the trader with a view to obtaining repayment of the duty he has borne.

g 64. Nor, in the tax authority's submission, does a comparative examination of what may be the legally protected expectation of the taxable persons that the duty on alcoholic beverages would be repaid unconditionally and the legally protected expectation of the municipalities that the duty was compatible with Community law permit the conclusion that para 185(3) of the WAO infringes the obligation of loyal co-operation laid down in art 5 of the Treaty.

h 65. Last, the tax authority contends that neither Community law nor the principles of a state subject to the rule of law and the protection of legitimate expectations imply that a taxable person is to be enriched by repayment of a tax. Where the tax is passed on to third parties, reimbursement will necessarily i entail unjust enrichment of the trader.

66. The Austrian and Italian governments put forward an argument similar to the tax authority's and submit that para 185 of the WAO satisfied the conditions laid down by the court in respect of recovery of the sums levied but not due.

i 67. First, that provision is not concerned solely with rights to repayment based on Community law but governs both those rights and rights based on domestic law and thus has regard to the principle of equivalence.

68. The governments further claim that para 185(3) of the WAO does not make it impossible or excessively difficult in practice for the claimants to exercise the right to repayment based on Community law. Thus, para 185 of the WAO contains no specific provision relating to the burden of proof or to the permissible means of proof. The general rules of procedure are therefore applicable. They are based on the principle of investigation on the authority's own motion. a

69. The Austrian government maintains that, owing to that principle, the burden of proving that the duty has been passed on and that there has been unjust enrichment is borne by the competent fiscal services. The taxable persons are under a duty only to co-operate in establishing the facts. Thus, at the request of the fiscal services, they must provide clarification and additional information concerning their returns and prove that they are accurate, although the WAO is satisfied with the balance of probabilities when, in the light of the circumstances, such proof cannot reasonably be demanded. A reversal of the burden of proof to the detriment of the taxable person is therefore precluded. b

70. Furthermore, the WAO authorises all modes of proof. The claimants may therefore in principle put forward all the arguments, of law and of fact, from which it might be concluded that the duty has not been passed on or that it is probable that it was not passed on. Nor, in that regard, has any reversal of the burden of proof or any general presumption been applied. d

71. The Austrian government further submits that para 185(4) of the WAO, which precludes the application of sub-para (3) of that paragraph to claims for repayment of duties which the Verfassungsgerichtshof has held to be unconstitutional, does not infringe the principle of equivalence. First, judgments of the court do not have the same effects as judgments of the Verfassungsgericht declaring a law unconstitutional, since the former have a general effect which also applies ex tunc, whereas the latter have only ex nunc effect. e

72. Last, the cases in which a claimant may invoke the benefit of the 'Anlaßfallwirkung', and therefore obtain repayment of an unconstitutional tax even where it has been passed on to third parties, are very rare and purely marginal. That situation is therefore in no way comparable with the consequences associated with a judgment of the court in which it is held that Community law precludes the maintenance of a national tax. f

73. The Commission of the European Communities submits that while it is true that repayment of a tax levied in breach of Community law can be effected only within the framework of the substantive and procedural conditions fixed by the various national laws on the matter, the fact remains that these conditions cannot be less favourable than those governing similar domestic claims and that they cannot be arranged in such a way as to render the exercise of the rights conferred by the Community legal order impossible or excessively difficult (see BP Supergas Anonimos Etairia Geniki Emporiki-Viomichaniki kai Antiprossopeion v Greece Case C-62/93 [1995] All ER (EC) 684, [1995] ECR I-1883, Edilizia Industriale Siderurgica Srl (Edis) v Ministero delle Finanze Case C-231/96 [1998] ECR I-4951 (paras 19, 34) and the Dilexport case (para 25)). g

74. The Commission further submits that para 11 of the Deville case appears to tie the existence of a right to reimbursement of a tax which is inconsistent with Community law to the condition that the taxable person is unable to pass that tax on to others. i

75. Accordingly, in the Commission's submission, there is nothing in Community law to prevent the national courts from taking account, under their national law, of the fact that the charges levied though not due have been

- a incorporated in the prices of the undertaking responsible for paying the duty and passed on to the purchasers (see Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato v Essevi SpA Joined cases 142/80 and 143/80 [1981] ECR 1413 (para 35), Les Fils de Jules Bianco SA v Directeur Général des Douanes et Droits Indirects Joined cases 331/85, 376/85 and 378/85 [1988] ECR 1099, the Dilexport case (para 47) and Roquette Frères SA v Direction des Services Fiscaux du Pas-de-Calais Case C-88/99 [2000] ECR I-10465 (para 20)).

b 76. The Commission observes, however, that Community law precludes a member state from making repayment of customs duties and taxes contrary to Community law subject to a condition, such as the requirement that such duties or taxes have not been passed on to third parties, which the claimant must show he has satisfied (see the Dilexport case (para 54)).

- c 77. It points out, however, that the Verwaltungsgerichtshof does not expressly consider that point in the account of the substantive conditions of the reference, but merely states that, in view of the existing procedural guarantees, it cannot be said that para 185(3) of the WAO makes the exercise of the right to repayment a priori excessively difficult or even impossible. The Commission emphasises, however, that that national provision contains no special rule relating to the burden of proof and that the general rules of procedure applicable are based on the principle of investigation on the authority's own motion.

- d 78. In the absence of any express finding that national procedural law places the burden of proving that the tax has been passed on to the tax authority, the Commission concludes that there may be certain lacunae in that regard. Consequently, it proposes that the court should shed some light on the matter in its judgment, with reference to its relevant case law and, in particular, to para 54 of the Dilexport case.

- e 79. The Commission also shares the view of Advocate General Saggio in the EKW case that the tax authority may reject claims for repayment of taxes levied though not due only if it proves that the claimants have actually been enriched.

- f 80. It maintains that it is impossible to assert that the price of the product without the duty on alcoholic beverages would have been less than the price including the duty or, a fortiori, that the difference between the two prices would always correspond to the amount of the duty. Besides, the enrichment of the dealer might not always correspond precisely with the amount of the duty, since the increase in the price dictated by the need to offset the higher charge resulting from the duty may lead to a reduction in the volume of sales and of profits. Also, in some border areas, the price increased by the duty may lead to a reduction in the volume of sales of Austrian retailers capable of adversely affecting profits. In this case, it is impossible to assert that the enrichment resulting from repayment would correspond precisely to the amount of the duty paid. On the contrary, the assessment of any enrichment must take account of a reduction in profits attributable to the duty.

- g 81. In the Commission's view, these aspects should have been taken into account in the decisions of 6 September 2000 and an automatic rejection of the claims for reimbursement of all the duty paid cannot be accepted.
- h The Commission points out, however, that the order for reference makes no mention of the existence of that differentiated treatment of claims for reimbursement or of relevant rules in terms of procedure and method of calculation.

- i 82. At the hearing, the Commission argued that the WAO does not observe the principle of equivalence, since it deals differently with claims for repayment based on Community law and those based on a judgment of the Verfassungsgerichtshof declaring a law unconstitutional, to the detriment of the former. a

83. Thus, taxable persons who are able to rely on the 'Anlaßfallwirkung' are not made subject, in order to obtain repayment of a duty levied in breach of the Austrian Constitution, to the condition that they themselves have borne the economic burden of the duty. Paragraph 185(4) of the WAO precludes the application of sub-para 4 of that paragraph in such a situation. b

84. On the other hand, no effect comparable to the 'Anlaßfallwirkung' is recognised in the case of judgments of the court holding that Community law precludes the maintenance of a national tax. This results in discriminatory treatment which is unfavourable for individuals where they exercise, under Community law, their right to repayment of a tax levied though not due. c

85. In that regard, the Commission rejects the Austrian government's argument that cases in which the 'Anlaßfallwirkung' is applicable are marginal. It contends, on the contrary, that the 'Anlaßfallwirkung' produces its effects in a great many practical cases and, moreover, that the limited number of cases of application of the 'Anlaßfallwirkung' cannot suffice to prevent a breach of the principle of equivalence. d

Response of the court

Article 10 EC

86. The court has already held that a national legislature may not, subsequent to a judgment of the court from which it follows that certain legislation is incompatible with the Treaty, adopt a procedural rule which specifically reduces the possibilities of bringing proceedings for recovery of taxes which were levied though not due under that legislation (see the Déville case (para 13), the Dilexport case (paras 38, 39) and Marks & Spencer plc v Customs and Excise Comrs Case C-62/00 [2002] STC 1036, [2002] ECR I-6325 (para 36)). e

87. It is clear from those judgments that a state may not adopt provisions making repayment of a tax held to be contrary to Community law by a judgment of the court or whose incompatibility is apparent from such a judgment, subject to conditions relating specifically to that tax which are less favourable than those which would otherwise be applied to repayment of the tax in question (see Edis case (para 24)). f

88. As regards the duty on alcoholic beverages, it should be borne in mind that the court held at para 50 of the EKW judgment that art 3(2) of Directive 92/12 precludes the maintenance of that duty. g

89. It should also be borne in mind that para 185 of the WAO, in the version prior to the amending act, did not make claims for repayment of duties levied though not due subject to any particular condition. It is also established that the introduction, in para 185 of the WAO, of a provision which became sub-para (3) of that paragraph, was preceded by much debate in the Parliament of the Land of Vienna, during which reference was made to the opinion of Advocate General Saggio in the EKW case and also to the disastrous consequences for the finances of the Austrian municipalities which would result from a judgment of the court declaring the duty on beverages incompatible with Community law. Furthermore, the WAO was amended one week before that judgment was delivered. h

90. It follows from all those circumstances that the purpose of inserting sub-para (3) into para 185 of the WAO was to preclude the effects of the EKW i a judgment, should the duty on alcoholic beverages be deemed contrary to Community law and should that judgment not limit its temporal effects.

91. However, those circumstances do not in themselves suffice to establish whether para 185(3) of the WAO seeks specifically to reduce the possibilities of bringing proceedings for repayment of the duty on alcoholic drinks which has been levied though not due. The Verwaltungsgerichtshof emphasises in its order for reference that the WAO does not refer solely to repayment of duties which were levied in breach of Community law. Furthermore, the parties to the main proceedings, the Austrian and Italian governments and the Commission have submitted different arguments in that regard. However, it is not for the court to resolve a dispute relating exclusively to the interpretation of national law: that task is solely a matter for the national court.

c 92. It must be concluded on this point, therefore, that the adoption by a member state of rules which retroactively restrict the right to repayment of a sum levied but not due, in order to forestall the possible effects of a judgment of the court holding that Community law precludes the maintenance of a national duty, is contrary to Community law and, more particularly, to art 10 EC only in so far as it is aimed specifically at that duty, a point which falls to be determined by the national court. Accordingly, the fact that such a measure has retroactive effect does not in itself amount to an infringement of Community law, where the measure is not aimed specifically at the duty which formed the subject matter of a judgment of the court.

e The relationship between the passing-on of the duty on alcoholic beverages and unjust enrichment

f 93. The court has consistently held that individuals are entitled to obtain repayment of charges levied in a member state in breach of Community provisions. That right is the consequence and the complement of the rights conferred on individuals by Community provisions as interpreted by the court. The member state in question is therefore required, in principle, to repay charges levied in breach of Community law (see, in particular, the Comateb case (para 20), Metallgesellschaft Ltd v IRC, Hoechst AG v IRC Joined cases C-397/98 and C-410/98 [2001] All ER (EC) 496, [2001] ECR I-1727 (para 84) and the Marks & Spencer case (para 30)).

g 94. According to the case law, there is only one exception to that obligation to make repayment. A member state may resist repayment to the trader of a charge levied though not due only where it is established by the national authorities that the charge has been borne in its entirety by someone other than the taxable person and that reimbursement of the charge would constitute unjust enrichment of the latter. It follows that, if the burden of the charge has been passed on only in part, the national authorities are required to repay the amount not passed on (see to that effect, in particular, the Comateb case (paras 27, 28)).

i 95. As that exception is a restriction on a subjective right derived from the Community legal order, it must be interpreted restrictively, taking account in particular of the fact that passing on a charge to the consumer does not necessarily neutralise the economic effects of the tax on the taxable person.

96. Thus, at para 17 of the Les Fils de Jules Bianco case the court held, in particular, that even though indirect taxes are designed in national law to be passed on to the final consumer and in commerce are normally passed on in whole or in part, it cannot be generally assumed that the charge is actually passed on in every case. The actual passing on of such taxes, either in whole or in part, depends on various factors in each commercial transaction which distinguish it from other transactions in other contexts. Consequently, the question whether an indirect tax has or has not been passed on in each case is a question of fact to be determined by the national court, which is free to assess the evidence adduced before it. a

97. The court stated at para 20 of the Les Fils de Jules Bianco case that it is quite probable, depending on the nature of the market, that the charge has been passed on. However, the numerous factors which determine commercial strategy vary from one case to another so that it is virtually impossible to determine how they each affect the passing on of the charge. b

98. The court has also held that, even where it is established that the burden of the charge levied though not due has been passed on in whole or in part to third parties, repayment to the trader of the amount thus passed on does not necessarily entail his unjust enrichment (see the Comateb case (para 29) and Kapniki Mikhailidis AE v Idryma Kinonikon Asphaliseon (IKA) Joined cases C-441 and C-442/98 [2000] ECR I-7145 (para 34)). c

99. Even where the charge is wholly incorporated in the price, the taxable person may suffer as a result of a fall in the volume of his sales (see the Comateb case (para 30) and the Kapniki Mikhailidis case (para 35)). d

100. Accordingly, the existence and the degree of unjust enrichment which repayment of a charge which was levied though not due from the aspect of Community law entails for a taxable person can be established only following an economic analysis in which all the relevant circumstances are taken into account. e

101. Consequently, Community law precludes a member state from refusing to repay to a trader a charge levied in breach of Community law on the sole ground that the charge was included in that trader's retail selling price and thus passed on to third parties, which necessarily means that repayment of the charge would entail unjust enrichment of the trader. f

102. It must therefore be concluded on this point that the rules of Community law on the recovery of sums levied but not due are to be interpreted as meaning that they preclude national rules which refuse—a point which falls to be determined by the national court—repayment of a charge incompatible with Community law on the sole ground that the charge was passed on to third parties, without requiring that the degree of unjust enrichment that repayment of the charge would entail for the trader be established. g

The principles of equivalence and effectiveness h

103. It has consistently been held that in the absence of Community rules on the recovery of national charges levied though not due, it is for the domestic legal system of each member state to lay down the detailed procedural rules governing such actions for repayment, provided, however, that they are not less favourable than those governing similar domestic actions (principle of equivalence) and that they do not render impossible in practice or excessively difficult the exercise of rights conferred by the Community legal order (principle of effectiveness) (see, in particular, the Metallgesellschaft case (para 85) and Grundig Italiana SpA v Ministero delle Finanze Case C-255/00 [2003] All ER (EC) 176, [2002] ECR I-8003 (para 33)). i

a —Principle of equivalence

104. First of all, the principle of equivalence prohibits a member state from laying down less favourable procedural rules for claims for repayment of a charge contrary to Community law which are based on Community law than those applicable to similar domestic proceedings.

b 105. With more particular regard to the WAO, it follows from the actual wording of para 185 that that paragraph provides for a derogation for certain claims for recovery of sums levied but not due based on national law.

c 106. Paragraph 185(4) of the WAO provides that sub-para (3) of that paragraph does not apply to persons who can rely on the effects of the 'Anlaßfallwirkung', although that provision fails to specify the rules or conditions applicable to actions for repayment of a charge levied though not due by claimants who can rely on the precedent of a judgment of the Verfassungsgerichtshof declaring that a national provision is contrary to the Constitution.

d 107. The principle of equivalence precludes the application of national provisions which allow taxable persons to obtain repayment of a charge levied though not due only where those provisions lay down more advantageous conditions where the claim for repayment is based on a declaration of unconstitutionality by a national court than those applicable to traders who, following a judgment of the court, seek repayment of a charge levied in breach of Community law.

e 108. In must therefore be concluded on this point that, in so far as the principle of equivalence precludes national rules which lay down less favourable procedural rules for claims for repayment of a charge which has been levied though not due from the aspect of Community law than those applicable to similar actions based on certain provisions of domestic law, it is for the national court to ascertain, on the basis of a comprehensive assessment of national law, whether it is actually the case that only claimants who bring proceedings based on domestic constitutional law may rely on the 'Anlaßfallwirkung' and that the rules governing repayment of charges held to be incompatible with domestic constitutional law are more favourable than those applicable to actions relating to taxes held to be contrary to Community law.

h 109. Second, as regards compliance with the principle of effectiveness, it must be borne in mind that, in principle, a trader who has paid a charge levied though not due is entitled to repayment of the amount paid (see, in particular, the Comateb case (para 20)) and that the tax authority may refuse to repay such a charge only if repayment entails unjust enrichment of the trader.

i 110. It is clear from the case law of the court (see, in particular, the San Giorgio case (para 14), the Dilexport case (paras 48, 52, 54) and the Kapniki Mikhailidis case (paras 36, 37)) that the authority cannot merely establish that the charge was passed on to third parties and presume from that fact alone, or from the fact that the national legislation requires that the charge be incorporated in the selling price to consumers, that the economic burden which the charge represented for the taxable person is neutralised and that, consequently, repayment would automatically entail unjust enrichment of the trader.

111. The court has also consistently held that national rules which place on the taxable person the burden of proving that the charge was not passed on to third parties, which amounts to requiring negative proof, or which establish a presumption that the charge has been passed on to third parties, are not consistent with Community law (see, in particular, the San Giorgio case (para 14), the Dilexport case (para 54) and the Kapniki Mikhailidis case (paras 36–38)). a

112. In that regard, the national court states that the WAO contains no special provision governing the division of the burden of proving that the taxable person has passed the charge on to third parties and that repayment of the charge levied though not due would entail his unjust enrichment. b

113. Although the tax authority and the Austrian government contend that the burden of proof is wholly borne by the national authority, it is also apparent from the order for reference that the tax authority concluded that the economic burden of the duty on alcoholic beverages had not been borne by the claimants in the main proceedings simply because the price invoiced to consumers of those beverages included that duty. That approach might constitute a presumption that the duty has been passed on to third parties, and also of unjust enrichment of the taxable persons, of such a kind as to render repayment of the duty levied though not due impossible or at least excessively difficult, which is contrary to Community law. c

114. It is for the national court to determine whether, in the absence of a statutory presumption, the tax authority's practice has the effect of establishing such a presumption of unjust enrichment.

115. It is true that in the case of a 'self-assessed' charge, proof that the charge has actually been passed on to third parties cannot be adduced without the co-operation of the taxable person concerned. In that regard, the tax authorities may demand access to the supporting documents which the taxable person was required to keep under the rules of national law. e

116. It is also for the national court to determine to what extent the co-operation required on the part of taxable persons in establishing that the economic burden of the duty on alcoholic beverages was not passed on amounts in practice to establishing a presumption that the duty was passed on, unless the taxable persons rebut such a presumption by adducing evidence to the contrary. f

117. It follows from the foregoing that the principle of effectiveness referred to at para 103 of this judgment precludes national legislation or a national administrative practice which makes the exercise of the rights conferred by the Community legal order impossible in practice or excessively difficult by establishing a presumption of unjust enrichment on the sole ground that the duty was passed on to third parties. g

118. The answer to the question referred by the national court must therefore be that: h

—the adoption by a member state of rules, such as the WAO, fixing more restrictive procedural rules for recovery of sums levied but not due, in order to forestall the possible effects of a judgment of the court holding that Community law precludes the maintenance of a national duty, is contrary to Community law and, more particularly, to art 5 of the Treaty only in so far as it is aimed specifically at that duty, a point which falls to be determined by the national court; i

—the rules of Community law on the recovery of sums levied but not due are to be interpreted as meaning that they preclude national rules which refuse—a point which falls to be determined by the national court—repayment of a charge incompatible with Community law on the sole ground that the

a charge was passed on to third parties, without requiring that the degree of unjust enrichment that repayment of the charge would entail for the taxable person be established;

—the principle of equivalence precludes national rules which lay down less favourable procedural rules for claims for repayment of a charge which has

b been levied though not due from the aspect of Community law than those applicable to similar actions based on certain provisions of domestic law. It is for the national court to ascertain, on the basis of a comprehensive assessment of national law, whether it is actually the case that only claimants who bring proceedings based on domestic constitutional law may rely on the 'Anlaßfallwirkung' and that the rules governing repayment of charges held to c be incompatible with domestic constitutional law are more favourable than those applicable to actions relating to taxes held to be contrary to Community law;

—the principle of effectiveness precludes national legislation or a national administrative practice which makes the exercise of the rights conferred by the Community legal order impossible in practice or excessively difficult by

d establishing a presumption of unjust enrichment on the sole ground that the duty was passed on to third parties.

COSTS

e 119. The costs incurred by the Austrian and Italian governments and by the Commission, which have submitted observations to the court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the proceedings pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court.

f On those grounds, the Court of Justice (Fifth Chamber), in answer to the question referred to it by the Verwaltungsgerichtshof by order of 23 March 2001, hereby rules:

g (1) The adoption by a member state of rules, such as the Wiener Abgabenordnung, fixing more restrictive procedural rules on recovery of sums levied but not due, in order to forestall the possible effects of a judgment of the court holding that Community law precludes the maintenance of a national duty, is contrary to Community law and, more particularly, to art 5 of the EC Treaty (now art 10 EC) only in so far as it is aimed specifically at that duty, a point which falls to be determined by the national court.

h (2) The rules of Community law on the recovery of sums levied but not due are to be interpreted as meaning that they preclude national rules which refuse—a point which falls to be determined by the national court—repayment of a charge incompatible with Community law on the sole ground that the charge was passed on to third parties, without requiring that the degree of unjust enrichment that repayment of the charge would entail for the taxable person be established.

i (3) The principle of equivalence precludes national rules which lay down less favourable procedural rules for claims for repayment of a charge which has been levied though not due from the aspect of Community law than those applicable to similar actions based on certain provisions of domestic law. It is for the national court to ascertain, on the basis of a comprehensive assessment of national law, whether it is actually the case that only claimants who bring proceedings based on domestic constitutional law may rely on the 'Anlaßfallwirkung' and that the rules governing repayment of charges held to be incompatible with domestic constitutional law are more favourable than those applicable to actions relating to taxes held to be contrary to Community law. a

(4) The principle of effectiveness precludes national legislation or a national administrative practice which makes the exercise of the rights conferred by the Community legal order impossible in practice or excessively difficult by establishing a presumption of unjust enrichment on the sole ground that the duty was passed on to third parties. b

considered that art 8(1) to (4)<sup>d</sup> of the directive applied only to the exchange of a valid driving licence, but did not authorise a member state to regard a sovereign act of another state as void. In those circumstances, the national court decided to stay the proceedings and refer for preliminary ruling pursuant to art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) a question concerning the compatibility of the national provisions with the directive.

Held – (1) Articles 1(2), 7(1)(b) and 9 of the directive precluded a host member state from refusing to recognise a driving licence issued by another member state on the ground that the holder of the licence had taken up normal residence in the host member state on the date that that licence had been issued. The directive had conferred on a member state that issued a driving licence exclusive competence to ensure compliance with the residence requirement set out in arts 7(1)(b) and 9 of the directive. It was for that member state alone to take appropriate measures where the person to whom the licence had been issued was shown subsequently to have failed to satisfy that requirement. Where a host member had doubts as to the validity of such a licence, it was to inform the issuing member state of those doubts under the directive's provisions relating to mutual assistance and the exchange of information, and, where an issuing member state had failed to take appropriate measures in that regard, a host member state might bring proceedings under art 227 EC (formerly art 170 of the EC Treaty) for a declaration by the Court of Justice that the issuing member state failed to comply with the obligations arising under the directive (see judgment paras 48, 49, below).

(2) Articles 1(2) and 8(4) of the directive precluded a member state from refusing to recognise the validity of a driving licence issued by another member state on the ground that its holder had, in the host member state, been subject to a measure withdrawing or cancelling the driving licence issued by that member state, where a temporary ban on obtaining a new licence, with which that measure was coupled, had expired before the date of issue of the licence issued by the other member state. Contrary to the view expressed by the national court, art 8(4) of the directive did not apply only where the holder of a driving licence issued by another member state had applied to the authorities of a host member state to exchange his or her driving licence. Although art 8 contained various other provisions specifically regulating the substantive and formal conditions applicable to the exchange or replacement of a driving licence where the holder had submitted a request to that effect to the competent authorities, arts 8(2) and (4) served a different aim, namely that of permitting member states, within their territory, to apply their national provisions concerning the withdrawal, suspension, and cancellation of driving licences. Therefore, the exercise of those rights was not dependent on any voluntary act of the licence holder. However, art 8(4), as a derogation from the general principle of mutual recognition of driving licences in art 1(2), which aimed to facilitate the exercise of fundamental freedoms guaranteed by the Treaty, was to be interpreted strictly and was not to be used by a host member state as a means by which to refuse to recognise indefinitely the validity of a driving licence issued by another member state to a person who had previously been the object in the host member state's territory of a measure withdrawing or cancelling a previous licence issued by that member state (see judgment paras 72, 73, 76, 78, below).

Reference

By decision of 11 October 2001, corrected by letter of 19 December 2001, the b Amtsgericht Frankenthal (Frankenthal Local Court), Germany, referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) a question (set out at judgment para 22, below) on the interpretation of art 1(2) of Council Directive (EEC)
91/439 (on driving licences), as amended by Council Directive (EC) 97/26 (Directive 91/439). That question was raised in criminal proceedings brought against Felix Kapper, who was sentenced to a fine for having driven a motor c vehicle on 20 November and 11 December 1999 without being in possession of a valid driving licence, although he held a driving licence issued by the Netherlands authorities on 11 August 1999. Written observations were submitted on behalf of: Mr Kapper, by W Säftel, Rechtsanwalt; the German government, by W-D Plessing and M Lumma, acting as agents; the Netherlands government, by HG Sevenster, acting as agent; the Commission of d the European Communities, by M Wolcarius, G Braun and HMH Speyart, acting as agents. Oral observations were made on behalf of: Mr Kapper, represented by W Säftel; the Italian Republic, represented by A Cingolo, Avvocato dello Stato; and the Commission, represented by G Braun. The language of the case was German. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General. e

16 October 2003. The Advocate General (P Léger) delivered the following

1. Is a member state entitled to refuse to recognise a driving licence issued by another member state? If so, on what grounds? Those are, in essence, the questions asked by the Amtsgericht Frankenthal (Frankenthal Local Court), f Pfalz, Germany, in criminal proceedings brought against an individual. They closely affect a number of important aspects of the daily life of the European citizen.

I—LEGAL BACKGROUND

A—Community legislation

2. The issue and use of driving licences were first harmonised by the adoption of the First Council Directive (EEC) 80/1263<sup>2</sup>. Its purpose was to contribute to improving road traffic safety and to assist the movement of persons settling in a member state other than that in which they had passed a driving test, or moving within the European Economic Community. g

3. To that end, Directive 80/1263 harmonised certain national rules, particularly those relating to the issue of driving licences and the conditions for the validity of such licences. It established a Community model licence, introduced a principle of mutual recognition of such licences and provided for the exchange of licences by holders transferring their place of residence or place of employment from one member state to another. h

4. Directive 80/1263 was repealed by Council Directive (EEC) 91/439<sup>3</sup>. The latter marks a further stage in the harmonisation of national provisions, in i a particular as regards the conditions governing the issue of licences and the scope of the principle of mutual recognition relating to them.

5. The issue of driving licences is subject to minimum age conditions<sup>4</sup>, and to requirements to have passed certain tests<sup>5</sup>, to meet certain medical standards<sup>6</sup> and to have normal residence in the territory of the member state issuing the licence, or to produce evidence that the applicant has been studying there for at least six months<sup>7</sup>. Article 7(5) of the directive states that no person may hold a driving licence from more than one member state. Thus, where a person is the holder of a (valid) driving licence issued by a member state, and which the other member states have undertaken to recognise, he is precluded from obtaining another licence from the same or another member state.

c 6. The principle of the mutual recognition of licences is laid down by art 1(2) of the directive in general terms as follows: 'Driving licences issued by Member States shall be mutually recognized.'

7. However, where the holder of a valid licence issued by a member state has taken up normal residence in another member state, art 8(2) of the directive provides that—

d 'Subject to observance of the principle of territoriality of criminal and police laws, the Member States of normal residence may apply its national provisions on the restriction, suspension, withdrawal or cancellation of the right to drive to the holder ... [in question] and, if necessary, exchange the licence for that purpose.'

e 8. Furthermore, under art 8(4) of the directive—

'A Member State may refuse to recognize the validity of any driving licence issued by another Member State to a person who is, in the former State's territory, the subject of one of the measures referred to in paragraph 2.'

f The implementation of this provision by member states by way of adjustments to their national legislation is subject to the agreement of the Commission of the European Communities<sup>8</sup>.

B—National legislation

g 9. Since 1 January 1999, the driving of motor vehicles in Germany by the holders of licences issued by another member state and who have taken up residence in Germany has been governed by the Verordnung über die h 4 Article 6 of the directive.

5 Article 7(1)(a) of the directive.

6 As above.

7 Article 7(1)(b) of the directive. 'Normal residence' is defined in art 9 of the directive as the place where a person usually lives, that is, for at least 185 days in each calendar year, because of personal and occupational ties, or, in the case of a person with no occupational ties, because of personal ties which show close links between that person and the place where he is living. The article states that the normal residence of a person whose occupational ties are in a different place from his personal ties and who consequently lives in turn in different places situated in two or more member states is to be regarded as being the place of his personal ties, provided that such person returns there regularly (this last condition need not be met however where the person is living in a member state in order to carry out a task of a definite duration).

i 8 See the second paragraph of art 10 of the directive.

Zulassung von Personen zu den Straßenverkehr of 18 August 1998, also called the Fahrerlaubnisverordnung<sup>9</sup> (Regulation on Access to Road Traffic; hereinafter the FeV).

10. Under para 28(1) and (4) of the FeV, the holder of a driving licence issued by a member state of the European Union or the European Economic Area (hereinafter the EEA) is not permitted to drive in Germany when at the time the licence was issued he had already taken up normal residence in Germany (unless he obtained his driving licence while he was attending a school or university in the member state in which it was issued)<sup>10</sup>.

11. The same applies when a licence issued by a member state of the European Union or the EEA is withdrawn (whether on a temporary or permanent basis) by the courts in Germany or is subject to an equivalent (immediately enforceable or final) administrative measure, when there has been a refusal to issue such a licence, when there has been an abandonment of its use<sup>11</sup>, or when the holder of the licence has been banned from driving in Germany or has had his driving licence confiscated or seized or been required to surrender it<sup>12</sup>.

12. It follows from these provisions that the holder of a German licence is no longer permitted to drive in Germany if the licence has been withdrawn<sup>13</sup> or if he has been banned from driving by the German authorities, even if he has subsequently obtained a licence from another member state<sup>14</sup>.

13. Moreover, according to the interpretation which has been given to those provisions by case law<sup>15</sup>, the loss of the right to drive in Germany is not limited in time to the period of the driving ban or of the blocked period which is coupled with a withdrawal of the licence. Unlike the position which applied

10 Paragraph 28(4)(2) of the FeV. Similar provisions were in place under the first paragraph of art 1(4) of the Verordnung zur Umsetzung der Richtlinie 91/439/EEC des Rates vom 29 Juli 1991 über den Führerschein und zur Änderung straßenverkehrsrechtlicher Vorschriften (Bundesgesetzblatt 1991 I, p. 885, hereinafter the regulation implementing the directive). This regulation was adopted on 19 June 1996 and was in force from 1 July 1996 until 31 December 1998 (when the FeV, which replaced it, came into force).

12 Paragraph 28(4)(4) of the FeV.

13 In German law, the withdrawal of a licence (Entziehung) automatically entails the loss or cancellation of the right to drive and not simply its suspension. Such a measure requires to be coupled with a prohibition on taking out a new licence for a period fixed by the court (a blocked period). At the end of the blocked period, the person concerned is only permitted to resume driving once he has been authorised to do so by the competent authorities, having passed a number of aptitude tests.

14 For an illustration, see in particular the order of the Bundesgerichtshof of 20 June 2002 (4StR 371/01, NJW 2002, p 2330).

- a before the regulation implementing the directive<sup>16</sup>, such a loss of the right to drive in Germany is capable of lasting indefinitely, even after the expiry of the periods concerned<sup>17</sup>.

II—FACTS AND PROCEDURE IN THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS

- b 14. On 26 February 1998, the Amtsgericht Frankenthal, Pfalz, ordered the withdrawal (equivalent to cancellation) of the driving licence belonging to Mr Felix Kapper, a German national and the holder of a German licence, and instructed the relevant national authorities not to issue a new licence to him before the expiry of a period of nine months, that is to say not before 25 November 1998.

- c 15. Since then, no new licence has been issued to him in Germany. However, he obtained a Netherlands driving licence on 11 August 1999.

- d 16. On 17 March 2000, the same court sentenced Mr Kapper to a fine for driving a motor vehicle in Germany, on 20 November and 11 December 1999, without a valid licence, or, more precisely, while possessing a Netherlands licence whose validity was not recognised by the German authorities.
- d Mr Kapper appealed against that decision, to the same court, on the basis that he held a Netherlands licence.

III—THE QUESTION REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

- e 17. In light of the parties' arguments, the Amtsgericht Frankenthal, Pfalz, decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following question to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

- 'Does Article 1(2) of Council Directive 91/439/EEC of 29 July 1991 on driving licences preclude a Member State from refusing to recognise a driving licence where, according to its investigations, another Member State issued that licence although the holder of the licence did not have his normal residence there, and in appropriate cases is actual effect to be given to that provision in that regard?'

IV—ANALYSIS

A—The admissibility of the question referred for a preliminary ruling

- g 18. The Netherlands government is uncertain whether the question referred for a preliminary ruling is admissible, in the absence, in its opinion, of sufficient information in the order for reference relating to the facts, to the relevant provisions of national law and to the importance of the question for the resolution of the main proceedings, particularly on the assumption that the person concerned was still banned from driving in Germany.

16 It followed from the first paragraph of art 1(4) of the regulation implementing the directive that the holder of a licence issued by another member state who had previously had his German licence provisionally withdrawn or who could not obtain such a licence by reason of a final judicial decision was not entitled to drive a vehicle in Germany for so long as this provision applied to him. At the expiry of the period in question, the person concerned could automatically rely in Germany on his licence issued by another member state.

17 However, the regulation of 7 August 2002, which came into force on 1 September 2002, made it possible to put an end to the situation where the right to drive was lost. Under para 28(5) of the FeV, as amended, permission to drive in Germany under a licence issued by another member state may be granted by the German authorities when the person concerned so requests, provided that the circumstances which led to the withdrawal of the licence no longer exist. These provisions concern specifically the situation where the holder of a German licence has had his licence withdrawn by the German authorities and has subsequently obtained a new licence from another member state.

19. It should be borne in mind in that regard that the court has consistently held that the procedure under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) is an instrument which assists co-operation between the Court of Justice and the national courts<sup>18</sup>. In the context of that co-operation, it is solely for the national court before which the dispute has been brought, and which must assume responsibility for the subsequent judicial decision, to determine both the need for a preliminary ruling and the relevance of the questions which it puts to the court. Consequently, where the questions submitted by the national court concern the interpretation of Community law, the Court of Justice is, in principle, bound to give a ruling<sup>19</sup>.

20. However, it has stated that it is for the court to examine the circumstances in which the case was referred to it by the national court in order to assess whether the court has jurisdiction<sup>20</sup>.

21. It is in the light of this role that the court has held that it has no jurisdiction to give a preliminary ruling where it is quite obvious that the interpretation or the assessment of the validity of a Community rule sought by that court bears no relation to the facts or purpose of the main proceedings, or where the problem is hypothetical, or where the court does not have before it the factual or legal information necessary to give a useful answer to the questions submitted to it<sup>21</sup>.

22. As regards the last-mentioned case, I would point out that the requirement adequately to describe the legal and factual context of the dispute principally pursues two objectives.

23. First, the information provided in the decision referring the matter for a preliminary ruling must enable the court to provide an interpretation of Community law which will be of assistance to the national court<sup>22</sup>.

24. It is true that in the present case the order for reference contains little information on the factual and legal background to the main proceedings. A reading of it does not make it clear whether when Mr Kapper was charged with driving without a valid licence his right to drive in Germany was, or was not, still cancelled or restricted following the withdrawal of his German licence.

25. Nevertheless, the information provided in the order for reference has been supplemented, both by the reply from the national court to the request for clarification sent to it by the court, and by the replies from Mr Kapper and

See also Pretore di Genova v Banchemo Case C-157/92 [1993] ECR I-1085 (para 6) and La Pyramide SARL Case C-378/93 [1994] ECR I-3999 (para 14).

a the German government to the questions put to them in this regard. These make it clear that at the time he was charged in relation to the matters in question he was no longer prohibited from obtaining a new licence (which had been withdrawn for a period of nine months), but apparently continued to be deprived of the right to drive in Germany by reason of para 28(4)(4) of the FeV<sup>23</sup>. I am therefore of the view that notwithstanding the lacunae in the order
b for reference, the court is in a position to provide a useful answer to the question put by the Amtsgericht Frankenthal, Pfalz.

26. Secondly, the information provided by an order for reference must give the governments of the member states and interested parties the opportunity to submit observations pursuant to art 20 of the Statute of the Court of Justice<sup>24</sup>.

c 27. In this case, it is clear from the observations submitted by the governments of the member states and by the Commission that the information provided in the order for reference has enabled them to comment effectively on the question referred for a preliminary ruling. Moreover, as mentioned above, that information has been supplemented by the reply from d the national court to the request for clarification sent to it by the court. This additional information was referred to in the report for the hearing and made known to the governments of the member states and other interested parties, either for the purpose of a written answer to certain questions or for the purpose of the hearing. The latter have thus had the opportunity to add to their observations where necessary.

e 28. I am therefore of the opinion that the question referred for a preliminary ruling by the Amtsgericht Frankenthal, Pfalz, is admissible.

29. However, as Mr Kapper, the German and Italian governments and the Commission have proposed, the scope of the question referred for a preliminary ruling should be extended to include the interpretation of art 8(2) f and (4) of the directive in order to provide a useful and complete answer to the national court.

30. I am accordingly of the view that the question referred for a preliminary ruling should be treated as asking whether art 1(2), in conjunction with art 7(1)(b), art 8(2) and (4) and art 9 of the directive, should be interpreted as meaning that a member state is entitled to refuse to recognise a driving licence
g issued by another member state on the grounds (a) that according to its investigations, the holder of the licence in question had not taken up normal residence in the member state in which the licence was issued prior to its being issued, and/or (b) that the holder of the licence is still banned from driving in the first-mentioned member state following the withdrawal or cancellation of a previous licence, issued in that member state, coupled with a provisional h prohibition on obtaining a new licence there, when both those measures are fully executed and their effects have therefore been exhausted.

i 23 It is not for the court to take a view on the application of national law ratione tempore. Nevertheless, a reading of the order of the Bundesgerichtshof of 20 June 2002 referred to above suggests that the FeV is applicable to Mr Kapper's situation, to the exclusion of the regulation implementing the directive.

24 See inter alia Albany International BV v Stichting Bedrijfspensioenfonds Textielindustrie Case C-67/96 [2001] ICR 774, [1999] ECR I-5751 (para 40) and Criminal proceedings against Arduino Case C-35/99 [2002] ECR I-1529 (paras 28, 29) and my opinion in that case (para 30).

B—Substance

31. It should be noted at the outset that art 1(2) of the directive lays down the principle that 'driving licences issued by Member States shall be mutually recognized'.

32. As I recently pointed out, these provisions adopt a general approach to the mutual recognition of licences, and do not require that any particular conditions or formalities are met<sup>25</sup>.

33. The court so held in Criminal proceedings against Skanavi<sup>26</sup> in the context of requirements relating to the exchange of licences. The court restated the point in Awoyemi's case, adding that the obligation to recognise driving licences is clear and unconditional and that the member states have no discretion as to the measures to be adopted in order to comply with those requirements. It follows that the provisions referred to above have direct effect<sup>27</sup>.

34. The point was again made by the court very recently in Commission v Netherlands in the context of a requirement relating to the registration of licences<sup>28</sup>.

35. It is in the light of this principle of mutual recognition of licences, founded on mutual confidence between member states, that it should be considered whether a member state is entitled to refuse to recognise a licence issued by another member state for reasons relating to the residence of the holder of the licence in question or the fact that the latter has had his licence withdrawn or cancelled.

1—The condition relating to the residence of the holder of the licence at the time of issue of the licence

36. Under art 7(1)(b) of the directive, a driving licence may only be issued to an applicant who has his normal residence in the territory of the member state issuing the licence.

37. I agree with Mr Kapper and the Netherlands and Italian governments that it is the task solely of the member state issuing the licence to verify that this condition precedent is complied with, in accordance with the criteria set out in art 9 of the directive. It follows that where a licence has been issued by a member state, the other member states cannot refuse to recognise it on the grounds that in their view this condition has not been met.

38. To accept the contrary, as the German government proposes, would strike at the heart of the system established by the directive as well as the principle of mutual recognition, which is its linchpin.

39. As I have already observed in relation to the registration procedure in the Netherlands, the very philosophy of the system established by the directive consists in laying down common rules for the issue of driving licences and in conferring on the member state of issue the exclusive power of ensuring that the rules have been met<sup>29</sup>. It is on the basis of this system that the principle of mutual recognition of licences is founded which, it should be borne in mind, is intended to operate automatically, that is to say without any special conditions, formalities or investigative measures, and therefore requires mutual confidence on the part of the member states.

25 See my opinion in European Commission v Netherlands Case C-246/00 [2003] ECR I-7485 (para 38).

26 Case C-193/94 [1996] All ER (EC) 435, [1996] ECR I-929 (para 26).

27 Criminal proceedings against Awoyemi Case C-230/97 [1998] ECR I-6781 (para 41).

29 See my opinion in Commission v Netherlands (para 42), cited in footnote 25, above.

a 40. Accordingly, to accept that a member state is entitled to check that the holder of a licence issued by another member state has fulfilled the condition as to residence of the holder and that, should the first-mentioned member state take the view that there has been a failure to comply with that condition, it may refuse to recognise the licence in question, would amount to stripping the principle of mutual recognition of licences of its substance and destroying b the mutual confidence which must guide member states in the matter.

41. Similar considerations led the court to hold that—

‘if a person holds a driving licence issued by a Member State, that should be deemed to be proof that the licence holder has fulfilled the conditions for the issue of a licence provided for in Directive 91/439; the host Member c State cannot then require the holder to prove again that he or she actually satisfied the conditions laid down in Articles 7(1)(b) and 9 of Directive 91/439, without violating the principle of mutual recognition of driving licences.’<sup>30</sup>

42. The court’s analysis is based on the fact that—

d ‘this requirement [of proof] negates the very recognition of driving licences issued by other Member States, because it amounts to rechecking whether the licence holder has fulfilled the conditions for obtaining a licence provided for in Articles 7(1)(b) and 9 of Directive 91/439.’<sup>31</sup>

e 43. The court was careful to emphasise in that regard that this requirement meant that the holder of the licence to be registered had to prove something the evidence for which could be extremely difficult to provide owing to the time which might elapse between when the licence is obtained and when the person took up residence in the Netherlands and the distance there might be between the place where the licence holder resided (when the driving licence was obtained) and the municipality in which the licence holder decided f to take up residence (in the member state in question)<sup>32</sup>.

44. In my opinion, that which applies to a requirement that the holder of the licence himself must prove as a matter of course that he has met the residence condition referred to above, in the context of a registration procedure with a member state which did not issue the licence, applies also to the checks or investigations which that member state would undertake in that regard in g order to decide whether to grant or refuse recognition of the licence.

45. Such a process would amount to rechecking whether the holder of a licence issued by another member state had fulfilled the residence condition laid down by the directive for obtaining the licence. As the court has held, the holding of such a licence should be deemed to be proof that the holder of h the licence in question has fulfilled that condition. The fact that such proof exists thus necessarily precludes a member state from disregarding the 30 See Commission v Netherlands (para 75), cited in footnote 25, above. The complaint against the Kingdom of the Netherlands in that case was that it had instituted a system of compulsory registration of driving licences issued by other member states, a year after the holder of such a licence had taken up residence in the Netherlands, and had imposed a registration system so cumbersome that it could barely be distinguished from a procedure for exchanging licences. It was cumbersome in particular owing to the fact that the holder of the licence to be registered was required to prove to the Netherlands authorities that during the year in which the licence was obtained he had resided for at least 185 days in the member state in which the licence was issued or had been enrolled for at least six months at a school or university in that state.

obligation to recognise a licence issued by another member state solely on the ground that in its opinion there was evidence which suggested that the condition had not been fulfilled and thus calling into question the reliability of that proof. That is all the more the case as, if such evidence were taken into account by that member state as grounds for refusing to recognise the licence in question, its holder would ultimately be required to provide evidence once again that he had fulfilled that condition, which, as the court has held, would also be contrary to the principle of the mutual recognition of licences.

46. I am therefore of the opinion that a member state is not entitled either to check that the holder of a licence issued by another member state has properly fulfilled the residence condition laid down by the directive, or to refuse to recognise the licence in question on the ground that it has taken the view that the holder has not fulfilled that condition.

47. Contrary to what the Commission suggests, I believe that this conclusion also applies where, as is the case in Germany, such checks are not carried out as a matter of course, but are limited to those cases where the member state concerned had significant doubts as to compliance with the residence condition.

48. Where a member state has such doubts, it may so inform the member state which issued the licence by way of an exchange of information under art 12(3) of the directive<sup>33</sup>. It should nevertheless be made clear that if the result of such an exchange is that the member state which issued the licence confirms that the residence condition in question was properly fulfilled, the member state concerned continues to be required to recognise the disputed licence, even if it is not convinced by the reply it has received. It is thus not entitled to rely on its own checks or investigations into the matter, even if confined to the specific case, to refuse to recognise the licence.

49. That being so, were the host member state to take the view that the member state which had issued the licence had carried out inadequate checks into the residence condition in question, it would always be open to the former to bring infringement proceedings under art 227 EC (formerly art 170 of the EC Treaty).

50. In that regard, I am aware that it is possible (although very unlikely) that as a result of an exchange of information the member state which issued the licence realised that, contrary to what it had believed when the licence was issued, the residence condition laid down by the directive had not been properly fulfilled. Nevertheless, even in such a case, I believe that a refusal to recognise the licence would still not be permissible<sup>34</sup>.

<sup>34</sup> It is very likely that this situation does not apply in the main proceedings. Nothing in the documents before the court suggests that the German authorities have exchanged information with the Netherlands authorities as regards the licence issued by the latter to Mr Kapper. Moreover, if, at the hearing, he claimed to have spent eight months in the Netherlands when the licence was issued, and to have subsequently returned to Germany, where he now resides, that information could neither be affirmed nor denied by the Netherlands government, which was not present at the hearing (nor indeed by the German government, which was also not present). It is therefore not known whether in fact Mr Kapper did not fulfil the residence condition in question. That being the case, the possibility falls to be considered for the sake of completeness.

a 51. Unlike the Commission, I find it difficult to place the failure of the holder of a licence to fulfil the residence condition in the member state in which it was issued on the same footing as the situation before the court in Van de Bijl v Staatssecretaris van Economische Zaken<sup>35</sup>.

b 52. In that case, the court considered the position of a Netherlands national who wished to exercise the trade of a self-employed painter, but was unable to establish that he had the qualifications required to exercise it in that member state, and who relied in his dealings with the Netherlands authorities on a certificate issued by the United Kingdom authorities which stated that he had carried on that activity in the United Kingdom for a specified period, with a view to being granted permission to carry on the activity concerned in the Netherlands under Council Directive (EEC) 64/427<sup>36</sup>. That directive provided c that where, in a member state, the taking up or pursuit of certain activities was dependent on the possession of certain knowledge and ability, that member state should accept as sufficient evidence of such knowledge and activity the fact that the activity in question had been pursued in another member state for a specified period, relying for that purpose on a certificate issued by the d authorities of the latter member state.

53. That condition precedent as to the carrying on of an activity arose in the context of a temporary system of authorisation for carrying on those activities, pending the co-ordination of national rules relating to the taking up and pursuit of those activities, and the mutual recognition of qualifications<sup>37</sup>. The condition reflected the legitimate concern of the host member state that it e should be satisfied that the person concerned possessed certain general knowledge and ability sufficient to pursue the intended activity, in order to protect the interests of the recipients of that activity.

54. That context explains why the court held that—

f 'the competent authority in the host Member State, when it is presented with an application for a licence to take up an activity on the basis of a certificate drawn up by the competent authority of the Member State from which the beneficiary comes pursuant to ... the directive, is not bound to grant the application automatically if the certificate produced contains a manifest inaccuracy inasmuch as it states that the person covered ... has completed a period of professional activity in the Member State from g which he comes, when it is clear that during that same period the person in question has pursued his activities in the territory of the host Member State.'<sup>38</sup>

55. In my opinion, that case law cannot be applied to the situation in the main proceedings.

h 56. It should be pointed out first of all that the residence condition under the directive is part of a system of recognition of driving licences, and not of authorisation, which will as a rule exclude all discretion on the part of other member states than the state of issue as to fulfilment of the conditions for obtaining those licences.

57. Moreover, that residence condition does not reflect needs which are comparable to those applying to the possession of general knowledge and ability, which are intended to protect the interests of recipients of an activity carried on by a self-employed person. However important it may be in the structure of the system established by the directive, the condition cannot be treated in the same way as an essential condition, such as the passing of certain tests of skills and behaviour and theoretical tests, all of which are prompted by overriding reasons relating to the public interest, as art 7(1)(a) of the directive requires<sup>39</sup>.

58. It follows from this reasoning that the parallel suggested by the Commission between the failure to fulfil the residence condition under the directive which has been found and the situation considered by the court in Van de Bijl's judgment is not relevant in my opinion. That judgment does not therefore call into question my analysis.

59. In my opinion, such a failure does not of itself justify a refusal to recognise the driving licence in question, nor indeed does it justify the withdrawal or cancellation of the licence by a member state which did not issue the licence (with effects on its own territory)<sup>40</sup>. That being the case, if a member state which issues licences were consistently to fail to meet its obligation to confirm that the residence condition has been fulfilled, the host member state and the Commission could bring infringement proceedings against the member state in question under art 226 EC (formerly art 169 of the EC Treaty) and art 227 EC.

60. It is moreover not inconceivable that the member state which issued the licence might decide that by reason of the irregularity which has been found it should withdraw or cancel the licence, operating a mirror procedure, with the result that the other member states would plainly not be required to recognise it.

61. I am accordingly of the opinion that the combined provisions of arts 1(2), 7(1)(b) and 9 of the directive should be interpreted as meaning that a member state is not entitled to refuse to recognise a licence issued by another member state on the ground that in its opinion the holder of the licence in question had not taken up normal residence in the latter member state at the time when the licence was issued.

2—The effects of a withdrawal or cancellation of a licence issued by a member state as regards a licence issued subsequently by another member state

62. The question here is whether a member state is entitled to refuse to recognise a licence issued by another member state on grounds other than that considered above, on the basis of measures taken against the holder of the licence in question to withdraw or cancel a licence previously issued by the first member state.

<sup>39</sup> It would appear that that is not the view of the Commission as expressed in its interpretative communication, cited in footnote 33, above. The consequences of a breach of art 7(1)(b) of the directive are the same as those relating to a breach of art 7(1)(a).

<sup>40</sup> Contrary to what the Commission suggests in its interpretative note, cited in footnote 33, above (Pt II, para C.2.3), it is my view that even if it were agreed that the residence condition laid down by the directive had not been fulfilled, a member state is not entitled to cancel, with effects in its territory, a licence issued by another member state (short of subsequently returning it to the member state which issued it, so that the latter may proceed to cancel it itself, with consequent effects in all member states). The effects of cancelling a licence in this way would be largely similar to those resulting from a decision to refuse to recognise a licence.

- a 63. According to Mr Kapper, it is possible that, on the basis of art 8(4) of the directive, the German authorities might refuse to recognise the validity in their territory of a licence issued by another member state so long as a national measure such as a suspension or cancellation of the right to drive for a specified period was in place. However, it is certainly not open to them to do so after that time.
- b 64. Similarly, the Italian government submits that these provisions are solely intended to secure the application of a criminal penalty, such as the suspension or withdrawal of a licence, so that its holder cannot avoid these by improperly relying on a licence obtained in another member state. Once the criminal penalty has been executed, the member state in which it was imposed is no longer entitled to refuse to recognise the licence.
- c 65. According to the Commission, the directive does not prevent a member state from refusing to recognise a licence issued by another member state when its holder has had his national licence withdrawn and the first-mentioned member state has not reinstated it. It added at the hearing that such a refusal of recognition, based on art 8(4) of the directive, could not apply indefinitely,
- d particularly where, at a given time, the person concerned could once more obtain a licence in his home country.
66. Having considered the observations of the parties, I am of the opinion that in circumstances such as those arising in the main proceedings such a refusal to recognise a licence cannot be justified on the basis of either art 8(2) of the directive or art 8(4).
- e 67. As far as art 8(2) of the directive is concerned, I note that it provides that where the holder of a valid national driving licence issued by a member state has taken up normal residence in another member state, the host member state may, subject to the observance of the principle of territoriality of criminal and police laws, apply its national provisions on the restriction, suspension, withdrawal or cancellation of the right to drive to the holder of the licence
- f and, if necessary, exchange the licence for that purpose.
68. In my opinion, these provisions of the directive, which do not apply only to exchanges of licences<sup>41</sup>, cover the situation where the holder of a licence is accused of committing a road traffic offence in the host member state and where the relevant authorities in that member state intend to impose on him a penalty by way of restriction, suspension, withdrawal or cancellation of the right to drive, whose effects would be limited to the member state concerned<sup>42</sup>.
- g 69. This is not the situation in which Mr Kapper finds himself in the main proceedings.
70. When the order was made in Germany for the withdrawal (equivalent to cancellation) of his licence, that punishment applied only to the German
- h licence which he had previously held, before obtaining the Netherlands licence in issue. The question does not arise in the main proceedings whether, under art 8(4) of the directive, the German authorities are entitled to order the withdrawal or cancellation of Mr Kapper's licence once again, this time in relation to his Netherlands licence. The only point at issue is whether the German authorities are entitled to refuse to recognise the validity of the
- i Netherlands licence. As with the residence condition, this question must be answered in the negative. It follows that Mr Kapper's Netherlands licence must 41 Contrary to what the order for reference assumes.

42 See, to that effect, the Commission's interpretative communication, cited in footnote 33, above, Pt II, para C.2.1.

be treated as valid, so that the offence with which he is charged (that of driving without a valid licence) cannot be sustained. As such an offence has not been committed, art 8(2) of the directive will not apply to the person concerned. a

71. In my opinion, contrary to what the German government contends, art 8(2) of the directive cannot be interpreted as meaning that a host member state is entitled to refuse to recognise a licence issued by another member state where, under the national rules (of the host member state in question) relating to the restriction, suspension, withdrawal or cancellation of the right to drive, the right to drive in that member state has been removed from the holder of the licence by reason of his previously having been banned from driving (by the authorities of that member state), even where that penalty has been fully executed and thus ceased to have effect. As will be seen, a broad interpretation of these provisions of the directive would make art 8(4) of the directive redundant. b

72. As regards the last-mentioned provisions of the directive, I am of the view that these should be narrowly interpreted, to mean that a member state is entitled to refuse to recognise a licence issued by another member state when the authorities of the first member state have imposed on the holder of the licence in question a measure which restricts, suspends, withdraws or cancels the right to drive only where such a measure has not been fully executed and its effects have not therefore been exhausted. There are several factors which support such an interpretation. d

73. First of all, as the Italian government observed, it follows from the wording of these provisions<sup>43</sup> that the option open to member states (to refuse to recognise the validity of a licence issued by another member state) applies only to the case of a person 'who is' in its territory the subject of one of the measures referred to above, which falls to be distinguished from a person 'who was' the subject of such measures. The use of the present, and not the past, tense clearly reflects the will of the Community legislature to limit the use of that option to measures removing or restricting the right to drive which are current, that is to say which remain enforceable. e

74. It should moreover be noted that the option given to member states under art 8(4) of the directive constitutes an exception to the principle of recognition of licences laid down in art 1(2). It follows under settled case law that art 8(4) of the directive should be interpreted narrowly. g

75. Lastly, it should be pointed out that the purpose of the directive is to establish a Community model licence and to introduce a system of mutual recognition of those licences without any requirement for exchange, in order inter alia to facilitate the movement of persons settling in a member state other than that in which they have passed a driving test<sup>44</sup>. The principle of mutual recognition of licences laid down in art 1(2) of the directive therefore constitutes the linchpin of the system established by the directive. For a member state to be entitled to rely on its national rules to refuse indefinitely or permanently to recognise a licence issued by another member state would run entirely contrary to this principle<sup>45</sup>. h a 76. I would also note that it is clear from the second paragraph of art 10 of the directive that where a member state wishes to adopt provisions under its national legislation intended to implement art 8(4) of the directive, it must obtain the prior agreement of the Commission. This requirement exists in order to ensure that the proposed national legislation complies with the terms of art 8(4) of the directive. For that reason, it is important that such an agreement is expressed in legally binding form, and is not limited to an implicit or informal understanding, as was the case with the German rules at issue in the main proceedings<sup>46</sup>.

<sup>44</sup> See the first recital in the preamble to the directive. The importance of the recognition of driving licences has been emphasised by the court as regards the freedom of movement of workers as well as the freedom of establishment and the freedom to provide services. See Skanavi's case (para 23), cited in footnote 26, above.

b 77. I am accordingly of the opinion that art 1(2) and art 8(4) of the directive should be interpreted as meaning that a member state is entitled to refuse to recognise a driving licence issued by another member state where the authorities of the first member state have imposed on the holder of the licence in question a measure which restricts, suspends, withdraws or cancels the right to drive only where such a measure has not been fully executed and its effects have therefore not been exhausted.

d V—CONCLUSION

78. In light of the foregoing considerations, I propose that the Court of Justice should answer as follows the questions referred for a preliminary ruling by the Amtsgericht Frankenthal, Pfalz:

e (1) The combined provisions of art 1(2), art 7(1)(b), art 8 and art 9 of Council Directive (EEC) 91/439 (on driving licences) are to be interpreted as meaning that a member state is not entitled to refuse to recognise a licence issued by another member state on the ground that in its opinion the holder of the licence in question had not taken up normal residence in the latter member state at the time when the licence was issued.

f (2) However, a member state is entitled under art 8(4) of the directive to refuse to recognise such a licence where the authorities of that member state have imposed on the holder of the licence in question a measure which restricts, suspends, withdraws or cancels the right to drive only where such a measure has not been fully executed and its effects have therefore not been exhausted.

g 29 April 2004. THE COURT OF JUSTICE (Fifth Chamber) delivered the following judgment.

h 1. By decision of 11 October 2001, corrected by letter of 19 December 2001, received at the Court of Justice of the European Communities on 7 and 24 December 2001 respectively, the Amtsgericht Frankenthal (Frankenthal Local Court), Germany, referred to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) a question on the interpretation of art 1(2) of Council Directive (EEC) 91/439 (on driving licences) (OJ 1991 L237 p 1), as amended by Council Directive (EC) 97/26 (OJ 1997 L150 p 41) (hereinafter Directive 91/439 or the directive).

i 2. That question was raised in criminal proceedings brought against Mr Kapper, who was sentenced to a fine for having driven a motor vehicle on <sup>46</sup> Moreover, in accordance with the first paragraph of art 10 of the directive, the Commission has already formalised its agreement in the form of a decision (Commission Decision (EC) 2000/275 (on equivalences between certain categories of driving licences) (OJ 2000 L91 p 1)). It will probably do the same with the agreement provided for under the second paragraph of art 10 of the directive.

20 November and 11 December 1999 without being in possession of a valid driving licence, although he held a driving licence issued by the Netherlands authorities on 11 August 1999. a

LEGAL BACKGROUND

Community legislation b

3. Article 1 of Directive 91/439 states:

‘1. Member States shall introduce a national driving licence based on the Community model described in Annex I or Ia, in accordance with the provisions of this Directive.

2. Driving licences issued by Member States shall be mutually recognized. c

3. Where the holder of a valid national driving licence takes up normal residence in a Member State other than that which issued the licence, the host Member State may apply to the holder of the licence its national rules on the period of validity of the licence, medical checks and tax arrangements and may enter on the licence any information indispensable for administration.’ d

4. Under art 7(1)(b) of that directive, driving licences are to be issued only to those applicants ‘who have their normal residence in the territory of the Member State issuing the licence, or can produce evidence that they have been studying there for at least six months’. e

5. Article 7(5) of that directive states that ‘No person may hold a driving licence from more than one Member State’.

6. Article 8(1) to (4) of the directive provides:

‘1. Where the holder of a valid national driving licence issued by a Member State has taken up normal residence in another Member State, he may request that his driving licence be exchanged for an equivalent licence; it shall be for the Member State effecting the exchange to check, if necessary, whether the licence submitted is in fact still valid. f

2. Subject to observance of the principle of territoriality of criminal and police laws, the Member States of normal residence may apply its national provisions on the restriction, suspension, withdrawal or cancellation of the right to drive to the holder of a driving licence issued by another Member State and, if necessary, exchange the licence for that purpose. g

3. The Member State effecting the exchange shall return the old licence to the authorities of the Member State which issued it and give the reasons for so doing.

4. A Member State may refuse to recognize the validity of any driving licence issued by another Member State to a person who is, in the former State’s territory, the subject of one of the measures referred to in paragraph 2. h

A Member State may likewise refuse to issue a driving licence to an applicant who is the subject of such a measure in another Member State.’ i

7. Article 9 of Directive 91/439 is worded as follows:

‘For the purpose of this Directive, “normal” residence means the place where a person usually lives, that is for at least 185 days in each calendar year, because of personal and occupational ties, or, in the case of a person a with no occupational ties, because of personal ties which show close links between that person and the place where he is living.

However, the normal residence of a person whose occupational ties are in a different place from his personal ties and who consequently lives in turn in different places situated in two or more Member States shall be regarded as being the place of his personal ties, provided that such person returns there regularly. This last condition need not be met where the person is living in a Member State in order to carry out a task of a definite duration. Attendance at a university or school shall not imply transfer of normal residence.'

b 8. The second paragraph of art 10 of the directive states:

c 'With the agreement of the Commission, Member States may make to their national legislation such adjustments as are necessary for the purpose of implementing the provisions of Article 8(4), (5) and (6).'

d 9. Article 12(1) of Directive 91/439 states that, after consulting the Commission of the European Communities, member states are, before 1 July 1994, to adopt the laws, regulations or administrative provisions necessary to comply with that directive as of 1 July 1996.

10. Article 12(3) of Directive 91/439 provides that the member states are to assist one another in the implementation of the directive and must, if need be, exchange information on the licences they have registered.

e National legislation

11. In the Federal Republic of Germany, the mutual recognition of driving licences which Directive 91/439 provides for was governed from 1 July 1996 to 31 December 1998 by the Verordnung zur Umsetzung der Richtlinie 91/439/EWG des Rates vom 29 Juli 1991 über den Führerschein und zur Änderung straßenverkehrsrechtlicher Vorschriften (Regulation on the transposition of Directive 91/439) of 19 June 1996 (BGB1 I, p 877) (hereinafter 'the EU-Führerschein-VO 1996').

f 12. Under the first subparagraph of art 1(4) of the EU-Führerschein-VO 1996, the right to drive a motor vehicle in Germany was not available to:

'... holders of a foreign driving licence:

g if when the licence was issued they had their permanent residence in the territory to which this regulation applies, unless they have been staying abroad for a minimum of six months for the sole purpose of attending a university or school,

h for so long as their driving licence has been provisionally withdrawn in the territory to which this regulation applies or for so long as they are unable to obtain a driving licence by reason of a decision of a court which is final, or i if in Germany an administrative authority has adopted an immediately enforceable or definitive decision withdrawing the driving licence or if the issue of a licence to such a holder has been definitively refused; the same shall apply if there was no withdrawal solely because the licence was surrendered in the meantime.'

13. The law which has applied since 1 January 1999 is the Verordnung über die Zulassung von Personen zum Straßenverkehr (Regulation on access to road traffic) of 18 August 1998, also called the Fahrerlaubnisverordnung (Regulation on the right to drive) (BGB1 I, p 2214) (hereinafter the FeV1999).

14. Paragraph 7 of the FeV 1999, which sets out the requirements as to normal residence for the grant of a driving licence, contains the national provisions which transpose arts 7(1)(b) and 9 of Directive 91/439. a

15. Paragraph 28 of the FeV 1999 provides:

'(1) The holders of a valid EU or EEA driving licence having their normal residence within the meaning of Paragraph 7(1) or (2) in the Federal Republic of Germany are authorised, subject to the restriction set out in subparagraphs (2) to (4), to drive motor vehicles in Germany to the extent to which they are qualified to do so. The conditions subject to which foreign driving licences are issued shall also have effect in Germany. The provisions of this regulation shall apply to those driving licences, save where the contrary is provided ... b

(4) The authorisation which is referred to in subparagraph (1) does not apply to the holders of an EU or EEA driving licence c

1. where the licence is provisional only, whether this is because they are learning to drive or for some other reason,

THE PROCEDURE IN THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND THE QUESTION REFERRED

16. Mr Kapper challenged a criminal order of the Amtsgericht of 17 March 2000. That court had sentenced him to a fine for having driven a motor vehicle in Germany on 20 November and 11 December 1999 without being the holder of a valid driving licence. At the time of the offence charged, Mr Kapper was the holder of a driving licence which had been issued to him by the Netherlands authorities on 11 August 1999. g

17. By a criminal order of 26 February 1998, the same court had withdrawn the German driving licence held by Mr Kapper and had instructed the administrative authorities not to issue him with a new licence before the expiry of a period of nine months, that is to say before 25 November 1998. h

18. According to the order for reference, no new driving licence has been issued to Mr Kapper in Germany since 25 November 1998. There is nothing in the documents before the court to indicate whether or not he has applied for such a licence to the German authorities since that date.

19. In the proceedings brought by Mr Kapper to have the order set aside, the Amtsgericht questions whether the German rules are compatible with Directive 91/439, while observing that if the court is not competent to determine that point, it is competent to decide whether Community law precludes the application of criminal provisions which penalise a breach of those rules. According to the national court, the national provisions must be i a interpreted as meaning that the driving licence issued in the Netherlands has no validity in Germany. It refers in that regard to the first indent of art 1(4) of the EU-Führerschein-VO 1996, which is in terms similar to para (4) of the FeV 1999, in force since 1 January 1999.

b 20. The national court also states that the application of the national rules implies verification of the residence of the holder of a licence at the time when it was issued by another member state. That means that the sovereign act of that state is submitted to review in Germany, and thus amounts to a restriction on the principle of the mutual recognition of driving licences issued by member states established by art 1(2) of Directive 91/439.

c 21. The Amtsgericht considers that art 8(1) to (4) of the directive does not provide an answer to the question raised in the main proceedings. According to the national court, that provision, which expressly authorises a member state to check the validity of a licence issued by another member state, applies only to the exchange of a valid licence, but does not authorise a member state to regard a sovereign act of another state as void.

d 22. In those circumstances, the Amtsgericht Frankenthal decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following question to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

e 'Does Article 1(2) of [Directive 91/439] preclude a Member State from refusing to recognise a driving licence where, according to its investigations, another Member State issued that licence although the holder of the licence did not have his normal residence there, and in appropriate cases is direct effect to be given to that provision in that regard?'

THE ADMISSIBILITY OF THE QUESTION REFERRED

f 23. The Netherlands government has expressed doubts as to the admissibility of the question referred. It submits that the order for reference does not provide sufficient information in relation to the facts of the case, to the relevant provisions of national law, or to the reason why an answer to the question is germane to the main proceedings. It is likely that at the time of the facts charged Mr Kapper's right to drive was still withdrawn. If so, it is of no relevance to know whether he did, or did not, possess a driving licence. It is thus also not relevant whether the German authorities were entitled to refuse to recognise the Netherlands driving licence which had been issued to g Mr Kapper or whether that licence had been issued unlawfully because he did not have his normal residence in the Netherlands at that time.

h 24. It should be observed in that regard that according to settled case law it is solely for the national courts before which actions are brought, and which must bear the responsibility for the subsequent judicial decision, to determine in the light of the special features of each case both the need for a preliminary ruling in order to enable them to deliver judgment and the relevance of the questions which they submit to the court. Consequently, where the questions referred involve the interpretation of Community law, the court is, in principle, obliged to give a ruling (see, inter alia, PreussenElektra AG v Schleswag AG (Windpark Reußenköge III GmbH, intervening) Case C-379/98 [2001] All ER (EC) 330, [2001] ECR I-2099 (para 38), Canal Satélite Digital SL v Administración General del Estado Case C-390/99 [2002] ECR I-607 (para 18), Adolf Truley GmbH v Bestattung Wien GmbH Case C-373/00 [2003] ECR I-1931 (para 21) and Arkkitehtuutoimisto Riitta Korhonen Oy v Varkauden Taitotalo Oy Case C-18/01 [2003] ECR I-5321 (para 19)).

25. Moreover, it follows from that case law that the court may decline to rule on a question referred for a preliminary ruling by a national court only where it is quite obvious that the interpretation of Community law that is sought bears no relation to the facts of the main action or its purpose, where the problem is hypothetical, or where the court does not have before it the factual or legal material necessary to give a useful answer to the questions submitted to it (see the PreussenElektra case (para 39), the Canal Satellite case (para 19), the Adolf Truley case (para 22) and the Arkkitehtuuritoimisto Riitta Korhonen case (para 20)).

26. That does not apply in the present case. It is true that the order for reference is expressed in very succinct terms, which do not make it clear, in particular, whether when Mr Kapper was charged by the police on 20 November and 11 December 1999 his right to drive in Germany was still withdrawn or restricted. Nevertheless, in response to the request for clarification addressed to it by the court under art 104(5) of the Rules of Procedure, the national court has stated that the ban on obtaining a new driving licence, with which the measure of 26 February 1998 withdrawing Mr Kapper's licence was coupled, expired on 25 November 1998. The national court has added that after that date Mr Kapper could have submitted a new request to the German authorities for the issue of a driving licence.

27. Moreover, it is clear from the written response of the German government to the questions put to it by the court that where there is a measure withdrawing (Entziehung) a driving licence which applies to a Community national having his normal residence in Germany, the national provisions relating to the consequences of that withdrawal apply in the same manner whether that person is the holder of or subsequently obtains a licence issued by the authorities of another member state. It follows that a foreign licence of that kind is not recognised by the German authorities.

28. Having regard to the additional information referred to above, the court has sufficient particulars on matters of fact and law available to it to answer the question referred to it in a useful manner.

29. It should also be noted that the succinct nature of the order for reference has not prevented the governments of the member states which have submitted observations to the court, or the Commission, from stating their views on the question referred.

30. The question referred by the Amtsgericht must therefore be declared to be admissible.

THE QUESTION REFERRED

31. Having regard to the facts of the main proceedings and what is stated in the observations submitted to the court, consideration of the question referred should not be limited to the matters expressly raised by the national court, but should also take into account several other provisions of Directive 91/439 which may be relevant to the answer to that question, in particular art 8(4) of the directive. In order to provide an answer to the question referred which is both useful and as complete as possible, the scope of the question should therefore be expanded.

32. The question should accordingly be restated and divided into two parts, which will be considered separately. The national court essentially asks, first, whether arts 1(2), 7(1)(b) and 9 of Directive 91/439, taken together, must be interpreted as meaning that they preclude a member state from refusing to recognise a driving licence issued by another member state on the ground that,

- a according to the information available to the first member state, the holder of the licence had, on the date on which it was issued, taken up normal residence in that member state and not in the member state in which the licence was issued. The national court asks, secondly, whether arts 1(2) and 8(4) of Directive 91/439, taken together, must be interpreted as meaning that they preclude a member state from refusing to recognise the validity of a driving
- b licence issued by another member state on the ground that its holder has, in the first member state, been subject to a measure cancelling or withdrawing the driving licence issued by that member state, where a temporary ban on obtaining a new licence with which that measure is coupled has expired before the date of issue of the licence issued by the other member state.

The first part of the question referred

33. According to the German government, Directive 91/439, having regard in particular to art 7(1)(b) thereof, must be interpreted as meaning that the
- d member state in which the holder resides may refuse to recognise a licence issued by another member state where the holder did not have his normal residence in the member state which issued the licence. The German government notes that the order for reference does not provide sufficient information to determine whether Mr Kapper did in fact have his normal residence in the Netherlands within the meaning of art 9 of the directive. In
- e any event, it argues that if that condition was not satisfied, the disputed Netherlands licence was void ab initio, or at least unlawful. In those circumstances, the Netherlands authorities ought not to have issued a driving licence, which, because of that mistake, would also not qualify for recognition. The German government notes that art 7(1)(b) of the directive expressly makes
- f the issue of a driving licence conditional on the holder having had his normal residence in the territory of the member state issuing that licence for a period of at least six months.

34. The Netherlands government submits, on the other hand, that it follows from the principle of mutual recognition laid down in art 1(2) of Directive 91/439 that a member state must recognise a valid driving licence issued by
- g another member state and that it is not entitled to check the circumstances in which it was issued. It observes that, in the case at issue in the main proceedings, the Netherlands authorities had determined that Mr Kapper had his normal residence in the Netherlands, and issued the licence to him. The German authorities are not entitled to review the legality of that decision and must therefore simply recognise the licence issued.

- h 35. In so far as the German rules impose conditions on the recognition of a valid licence issued by another member state, it is appropriate to consider whether art 1(2) of Directive 91/439 has direct effect. In that regard the Netherlands government points out that wherever the provisions of a directive appear, as far as their subject matter is concerned, to be unconditional and sufficiently precise, those provisions may be relied upon by an individual
- i against the state where the latter fails to implement the directive in national law by the end of the period prescribed or where it fails to transpose the directive correctly (see Criminal proceedings against Kolpinghuis Nijmegen BV Case 80/86 [1987] ECR 3969 (para 7)).

36. It submits that art 1(2) of the directive imposes a clear and precise obligation on member states to give mutual recognition to European model driving licences and not to require the holder of a licence issued by another member state to exchange it, whatever his nationality might be. That provision provides for mutual recognition, without any formality, of driving licences issued by member states (see Criminal proceedings against Skanavi Case C-193/94 [1996] All ER (EC) 435, [1996] ECR I-929 (para 26)). The directive does not give the member states to which it is addressed any freedom of action in relation to the measures requiring to be adopted in order to comply with those obligations. According to the Netherlands government, art 1(2) of the directive thus has direct effect (see Criminal proceedings against Awoyemi Case C-230/97 [1998] ECR I-6781 (para 43)).

37. Like the Netherlands government, the Commission notes that under art 1(2) of Directive 91/439 the mutual recognition of driving licences issued by the member states is not, in principle, linked to other conditions and should occur 'without any formality' (see Skanavi's case (para 26)). It is based on mutual trust in compliance with provisions that are already largely harmonised, given that the directive not only requires the mutual recognition of driving licences but also compliance with a number of minimum conditions and standards when those licences are issued.

38. While Directive 91/439 contains provisions allowing in exceptional cases refusal to recognise the validity of a driving licence, the host member state cannot automatically infer from the fact that it considers that a licence has been issued in another member state in breach of some of the conditions laid down in the directive that it is entitled to refuse to recognise the licence. That applies particularly where the authorities of a member state have established that a driving licence has been issued in breach of art 7(1)(b) of the directive to a person who did not, at the time of issue, satisfy the condition requiring a minimum period of residence of six months in the member state which issued that licence.

39. According to the Commission, in cases involving clear irregularities the authorities of the host member state may, in accordance with art 12(3) of the directive, seek clarification from the member state which issued the licence. If a state finds evidence of clear and systematic irregularities in the issuing of licences by the authorities of another member state, it may bring an action against that state under art 227 EC (formerly art 170 of the EC Treaty).

40. As regards the direct effect of art 1(2) of the directive, the Commission notes at the outset that the court has already confirmed, in para 43 of its judgment in Awoyemi's case that that provision is unconditional and sufficiently precise.

41. The Commission notes that, in so far as art 28 of the FeV 1999 applies to persons who have obtained a driving licence in a member state of the European Union or the European Economic Area other than Germany but who were resident in that country, that provision is incompatible with the principle of mutual recognition. However, it does not follow from that provision that the German authorities carry out systematic checks relating to possible breaches by other member states of the rules governing the issue of driving licences. According to the Commission, it is only when the German authorities become aware, on the basis of the information available to them, that the holder of a foreign licence did not satisfy the residence requirement under the directive because he was resident in Germany that those authorities refuse to recognise the licence in question.

42. The residence requirement serves in particular to prevent 'driving licence tourism'. It plays an important role in the current system since,

- a notwithstanding the progress made in the harmonisation of the national rules relating to driving licences, there are many areas (for example, period of validity and regular medical checks) where the rules vary from one member state to another. The residence requirement is a consequence of the fact that harmonisation is incomplete and will tend to become less important as the latter progresses, thereby permitting full implementation of the principle of mutual recognition.

43. According to the Commission, as long as the residence requirement remains in force, all member states must comply with it. It none the less remains the duty of a member state which issues or renews a licence to check that the requirement has been satisfied, and the other member states must respect the principle of mutual recognition.

- c 44. The Commission takes the view that the German legislation complies with both these requirements, although the point is a fine one. The restriction on the principle of mutual recognition which those rules impose appears justified. Moreover, the host member state cannot be obliged to overlook matters which have occurred within its own territory and which relate directly to the question where the person concerned resided at the time when he obtained his driving licence. The Commission refers in that regard to Van de Bijl v Staatssecretaris van Economische Zaken Case 130/88 [1989] ECR 3039 (paras 24–26).

Findings of the court

- e 45. The court has consistently held that art 1(2) of Directive 91/439 provides for mutual recognition, without any formality, of driving licences issued by member states (see Skanavi's case (para 26) and Awoyemi's case (para 41)). That provision imposes on member states a clear and precise obligation, which leaves no room for discretion as to the measures to be adopted in order to comply with it (see Awoyemi's case (para 42) and European Commission v Netherlands Case C-246/00 [2003] ECR I-7485 (para 61)).

- f 46. In its judgment in Commission v Netherlands, the court has thus already expressly dismissed the possibility of a host member state introducing systematic checks to verify that the requirement as to residence in the member state which issued the licence, laid down in arts 7(1)(b) and 9 of Directive 91/439, was properly complied with by the holders of driving licences issued by other member states. At para 75 of that judgment, it held, first, that it is for the authorities which issue driving licences to ensure that applicants have their normal residence in the state issuing the licence, and, secondly, that if a person holds a driving licence issued by a member state, that should be deemed to be proof that the licence holder has satisfied the conditions for the issue of a licence provided for in Directive 91/439. Accordingly, the host member state cannot then require the holder to prove again that he or she actually satisfied the conditions laid down in arts 7(1)(b) and 9 of Directive 91/439, without violating the principle of the mutual recognition of driving licences.

- h 47. It follows that the principle of mutual recognition of driving licences also means that when a host member state is carrying out a traffic check within its territory, it is precluded from refusing to recognise a driving licence issued by another member state to the driver of a vehicle on the ground that, according to the information available to the first member state, the holder of the licence in question had, at the date of its issue, established his normal residence in that member state and not in the issuing member state (see order in Da Silva Carvalho Case C-408/02 (2003) Transcript (order) 11 December (para 22)). As

Advocate General Léger has noted at para 44 of his opinion, the considerations set out in para 75 of the judgment in Commission v Netherlands, relating to a requirement that the holder of the driving licence must prove as a matter of course that he has satisfied the residence requirement in the context of a registration procedure relating to the licence in a member state which did not issue that licence, also apply to verification procedures or ad hoc investigations by that member state for the purpose of deciding whether to grant or to refuse recognition to that licence. a

48. Given that Directive 91/439 confers exclusive competence on the member state which issues a licence to ensure that driving licences are issued in compliance with the residence requirement set out in arts 7(1)(b) and 9 of that directive, it is for that member state alone to take appropriate measures in relation to driving licences held by persons who are subsequently shown to have failed to satisfy that requirement. Where a host member state has good reason to doubt the validity of one or more licences issued by another member state, it must so inform the latter under the rules relating to mutual assistance and the exchange of information contained in art 12(3) of that directive. Should the member state which issued the licence fail to take the appropriate measures, the host member state may bring proceedings against the first state under art 227 EC for a declaration by the court that there has been a failure to comply with the obligations arising under Directive 91/439. b

49. In the light of the above, the answer to the first part of the question referred must be that the provisions of arts 1(2), 7(1)(b) and 9 of Directive 91/439, taken together, must be interpreted as meaning that they preclude a member state from refusing to recognise a driving licence issued by another member state on the ground that, according to the information available to the first member state, the holder of the licence had, on the date on which it was issued, taken up normal residence in that member state and not in the member state in which the licence was issued. c

The second part of the question referred

Observations submitted to the court

50. Mr Kapper submits that the German provisions set out in para 28 of the FeV 1999 are incompatible with Directive 91/439. In adopting those provisions, the German legislature intended that, in certain circumstances, driving licences validly obtained in another member state should be deemed to be void and of no effect in Germany. Those provisions are contrary to the essence of the mutual recognition of measures adopted by the administrative authorities of the different member states. They even represent a retrograde step in relation to the law as it was in force prior to Directive 91/439, under which licences issued by other member states remained valid for at least 12 months where there was a change of residence. d

51. Mr Kapper accepts that Directive 91/439 lays down certain exceptions to the principle of mutual recognition enshrined in art 1(2). He refers in that regard to art 1(3), which provides that where there is a change of residence the host member state may apply its national rules in order to enter on the licence any information indispensable for administration. However, that provision does not entitle a member state simply to refuse to recognise a licence issued by another member state. As they involve exceptions to the principle of mutual recognition, those exceptions require in principle to be strictly interpreted. e

52. Nor does art 8 of the directive permit the German legislature to adopt the contested provisions. f

a 53. It relates exclusively to certain questions which arise when a licence is exchanged. In support of that interpretation, Mr Kapper notes that the wording of art 8(1), (2), (3) and (6) of Directive 91/439 expressly refers to various procedures which apply when a licence is exchanged. It would be illogical to treat the two remaining paragraphs of that article, paras (4) and (5), as containing rules of entirely general application which do not address issues arising in cases of exchange.

b 54. Mr Kapper accepts that the German authorities may refuse to recognise the validity of a foreign licence in Germany for so long as a measure such as a suspension or cancellation of the right to drive for a specified period is in force there. However, they certainly cannot do this once that period has expired.

c 55. Mr Kapper states that the absence of any limit on the duration of the effects of a provisional or final suspension or cancellation of a driving licence leads to unacceptable results. A German national whose German licence was withdrawn in that country and who had moved to another member state would not be entitled to use a driving licence issued by that member state when he returned to his country of origin, even if the new licence had been obtained several years after the withdrawal of the German licence. He would also not be permitted to obtain a German licence by reason of art 7(5) of the directive, quite apart from the fact that that state would have no power to issue him with one.

d 56. In addition, Mr Kapper argues that it is necessary to consider whether the Federal Republic of Germany has obtained the agreement of the Commission to the provisions in question, as art 10 of the directive requires.

e 57. The German government submits that Directive 91/439, in particular art 8(2) and (4) thereof, should be interpreted as meaning that the member state of residence is entitled to refuse to recognise a licence issued by another member state when the licence issued by the first state has been withdrawn.

f 58. The legislative context of Directive 91/439 means that the very general provisions set out in art 1(2) are insufficient in themselves to afford automatic and unconditional validity to foreign licences outside the member states which issued them. On the contrary, recognition is subject to the various conditions laid down in the detail of the directive, in particular arts 2 to 12 thereof.

g 59. The German government points out that art 8(2) of the directive expressly provides that the member state of normal residence may apply its national provisions on the withdrawal of the right to drive to the holder of a licence issued by another member state. Community nationals who have their normal residence in Germany are thus always subject to the German rules relating to the withdrawal of the right to drive, not only as regards licences issued by the German authorities, but also as regards those issued by the authorities of another member state.

h 60. Indeed, art 8(4) provides expressly that a member state may refuse to recognise the validity of any driving licence issued by another member state to a person whose licence has been withdrawn in the first state.

i 61. The German government does not agree with the strict interpretation of the national court, which takes the view that the provisions of art 8(2) and (4) apply only where a valid licence is exchanged. According to that government, it is clear on the contrary from the wording of art 8(2) that that provision applies where a licence is exchanged, but does not apply only in those circumstances.

62. As regards any direct effect that the directive may have, this could only arise if the provisions in question were sufficiently specific and had not been properly transposed into German law. It has been shown that para 28(4)(3) of the FeV 1999 transposes Community law in a manner which is precise and complete. a

63. In its written response to the questions put by the court, the German government has added that the Verordnung zur Änderung der Fahrerlaubnisverordnung und Straßenverkehrsrechtlicher Vorschriften (Regulation amending the Regulation on driving licences and other provisions relating to the right to drive) of 7 August 2002 (BGBl I, p 3267) (hereinafter the FeV 2002), which came into force on 1 September 2002, amended, inter alia, para 28 of the FeV 1999, by adding a new sub-para (5). The latter expressly permits the competent authorities to grant, on request, the right to use a driving licence in Germany which has been issued by another member state, where the reasons which justified its holder being subject to one of the measures referred to in sub-paras (3) and (4) of the same paragraph no longer exist. b

64. The Italian government, which intervened at the oral stage of the procedure, submits that art 8(4) of Directive 91/439 establishes the principle that national rules of criminal law which restrict the right to drive take precedence over the automatic recognition of driving licences issued by another member state. The provision seeks to avoid criminal sanctions involving the withdrawal of a driving licence being disregarded in the member state which imposed the sanctions by the use of another driving licence subsequently obtained in another member state, irrespective of whether that licence was validly issued. None the less, the wording of art 8(4) of the directive refers by implication to the current nature of the sanction in question. Having regard to the fact that the fundamental principle of the directive is the reciprocal and mutual recognition of driving licences, and that art 8(4) constitutes an exception to that principle, that provision must be strictly construed so as to mean that a member state cannot use it as a basis for refusing to recognise a licence issued by another member state where the measure restricting the right to drive is no longer in force. d

65. In its written observations, the Commission argues that it would be legitimate to base the refusal to recognise the Netherlands licence issued to Mr Kapper on the measure withdrawing the licence in Germany, as that is a measure listed in art 8(2) of Directive 91/439. The refusal would be compatible with art 8(4) of the directive, which was transposed into German law by para 28(4)(3) of the FeV 1999. g

66. According to the Commission, the provision does not apply only where a valid driving licence is exchanged. It naturally applies where the holder requests an exchange of his foreign licence. However, it does not apply only in such a case. That approach, which is contrary to the one adopted by the national court, is confirmed by the wording of art 8(2) and (4) of the directive. h

67. Moreover, a refusal to recognise a foreign licence in such narrow circumstances does not contradict the principle of mutual recognition laid down in art 1(2) of the directive, given that all member states have an interest in the national measures referred to in art 8(2) of the directive being respected. The final recital in the preamble to the directive should be interpreted in that way. The Commission also refers in that regard to the court's case law which provides that member states are entitled to take measures designed to prevent any of their nationals from attempting, under cover of the rights created by the EC Treaty, improperly to circumvent their national legislation or to prevent individuals from improperly or fraudulently taking advantage of provisions of i

- a Community law (see Centros Ltd v Erhvervs-og Selskabsstyrelsen Case C-212/97 [2000] All ER (EC) 481, [1999] ECR I-1459 (para 24)).

68. At the hearing, the Commission nevertheless took the view that the facts of the main proceedings, as they had become apparent from the clarifications supplied by the national court in response to the court's request, required it to supplement its observations on that point. Account should be taken of the fact that, according to those clarifications, the measure imposed in Germany which restricted the right to drive was limited to nine months and that, on the date on which the Netherlands licence was issued, Mr Kapper could, in theory, have requested that a new licence be issued to him in his country of origin. In light of those points, the Commission submits that art 8(4) of the directive should not be interpreted as meaning that it entitles a member state to continue to refuse to recognise any licence issued by another member state for an indefinite period extending beyond the time when the person concerned could have obtained a new licence in the first member state.

69. At the hearing, the Commission also supplemented the written answer it had provided to a question put by the court as to whether the Federal Republic of Germany had obtained the agreement referred to in the second paragraph of art 10 of Directive 91/439. The Commission gave its tacit consent to the provisions contained in para 28 of the FeV 1999, inasmuch as those provisions were notified to it and did not give rise to any objection on its part, unlike other provisions of the FeV 1999, which are the subject of infringement proceedings. The second paragraph of art 10 of the directive does not require the Commission to adopt formal decisions recording its express agreement to national provisions which are notified to it by member states.

Findings of the court

70. Inasmuch as the first paragraph of art 8(4) of Directive 91/439 permits a member state to refuse to recognise the validity of any driving licence issued by another member state if the holder is, in the first member state's territory, subject to a measure which restricts, suspends, withdraws or cancels the right to drive, it constitutes an exception to the general principle of the mutual recognition of driving licences issued by the member states laid down in art 1(2) of the directive.

71. As the first recital in the preamble to the directive makes clear, that principle was established in order to facilitate the movement of persons settling in a member state other than that in which they have passed a driving test. In that regard, the court has held that rules relating to the issue and mutual recognition of driving licences by the member states exert an influence, both direct and indirect, on the exercise of the rights guaranteed by the provisions of the Treaty relating to freedom of movement for workers, to freedom of establishment and to the freedom to provide services. In view of the importance of individual means of transport, possession of a driving licence duly recognised by the host state may affect the actual pursuit by persons subject to Community law of a large number of occupations for employed or self-employed persons and, more generally, freedom of movement (see Criminal proceedings against Choquet Case 16/78 [1978] ECR 2293 (para 4) and Skanavi's case (para 23)).

72. According to settled case law, the provisions of a directive which derogate from a general principle established by that directive must be strictly interpreted (see, as regards exceptions to the general principle that value added tax is to be levied on all services supplied for consideration by a taxable person, Ambulanter Pflegedienst Kügler GmbH v Finanzamt für Körperschaften I in Berlin Case C-141/00 [2002] ECR I-6833 (para 28) and, as regards exceptions to the general principle of recognition of professional qualifications giving the right to take up a regulated profession, Beuttenmüller v Land Baden-Württemberg Case C-102/02 (2003) Transcript (opinion), 16 September, (2004) Transcript (judgment), 29 April (para 64)). The same must apply a fortiori where that general principle aims to facilitate the exercise of fundamental freedoms guaranteed by the Treaty, such as those referred to in para 71 of this judgment. a

73. It should none the less be made clear that, contrary to the opinion expressed by the national court, art 8(4) of the directive does not apply only where an application is made to the authorities of a member state by the holder of a driving licence issued by another member state for the exchange of that licence. Although art 8 of the directive contains various provisions specifically regulating the substantive and formal conditions applicable to the exchange or replacement of a licence where the holder has submitted a request to that effect to the competent authorities, art 8(2) and (4) serves a different aim, namely that of permitting member states, within their territory, to apply their national provisions concerning the withdrawal, suspension and cancellation of driving licences. The exercise by the member states of the rights given to them by art 8(2) and (4) of the directive is thus not dependent on a voluntary act of the holder of a licence issued by another member state, such as an application for the exchange of that licence. It should be noted that, according to the court's case law, Directive 91/439 is expressly intended to abolish systems for exchanging driving licences and precludes a member state from requiring that driving licences that were not issued by its own authorities be registered or exchanged where the holders of those licences move to the territory of that state (see Commission v Netherlands (para 72) and order in Krüger (SA) v Directie van de rechtspersoonlijkheid bezittende Dienst Wegverkeer Case C-253/01 (2004) Transcript (order), 29 January (paras 30–32)). c d e

74. In the present matter, it is clear from the documents in the case and the observations submitted to the court that the national court must have regard in the main proceedings, inter alia, to the provisions of para 28(4)(3) and (4) of the FeV 1999. Those provisions, which apply where the holder of a licence has his normal residence outside the Federal Republic of Germany, preclude the German authorities from recognising the validity of a licence issued by another member state, where, in particular, a court in Germany has ordered that the licence be withdrawn. It appears that under the national rules a person in that situation may obtain a valid driving licence in Germany only if he submits a new request for a licence and satisfies the appropriate requirements and tests. However, since 1 September 2002, para 28(5) of the FeV 2002 expressly provides that the German authorities may permit the person concerned to use a licence issued by another member state where there no longer remain any grounds justifying the withdrawal of the licence or the temporary ban on obtaining a new licence. f g h

75. It is also clear from the papers in the case that the measure withdrawing or cancelling the licence imposed on Mr Kapper by the criminal order of 26 February 1998 was coupled with a temporary ban on obtaining a new licence, which expired on 25 November 1998. After that date, Mr Kapper was entitled, according to the national court, to request the German authorities to issue him with a new licence. In those circumstances, it must be held that when a new licence was issued to Mr Kapper by the Netherlands authorities on i

- a 11 August 1999 he was no longer subject, in Germany, to a temporary ban on applying to the competent authorities in the Federal Republic of Germany for the issue of a new licence.

b 76. According to art 8(4) of Directive 91/439, a member state may refuse to recognise the validity of any driving licence issued by another member state to a person who is the subject in that member state of one of the measures referred to in para (2) of that article. Given that that provision must be strictly interpreted, it may not be used by a member state as a basis for refusing indefinitely to recognise, in relation to a person who has been the object in its territory of a measure withdrawing or cancelling a previous licence issued by that state, the validity of any licence that may subsequently be issued to him by another member state. Where a temporary ban on obtaining a new licence with which the measure in question was coupled has already expired in a member state, the provisions of arts 1(2) and 8(4) of Directive 91/439, taken together, preclude that member state from continuing to refuse to recognise the validity of any driving licence subsequently issued to the person concerned by another member state.

c 77. That conclusion is not affected by the fact that the applicable national provisions, in particular those set out in para 28 of the FeV 1999, have as their specific aim the indefinite extension of the temporal effects of a measure withdrawing or cancelling a previous licence and the reservation to the German authorities of the right to issue a new licence. As Advocate General Léger noted at para 75 of his opinion, to allow a member state to rely on its national provisions in order to refuse indefinitely to recognise a licence issued by another member state would be fundamentally incompatible with the principle of the mutual recognition of driving licences which is the linchpin of the system established by Directive 91/439.

e 78. In light of all the foregoing considerations, the answer to the second part of the question referred must be that the provisions of arts 1(2) and 8(4) of Directive 91/439, taken together, must be interpreted as meaning that they preclude a member state from refusing to recognise the validity of a driving licence issued by another member state on the ground that its holder has, in the first member state, been subject to a measure withdrawing or cancelling the driving licence issued by that member state, where a temporary ban on obtaining a new licence, with which that measure is coupled, has expired before the date of issue of the licence issued by the other member state.

COSTS

h 79. The costs incurred by the German, Italian and Netherlands governments and by the Commission, which have submitted observations to the court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court.

i On those grounds, the Court of Justice (Fifth Chamber), in answer to the question referred to it by the Amtsgericht Frankenthal by order of 11 October 2001, corrected by letter of 19 December 2001, hereby rules:

(1) The provisions of arts 1(2), 7(1)(b) and 9 of Council Directive (EEC) 91/439 (on driving licences), as amended by Council Directive (EC) 97/26, taken together, must be interpreted as meaning that they preclude a member state from refusing to recognise a driving licence issued by another member state on the ground that, according to the information available to the first member state, the holder of the licence had, on the date on which it was issued, taken up normal residence in that member state and not in the member state in which the licence was issued. a

(2) The provisions of arts 1(2) and 8(4) of Directive 91/439, taken together, must be interpreted as meaning that they preclude a member state from refusing to recognise the validity of a driving licence issued by another member state on the ground that its holder has, in the first member state, been subject to a measure withdrawing or cancelling the driving licence issued by that member state, where a temporary ban on obtaining a new licence, with which that measure is coupled, has expired before the date of issue of the licence issued by the other member state. b

European Community – Equality of treatment of men and women – Equal pay for equal work – Pension – Occupational pension scheme – Teachers’ Superannuation Scheme – Membership of pension scheme restricted to teachers with contract of employment – Female claimant self-employed lecturer – Whether claimant entitled to claim access to pension scheme – Article 141(1) EC (formerly EC Treaty, art 119).

The claimant had been originally employed by the college as a part-time lecturer under a succession of one year contracts. She was paid an hourly rate.

As the college’s financial obligations had become increasingly onerous, the college decided that it would either terminate, or would not renew, contracts and would retain the services of its part-time lecturers as sub-contractors. The claimant was offered re-engagement through ELS, an agency. She thereby became self-employed and her pay was determined as a proportion of the fee agreed between ELS and the college. Her income fell and she lost a number of employment-linked benefits. The Secretary of State for Education and Employment administered an occupational pension scheme for teachers. The terms of the relevant national legislation restricted membership of the scheme to, inter alia, teachers with a contract of employment. The claimant brought proceedings against the college seeking, inter alia, a redundancy payment and redress for indirect sex discrimination by reason of the dismissal. She brought a further set of proceedings alleging, inter alia, that the Secretary of State was acting unlawfully in denying her access to the scheme. The redundancy claim was settled. Subsequently, the employment tribunal decided that, inter alia, her claim against the Secretary of State failed. The Employment Appeal Tribunal upheld that decision but granted the claimant permission to appeal on all issues. The Court of Appeal stayed the proceedings and referred two questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling: (i) whether art 141(1)<sup>a</sup> EC had direct effect so as to enable a woman to claim equal pay with a man in the circumstances of the instant case; and (ii) whether art 141 had direct effect so as to entitle the claimant to claim access to the scheme either: (a) by comparing herself with a named male comparator, (b) by showing statistically that a considerably smaller proportion of female than of male teachers who were otherwise eligible to join the scheme could comply with the requirement of being employed under a contract of employment, and by establishing that the requirement was not objectively justified.

<sup>a</sup> Article 141, so far as material, is set out at judgment paras 4, 5, below

Held — (1) In circumstances such as those in the main proceedings, art 141(1) had to be interpreted as meaning that a woman whose contract of employment with an undertaking had not been renewed and who was immediately made available to her previous employer through another undertaking to provide the same services was not entitled to rely, vis-à-vis the intermediary undertaking, on the principle of equal pay, using as a basis for comparison the remuneration received for equal work or work of the same value by a man employed by the woman's previous employer. Where the differences identified in the pay conditions of workers performing equal work or work of equal value could not be attributed to a single source, there was no body which was responsible for the inequality and which could restore equal treatment. Such a situation did not come within the scope of art 141(1). In the instant case, the fact that the level of pay received by the claimant was influenced by the amount which the college paid the ELS was not a sufficient basis for concluding that the college and ELS constituted a single source to which could be attributed the differences identified between the claimant's conditions of pay and those of a male worker paid by the college (see judgment paras 46, 48, 50, below).

(2) Article 141(1) had to be interpreted as meaning that a woman in circumstances such as those in the main proceedings was not entitled to rely on the principle of equal pay in order to secure entitlement to membership of an occupational pension scheme for teachers set up by state legislation of which only teachers with a contract of employment could become members, using as a basis for comparison the remuneration, including such a right of membership, received for equal work or work of the same value by a man employed by the woman's previous employer (see judgment para 57, below).

(3) In the absence of any objective justification, the requirement, imposed by state legislation, of being employed under a contract of employment as a precondition for membership of a pension scheme for teachers was not applicable where it was shown that, among the teachers who were workers within the meaning of art 141(1) and fulfilled all the other conditions for membership, a much lower percentage of women than of men was able to fulfil that condition. The formal classification of a self-employed person under national law did not change the fact that a person had to be classified as a worker within the meaning of that article if his independence was merely notional. In the case of teachers who were, vis-à-vis an intermediary undertaking, under an obligation to take an assignment at a college, it was necessary in particular to consider the extent of any limitation on their freedom to choose their timetable, and the place and content of their work. The fact that no obligation was imposed on them to accept an assignment was of no consequence in that context. In order to show that the precondition of membership constituted a breach of the principle of equal pay in the form of indirect discrimination, a female worker could rely on statistics showing that, among the teachers who were workers within the meaning of art 141(1) and fulfilled all the conditions for membership of the scheme except that of being employed under a contract of employment as defined by national law, there was a much higher percentage of women than of men. If that was the case, the difference of treatment concerning membership of the scheme at issue had to be objectively justified (see judgment paras 66, 71, 72, 75, 76, below).

(4) Article 141(1) had to be interpreted as meaning that where state legislation was at issue, the applicability of that provision vis-à-vis an undertaking was not subject to the condition that the worker concerned could

- a be compared with a worker of the other sex who was or had been employed by the same employer and who had received higher pay for equal work or work of equal value. A woman could rely on statistics to show that a clause in state legislation was contrary to art 141(1) because it discriminated against female workers. Where that provision was not applicable, the consequences were binding not only on the public authorities or social agencies but also on the employer concerned (see judgment paras 81, 84, below).

Reference

By order of 22 June 2001, the Court of Appeal (Civil Division) (England and Wales) referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) two questions (set out in judgment para 39, below) on the interpretation of art 141 EC (formerly art 119 of the EC Treaty). Those questions were raised in proceedings brought by Debra Allonby, who worked as a lecturer, against Accrington and Rossendale College (the College), Education Lecturing Services, trading as Protocol Professional (formerly Education Lecturing Service) and the Secretary of State for Education and Employment concerning equal pay for men and women. Written observations were submitted on behalf of: Ms Allonby by T Gill, Barrister, instructed by Michael Scott & Co, Solicitors; Education Lecturing Services, by D Pannick QC and P Nicholls, Barrister, instructed by K Legal, Solicitors; the United Kingdom government by G Amodeo, acting as agent, assisted by N Paines QC and M Hall, Barrister; the German government by W-D Plessing and R Stüwe, acting as agents; the Commission of the European Communities by J Sack and N Yerrel, acting as agents. Oral observations were made on behalf of: Ms Allonby, represented by T Gill and R Moretto, Barrister; Education Lecturing Services, represented by Lord Lester of Herne Hill QC; the United Kingdom government, represented by P Ormond, acting as agent, assisted by N Paines; and of the Commission, represented by N Yerrel. The language of the case was English. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General.

I—INTRODUCTION

1. A college of further education terminates the employment of its part-time, mostly female lecturers. It subsequently buys in their services again through the intermediary of an agency with which those lecturers are registered as self-employed persons. Through these arrangements the college seeks to achieve savings in operating costs. For the lecturers concerned the arrangements entail a diminution in emoluments in relation to those which they received under the original employment relationship with the college. In that context the following questions have arisen:

—whether the female lecturers concerned may compare themselves, in regard to their remuneration, including the conditions governing access to a pension scheme, with a male lecturer remaining in the service of the college, and

—whether the lecturers concerned may demand admission to the pension scheme where the condition restricting access to that scheme to lecturers who are employees of the college results in an objectively unjustified difference in treatment?

II—LEGAL FRAMEWORK

A—Community law

2. According to art 2 EC, the Community has the task of promoting, inter alia, equality between men and women.

a 3. The principle of equal pay for male and female workers for equal work or work of equal value is enshrined in art 141(1) EC (formerly art 119 of the EC Treaty). The first subparagraph of art 141(2) EC provides:

b 4. Under the first paragraph of art 1 of Council Directive (EEC) 75/117 (on the approximation of the laws of the member states relating to the application of the principle of equal pay for men and women)<sup>2</sup>:

c ‘The principle of equal pay for men and women outlined in Article 119<sup>3</sup> of the Treaty, hereinafter called “principle of equal pay”, means, for the same work or for work to which equal value is attributed, the elimination of all discrimination on grounds of sex with regard to all aspects and conditions of remuneration.’

d B—National law

5. In the United Kingdom, the principle of equal pay for men and women is laid down in the Equal Pay Act 1970, s 1 of which provides:

Requirement of equal treatment for men and women in same employment.—(1) If the terms of a contract under which a woman is employed at an establishment in Great Britain do not include (directly or by reference to a collective agreement or otherwise) an equality clause they shall be deemed to include one.

(2) An equality clause is a provision which relates to terms (whether concerned with pay or not) of a contract under which a woman is employed (the “woman’s contract”), and has the effect that ... (c) where a woman is employed on work which, not being work in relation to which paragraph (a) or (b) above applies, is, in terms of the demands made on her (for instance under such headings as effort, skill and decision), of equal value to that of a man in the same employment—(i) if (apart from the equality clause) any term of the woman’s contract is or becomes less favourable to the woman than a term of a similar kind in the contract under which that man is employed, that term of the woman’s contract shall be treated as so modified as not to be less favourable, and (ii) if (apart from the equality clause) at any time the woman’s contract does not include a term corresponding to a term benefiting that man included in the contract under which he is employed, the woman’s contract shall be treated as including such a term ...

(6) Subject to the following subsections, for purposes of this section—(a) “employed” means employed under a contract of service or of apprenticeship or a contract personally to execute any work or labour, and related expressions shall be construed accordingly ... (c) two employers are to be treated as associated if one is a company of which the other (directly or indirectly) has control or if both are companies of which a third person (directly or indirectly) has control, and men shall be treated as in the same employment with a woman if they are men employed by her employer or any associated employer at the same establishment or at establishments in Great Britain which include that one and at which common terms and conditions of employment are observed either generally or for employees of the relevant classes.’ a

3 Now, after amendment, art 141 EC.

6. The Pensions Act 1995 contains new provisions which the United Kingdom adopted as a result of the Court of Justice of the European Communities’ decision in Barber v Guardian Royal Exchange Assurance Group<sup>4</sup> and of a number of decisions which followed. Section 62 of that Act, which s 63(4) requires to be construed as one with s 1 of the 1970 Act, provides in its first four subsections: b

‘62. The equal treatment rule.—(1) An occupational pension scheme which does not contain an equal treatment rule shall be treated as including one. c

(2) An equal treatment rule is a rule which relates to the terms on which—(a) persons become members of the scheme, and (b) members of the scheme are treated. c

(3) Subject to subsection (6), an equal treatment rule has the effect that where—(a) a woman is employed on like work with a man in the same employment, (b) a woman is employed on work rated as equivalent with that of a man in the same employment, or (c) a woman is employed on work which, not being work in relation to which paragraph (a) or (b) applies, is, in terms of the demands made on her (for instance under such headings as effort, skill and decision) of equal value to that of a man in the same employment, but (apart from the rule) any of the terms referred to in subsection (2) is or becomes less favourable to the woman than it is to the man, the term shall be treated as so modified as not to be less favourable. d

(4) An equal treatment rule does not operate in relation to any difference as between a woman and a man in the operation of any of the terms referred to in subsection (2) if the trustees or managers of the scheme prove that the difference is genuinely due to a material factor which—(a) is not the difference of sex, but (b) is a material difference between the woman’s case and the man’s case.’ e

7. The occupational pension scheme for teachers is contained in the Teachers’ Superannuation Scheme 1988 (TSS) and is governed by the Teachers’ Superannuation (Consolidation) Regulations 1988, SI 1988/1652, and the Teachers’ Superannuation (Amendment) Regulations 1993, SI 1993/114 (TSS regulations). The TSS is administered by the Secretary of State for Education and Employment. Under the rules governing the TSS teachers employed under a contract of employment, whether full-time or part-time, are eligible to join this pension scheme. f

III—FACTS OF THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND COURSE OF THE PROCEDURE g

8. This reference is made in proceedings between Ms Allonby, on the one hand, and Accrington and Rossendale College (the College), Education Lecturing Services Ltd (ELS) and the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (the Secretary of State), on the other. The proceedings arise out of the dismissal, by non-renewal of their contracts of employment, of a number of hourly-paid lecturers employed by the College, including Ms Allonby, and the College’s decision thenceforth to engage hourly-paid h a lecturers only through ELS, which offered lecturers the possibility of being registered as self-employed persons for teaching assignments at institutes of further education.

b 9. Ms Allonby was originally employed by the College as a part-time lecturer in office technology. She was employed from 1990 to 1996 on a succession of one-year contracts under which she was paid by the hour at a rate determined by the level at which she was teaching. It is not disputed that for present purposes these were continuous contracts of service, carrying with them an employer's statutory obligations.

c 10. By 1996, those obligations had become financially more onerous for the employer because of legislative changes which required part-time lecturers to be accorded equal or equivalent benefits to full-time lecturers. The College employed 341 part-time lecturers. In order to reduce its overheads it decided not to renew their contracts of employment and instead to retain their services as sub-contractors. Ms Allonby's employment was terminated with effect from 29 August 1996. She was informed that she could continue to offer lecturing services at the College as a sub-contractor. To that end she was required to d register with ELS. ELS is a company limited by guarantee which operates as an agency, on a commission basis, and holds a database of available lecturers on whom colleges can call, by name if they wish, for lecturing services. Ms Allonby, and others like her who had to register with ELS in order to continue to work as part-time lecturers, thereby became self-employed. Their pay was a proportion of the fee agreed between ELS and the College. e Their income fell and they lost a series of benefits attached to their earlier employment. The College, which like most further education colleges was in financial straits, estimated that it would thereby save £13,000 a year.

f 11. Of the 341 hourly-paid part-time lecturers who were made redundant by the College and were offered the opportunity of again working through the intermediary of ELS in 1996, 110 were men and 231 were women. Also in 1996 the College had 105 full-time salaried lecturers, of whom 55 were men and 50 women and 23 part-time salaried lecturers of whom 12 were men and 11 women.

g 12. The relationship between men and women on hourly-paid part-time contracts with the College in 1996 reflected the national picture in the United Kingdom, where part-time work is overwhelmingly done by women. On the other hand, ELS' database contained almost as many men as women: 18,050 to 19,909 on the most recent count available to the tribunal of first instance in this case, a difference of less than 5%.

h 13. In August 1996 Ms Allonby, supported by her union, brought proceedings against the College. She sought a redundancy payment and claimed that her dismissal was unfair on the basis of unlawful discrimination on the ground of sex. In December 1996 she brought three further sets of proceedings against:

—the College on the ground that it was discriminating against her as a contract worker contrary to the Sex Discrimination Act 1975;

—ELS on the ground that it was obliged by law to pay her equally—that is, pro rata—with a male full-time lecturer at the College; and i —the state, represented by the Department for Education and Employment, on the ground that it was acting unlawfully in denying her access, as a self-employed worker, to the TSS.

It appears from the case file in the main proceedings that both groups of proceedings are in the nature of a test case for others similarly affected.

14. The redundancy claim was settled. In a decision of 20 August 1997, the employment tribunal decided, as a preliminary issue, that Ms Allonby was not entitled to use as a comparator for equal pay purposes a male lecturer employed full-time by the College. In a series of decisions of 8 July 1998 that tribunal decided that Ms Allonby's dismissal by the College was unfair but attracted no redress, and that it constituted indirect sex discrimination but was justifiable. It also dismissed the claim against the Department for Education and Employment concerning access to the TSS, as well as the claim under s 9 of the 1975 Act on the basis that all the service providers made available by ELS to the College, whether women or men, were treated alike. All those decisions were upheld in March 2000 in a group of interlocking judgments by the Employment Appeal Tribunal (United Kingdom) which, however, granted Ms Allonby leave to appeal on all issues.

15. Before the Court of Appeal it was contended on behalf of Ms Allonby that: (a) her dismissal by the College constituted unlawful indirect sex discrimination: this issue was remitted to the employment tribunal for reconsideration; (b) the College, by thereafter denying her benefits available to salaried lecturers, was discriminating against her as a contract worker on the ground of her sex, this issue was also remitted for reconsideration by the employment tribunal; (c) ELS was required to pay her equally with a male lecturer employed at the College: this question forms part of the subject matter of the present reference; and (d) her exclusion from the TSS constitutes unlawful sex discrimination: this question is also referred for a preliminary ruling (see [2001] EWCA Civ 529, [2001] IRLR 364, [2001] ICR 1189).

16. As for claims (c) and (d), the referring court makes the following observations (paras 17–20).

17. Against ELS Ms Allonby claims that art 141 EC entitles her, when she works at the College, to a rate of remuneration equal to that of a male lecturer employed by the College on work which is to be taken to be of equal value. Ms Allonby seeks against ELS a rate of pay equal to that of employed lecturers at the College by means of a comparison with a named teacher, Mr Ross Johnson.

18. The circumstances material to that equal pay claim are that: (a) Ms Allonby and Mr Johnson undertake lecturing work of presumptively equal value at the College although not always on the same site; (b) Mr Johnson is employed by the College as a lecturer and is paid by the College at a rate set by the College; (c) Ms Allonby is engaged by ELS on a self-employed basis, she works on specific assignments agreed by her with ELS, at the College or elsewhere; (d) the College agrees with ELS the fee which it will pay for each lecturer. ELS agrees with Ms Allonby the fee which she is to receive for each assignment and sets the conditions under which its lecturers are to work, the College has no direct control over ELS in those or other matters; and (e) the College and ELS employ both male and female staff.

19. Against ELS, the College and the Secretary of State Ms Allonby claims access to the TSS either (i) by comparison with a male lecturer employed by the College or (ii) since the TSS was set up pursuant to statute, without such comparison if she can show statistically that a considerably smaller proportion of female than of male teachers who are otherwise eligible to join the TSS can comply with the requirement of being employed under a contract of employment. Neither the existence of such proof nor the question of objective justification has yet been determined by the courts in the present case. However, the Court of Appeal considers that the least inconvenient course a from a procedural point of view is to refer the question to the Court of Justice and then, if the answer makes it appropriate, to order the material facts to be found.

20. The circumstances material to Ms Allonby's pension claims are that: (a) the TSS was set up by the Secretary of State under powers conferred by primary legislation; (b) it is a condition of membership of the TSS that the member be an employee and be engaged as a teacher in a specified category of educational institution, the College is in one of these categories; (c) no self-employed person is eligible to be a member of the TSS; (d) the TSS provides old age pensions and other benefits calculated principally by reference to the duration of the member's employment and to a reference salary earned in employment to which the TSS relates, which need not have been the same employment throughout but must have been at eligible establishments; (e) the rates of pay which determine the level of benefits under the TSS may differ between employers; (f) the benefits payable under the TSS are funded by contributions from the members of the TSS and their employers; and (g) no lecturer engaged by ELS is engaged as an employee. In consequence none is eligible for membership of the TSS.

The questions submitted for a preliminary ruling

21. By order of 23 March 2001, which was received at the court on 3 July 2001, the Court of Appeal referred the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

e '(1) Does Article 141 EC have direct effect so as to enable a woman to claim equal pay with a man in the circumstances of this case?

(2) Does Article 141 EC have direct effect so as to entitle Ms Allonby to claim access to the pension scheme either (i) by comparing herself with Mr Johnson or (ii) by showing statistically that a considerably smaller proportion of female than of male teachers who are otherwise eligible to join the TSS can comply with the requirement of being employed under a contract of employment, and by establishing that the requirement is not objectively justified?' f

Procedure before the court

g 22. In the procedure before the court written observations were submitted by Ms Allonby, ELS, the United Kingdom government, the German government and the Commission of the European Communities. Ms Allonby, ELS, the United Kingdom government and the Commission provided further clarification of their views at the hearing on 28 January 2003.

h IV—ASSESSMENT

The first question submitted for a preliminary ruling

i 23. Ms Allonby argues that the facts at issue in the present case are representative of a development in employment relationships of major importance to the effectiveness of the principle enshrined in art 141 EC of equal treatment of men and women in the employment market. It has become increasingly common for employers to contract out some of their work to sub-contractors or recruitment agencies. The workers engaged in connection with contracted-out work customarily work in the same undertaking, establishment or department as workers who have continued to be employed by that undertaking and are frequently engaged on work comparable to that done by such employees. However, remuneration which they receive in that connection may be considerably lower, whilst their status may also differ in the sense that in the performance of individual services they carry on their activities as self-employed persons instead of as employees. Unfavourable consequences may be attached to that difference in status for persons performing contracted-out activities as self-employed persons. a

24. If employers adopt the practice of contracting out activities which are performed predominantly by women with the attendant unfavourable consequences on remuneration, the effect is that the protection afforded by art 141 EC is lost if that provision cannot—any longer—be relied on in such a situation. That is all the more so if employers specifically resort to such arrangements in order to evade the consequences of the principle of equal pay laid down in art 141 EC. Therefore it is essential for Ms Allonby that art 141 EC be so construed as to retain its effectiveness also in situations in which establishments, departments or undertakings contract out their activities wholly or in part. b

25. Ms Allonby stresses that in the present case the College terminated the employment of part-time staff in order subsequently to re-engage them indirectly, via ELS. In that way the College saves costs attendant on applying legislation concerning the equal treatment of part-time employees. She points out that she continues to perform the same work at the College but under substantially less favourable terms than the comparator selected by her. She further considers that under those circumstances she must be able to compare her work and pay with that comparator. d

26. She adds that the fact that the direct employer, ELS, and the indirect employer, the College, are according to national law two separate legal entities does not of itself preclude the application of art 141 EC. Unlike under s 1(6)(c) of the 1970 Act where the comparator must be employed by the same employer or an associated employer in the same undertaking or group of undertakings, that requirement is not to be found in the court's case law. She considers that in order to give full effect to the principle of equal pay for men and women for equal work she must be able to plead the work performed and the pay received by men and women in the same establishment or service, irrespective of who the employer is and with there being no requirement that it must be the same employer. For under the judgment in Defrenne II<sup>5</sup> it is sufficient that a woman and a male comparator are 'in the same establishment or service'. In the present case both she and Mr Johnson work in the same establishment. f

27. At the hearing it was stated on behalf of Ms Allonby that it is to be inferred from the recent judgment in Lawrence v Regent Office Care Ltd<sup>6</sup> that in order for reliance to be placed on art 141 EC the difference in treatment must be attributable to a single source. The court did not state that the operation of art 141 EC is confined to men and women who work for the same employer. In Lawrence's case the difference was not attributable to a single source. Ms Allonby asserts that in the present case it is so attributable. For the source of the discrimination is the College when it took its decision to use ELS as an intermediary. She was thereby required, if she wished to continue to lecture at the College, to register with ELS as a self-employed person. Subsequently, the College was able to avail itself via ELS more cheaply of her services. However, h a she still actually works for the College and subject to the direction and instructions of that establishment. In Ms Allonby's view, the fact that ELS is not in itself the source of the discrimination does not preclude the applicability of art 141 EC. For that provision is also applicable where the source of the discrimination is the management of a group of undertakings, a collective labour agreement or a legislative provision. In all those cases the source of the discrimination is outside the purview of the individual employer yet he must in the final analysis pay more to his female employees if discrimination is found.

b 28. Another feature, according to Ms Allonby, which distinguishes the present case from Lawrence's case is that that case concerned the transfer of an undertaking. Nor in that case was it established that the transfer of employees was such as to enable the council to prevent the unequal treatment. Nor after the transfer could the council any longer determine the individual wages of the transferred employees. However, the present case does not concern the transfer of an undertaking. Moreover, by virtue of its agreement with ELS the College indeed is able to influence the level of the fee paid by ELS to Ms Allonby. For within the scale applied by ELS for various categories the College and ELS agree an hourly rate for lecturers working at the College. Thus under the agreement with ELS the College has a powerful influence on a lecturer's pay. In its contractual relationship with ELS the College is said to be obliged to apply the principle of equal pay for equal work to men and women working for it and at its schools, regardless of whether they are directly employed or indirectly work for it under the agreement with ELS.

c 29. According to ELS, the United Kingdom government, the German government and the Commission art 141 EC does not have direct effect in the present case.

d 30. ELS points out that discrimination in the matter of pay can exist only if it is possible to identify a discriminator, that is to say, a source which can be held responsible for the difference in pay as between men and women. That source may be an individual legal person or even a number of legal persons provided they are subject to common control. However, if the latter requirement is not satisfied and the separate entities pay different rates to their respective employees, there is no basis for a claim to equal pay under art 141 EC. Only where the different rates of pay are from a single source can the court identify whether the reason for that difference is the sex of the complainant, and only where there is a common employer can the complainant's employer explain why there is a difference in pay.

e 31. ELS points out that it offers services to educational establishments in the whole of the United Kingdom. The lecturers who register with it may state their preference for a specific College and may indicate the periods when they are available. One of the conditions applied by ELS is that the lecturers registered with it work on assignments as self-employed persons. A lecturer is under no obligation to accept a specific assignment. ELS and the lecturer agree a fee for each assignment accepted by the lecturer. A lecturer may accept assignments with several educational establishments. ELS agrees annually with each educational establishment a fee for the services to be provided. The amount thereof is determined on a commercial basis. Finally, ELS points out that the College has no influence on the fee paid by ELS to Ms Allonby and also that ELS has no influence on the remuneration paid by the College to Mr Johnson.

f 32. ELS explains that, although all the lecturers registered in its database carry out their assignments as self-employed persons, ELS is regarded as the employer in connection with claims under the 1970 Act. That is owing to the definition of 'employed' in s 1(6)(a) of that law. That definition also encompasses agreements personally to execute any work or labour. That is why Ms Allonby also brought a claim against ELS although ELS has no charge of discrimination to answer.

33. ELS further points out that the aim of art 141 EC, namely equal pay, requires an analysis of the pay provided by an employer to its male and female workforce<sup>7</sup>. Nor may the concept of pay be interpreted so as to refer to the salaries paid by different employers. In that connection ELS points out that a central element of the concept of pay under the court's case law is that a benefit arose from an employment relationship<sup>8</sup>.

34. ELS points out that Ms Allonby is holding ELS and not her ex-employer responsible for the difference in pay between her and the male comparator employed by the College. If Ms Allonby's claim is conceded the practical consequences go much further than the facts of the present case. That means, inter alia, that she must be allowed to compare herself with a male comparator when working in another educational establishment. The consequences for management consultants offices and other intermediaries providing services cannot be overlooked.

35. The United Kingdom government also points to such consequences which were not intended by art 141 EC. A pay rise agreed by an employer with his staff could automatically trigger a claim on the basis of unequal pay in the case of another employer, unless that employer also raises the salaries of its staff. Moreover, one employer may not be aware of such pay rises, irrespective of the desirability of such disclosure, particularly in the private sector. For agencies providing staff that would mean that they would be required to pay their staff the same salary as that paid by the client to its staff. Thus an agency could not supply staff until it had ascertained levels of salary and other conditions of employment—including health insurance or sickness benefits often paid by a third party—provided by that client. The agency would then have to ensure the same level of salary for all its staff, irrespective of the client. Conversely, an employee of the client could claim the same salary as that paid to agency staff.

36. The German government points out that if art 141 EC were also to have direct effect in regard to pay differences as between different employers the consequence of that would be that the freedom of collective wage bargaining between workers and employers' organisations would be significantly reduced.

37. In its written observations the Commission put forward two alternatives. The first consists in deeming the College still to be the employer rather than ELS. The arrangement conceived of by the College must be disregarded. This merely serves in order to avoid a direct contractual relationship with Ms Allonby in order thus to circumvent the relevant employment legislation. However, at the hearing the Commission announced that it was abandoning this line of argument. None the less, the Commission considers it unsatisfactory that an employer can significantly reduce rights conferred on employees under art 141 EC (or other employment legislation) but at the same

a time is of the view that the solution to that problem is not to be found in an artificial extension of art 141 EC such as the deeming of a notional employer with all the problems which that entails.

b 38. The second alternative finally opted for by the Commission entails that, irrespective of whether ELS is not the employer within the meaning of art 141 EC, a comparison between 'employees' and 'self-employed persons' is not possible under art 141 EC. For the latter category does not come within the scope of that article. The right to equal pay can extend only to workers whose situation is governed by the same entity as that of the comparator, since it is only in that case that there is a common source of pay discrepancy. It is inherent in the notion of discrimination that there is ultimately a single source which causes or is responsible for the difference in treatment.

Assessment

d 39. In my assessment I am proceeding from the starting-point that Ms Allonby continues to work at the same College, albeit as a self-employed person via ELS and performs the same work there as before. Is she entitled as a self-employed person to compare herself with an employee of that College whom I am assuming performs equivalent lecturing duties? Ms Allonby takes the view that the reply must be affirmative. The fact that from a formal point of view the employers are different is in her view not relevant. Moreover, she is demanding that equal pay from ELS. I will deal with these matters separately.

e 40. In the recent Lawrence<sup>9</sup> judgment the court noted that there is nothing in the wording of art 141(1) EC to suggest that the applicability of that provision is limited to situations in which men and women work for the same employer. To that extent a comparison between her and a comparator at the College would thus be possible.

f 41. However, the court also held in that judgment, as I also stated in my opinion in that case, that where the differences identified in the pay conditions of workers performing equal work or work of equal value cannot be attributed to a single source, there is no body 'which is responsible for the inequality and which could restore equal treatment'<sup>10</sup>. Such a situation does not come within the scope of art 141(1) EC.

g 42. If that judgment is applied to the present case the following picture emerges. It is apparent from the order for reference and the case file that Ms Allonby carries out assignments in the context of her agreement with ELS for the provision of services. Indeed she carries out those assignments at the College where her comparator is employed but there is no longer any employment relationship between her and the College. As established by the referring court, that was brought to an end by termination of her employment.

h Furthermore, the College and ELS apply different working conditions which are determined independently of each other. In that connection ELS determines the remuneration payable to Ms Allonby and the College determines Mr Johnson's remuneration. Although Ms Allonby and Mr Johnson give lectures at the same College the difference in pay between them is not attributable to a single source. On the basis of the case law mentioned above i art 141 EC is not applicable to that situation with the result that Ms Allonby cannot base a claim against ELS or, possibly, the College on a comparison with Mr Johnson.

43. I could confine myself to this finding which is undeniably supported by the court's case law in Lawrence's case. However, the question is whether the courts must turn a blind eye to the fact that in the circumstances of the main proceedings a legal device has been used precisely, it should be noted, in order to evade the consequences of the principle of equal treatment laid down in art 141 EC. A change in the legal form of the relationship between Ms Allonby and her original employer, the College, thus results in the loss of the protection conferred by art 141 EC on Ms Allonby as a female employee. a

44. We are here confronted with an illustration of a broader evolution which is emerging in employment relations in the European Community, albeit in a more pronounced fashion in some member states than in others. On the one hand, it entails that employers are increasingly contracting out to specialised contractors or undertakings more and more activities which they do not regard as central to their undertaking. As the expression of a progressive specialisation in the economy this development should not per se be regarded as undesirable from a social or societal point of view. On the other hand, the phenomenon is emerging whereby in certain occupations the classic employer-employee relationship under an employment contract is being supplanted by contractual arrangements for the provision of services under which the providers of the services operate as self-employed persons. In this connection also the advantages of technical and functional specialisation and diversification mean that this is in principle not an undesirable development from a social or societal point of view. b

45. None the less, the legal arrangements instituted as a result of these developments may also be used to evade the consequences of employment-protection legislation or, as in the case of art 141 EC, legislation which seeks to give effect to fundamental legal principles in regard to the employment market. The facts underlying the present case, as they incontestably appear in the case file of the main proceedings, strongly point in that direction. Ms Allonby's work as a lecturer and the environment in which since August 1996 she has continued to exercise her professional activities are substantively little changed: she operates under the direction and responsibility of the College which moreover continues to be entrusted with the organisation of her activities. The College remains liable to its students for the quality of the teaching given by her. In brief in all her activities she is de facto bound by the instructions of the management of the College as principal. There is however one significant difference. Her remuneration for her work as a sub-contractor is received from ELS which is contractually bound to deliver the educational services required by the College. c

46. Incidentally I would observe that both ELS and the United Kingdom government concede by implication that the changes which have occurred since August 1996 in Ms Allonby's legal position have had very little effect on her functions as a lecturer at the College. d

47. The Commission has identified the dilemma arising in this case, namely whether the alteration which has occurred in Ms Allonby's legal position furnishes a ground for widening the court's case law concerning the attributability of indirect discrimination to a single source, or whether the legislature should take action against legal devices whose effect is that the protection afforded to persons by art 141 EC may be undermined. e

48. In its written observations the Commission expressed an initial preference for a judicial solution. It initially asserted that the College, although no longer formally the employer, could still be regarded as such for the purposes of f a art 141 EC. The idea behind this was to counter what it regards as a misuse of law where employers who dismiss their part-time staff subsequently make use of their services again via an agency, thus seeking to evade the relevant employment-protection legislation, such as equal pay for equal or equivalent work and other social rights conferred on part-time employees. Such 'misuse' could undermine the operation of the principle of equality laid down in art 141 EC. Accordingly, in cases such as this the decisive factor should not be the legal relations between the original employer and his part-time employees, but the factual relations which none the less remain unaltered.

b 49. At the hearing the Commission expressly distanced itself from this idea based on a legal fiction. First, there is no common source, within the meaning of Lawrence's judgment, which could be held responsible for the difference in treatment and could correct that difference. For the termination of employment is a fact; there is therefore no longer any link from the point of view of employment law between the College and Ms Allonby which could serve as the basis for restoring equality in terms of pay conditions. The question then arises as to how long the legal fiction could be used in order to hold the original employer responsible for differences in pay. For by the simple effluxion of time variations in conditions of pay may increase further. Initially the Commission sought to attribute liability to the body which in its view could be held responsible from the outset for the difference occurring, namely the College when it decided to restructure its organisation. The problem in that connection is that the College cannot be held entirely responsible for the difference occurring between Ms Allonby and her comparator. For the fee which Ms Allonby receives for the services provided by her is agreed between her and ELS. The College cannot be held liable for that even if it endeavours in its relations with ELS to ensure that equivalence is maintained as between the remuneration paid to its employees and the sub-contractors engaged by ELS. Moreover, it goes without saying that over time maintenance of parity in pay conditions becomes more difficult. This may be accounted for again by the lack of a single source which could be held liable for preserving and restoring parity.

c 50. I would further point out that in the main proceedings Ms Allonby addressed her claim to ELS. I cannot share the view put forward on Ms Allonby's behalf at the hearing that there is a single source to which the difference in pay may be attributed (the College) and that she must therefore be able to compare herself with Mr Johnson in order to be able to succeed in her claim for equal pay against ELS. The cause of the difference in the pay received by Ms Allonby when she was employed by the College and the pay which she now receives for her assignments from ELS may perhaps be attributable to the College but certainly not to ELS. In the words of the court ELS is therefore not the 'body which is responsible for the inequality and which could restore equal treatment'<sup>11</sup>. On any other view the result would be that one employer (ELS) would have to bear the consequences attributable to another employer (the College) without there being any connection between the body responsible for the inequality and the body required to restore equal treatment.

d 51. In my view the Commission was correct to point out that in the present case it was the termination of employment itself which was open to challenge on the ground that the projected restructuring of legal relations with the part-time staff produced unequal effects for women. Indeed it was challenged in the present case and Ms Allonby obtained certain satisfaction.

11 My emphasis.

52. Finally, the Commission pointed out that the nub of the problem lies in the fact that working relations are becoming more flexible. Legislative action is required in order to counter the effects of that development which are undesirable from the point of view of social protection. In that connection it has announced a directive which seeks to afford to workers engaged by employment agencies greater protection by analogy with staff in stable employment. a

53. I share the view taken by the Commission in this connection, though it is not easy to accept. The unmistakeable phenomenon within the Community of a shift away from traditional employment relationships to more flexible arrangements, such as forms of self-employment, raises the more general question as to the consequences to be drawn from that phenomenon by the Community legislature concerning the specific protection conferred by Community law on workers whether employed or self-employed. The principle of equal treatment, laid down as a fundamental legal principle in art 13 EC (formerly art 6a of the EC Treaty) and art 141 EC and arts 21(1) and 23 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union (OJ 2000 C364 p 1), is an essential feature of that protection. That justifies specific action by the Community legislature under art 141(3) EC. In my view such action may precede other measures to ensure the protection of workers for which under art 137(2)(b) [sic] unanimity in the Council is required. b

54. I therefore conclude that, as Community law currently stands, in the circumstances of the main proceedings no reliance can be placed on art 141 EC in order for women to claim equal pay with men. c

55. In its second question the referring court seeks to ascertain whether art 141 EC has direct effect with the result that Ms Allonby can claim access to the TSS, whether on the basis of a comparison of herself with Mr Johnson or on the basis of statistical evidence. d

56. As is apparent from the foregoing the status of part-time lecturers who were initially employed at the College and are now engaged through the intermediary of ELS has changed. At the College they worked on the basis of a contract of service; with ELS they work as self-employed persons on the basis of a contract for services. e

57. Access to the TSS may be obtained only if work is performed which confers entitlement to access to the pension scheme (pensionable employment). Under the TSS regulations a person is in pensionable employment where that person is employed under a contract of employment but not where the person is contractually bound under a contract to provide services. f

58. The second question also arises in connection with the fact that Ms Allonby cannot point to a comparator which is a requirement under national pension legislation. Ms Allonby states that such a requirement impedes her claim for access to the pension scheme. She takes the view that, in support of her claim to access to the pension scheme, she may refer to Mr Johnson or, if the reply to the first question and thus also to the first part of the second question is negative, she may show on the basis of statistical evidence that the exclusion from participation in the pension scheme in respect of self-employed workers affects considerably more women than men. This disadvantage is accounted for by the definition in the pension scheme under which persons engaged under a contract to provide services are excluded from g a the scheme. If she is successful in that claim and there is no objective justificatory ground for such exclusion, the Secretary of State in his capacity as legislator and administrator of the pension scheme will have to change those conditions with the result ultimately that lecturers engaged as self-employed persons under contracts to provide services will be able to join the scheme and their employer ELS will be obliged to contribute to it.

b 59. Ms Allonby states that (1) the discrimination stems from the definition of persons eligible for access to the TSS, (2) on the assumption that this definition indirectly discriminates against women such discrimination can be detected by a purely legal analysis, and (3) that it is immaterial whether she can point to a comparator with her present employer, ELS, in order to identify the alleged discrimination because the discrimination stems from the conditions governing access over which ELS has no control.

c 60. Ms Allonby points out that the court in cases of unequal treatment is satisfied by statistics proving that a practice or condition applied disproportionately disadvantages women. In such situations a comparator who does the same work for the same undertaking or establishment is not required.

d 61. In support of her claim she relies on the judgments in Rinner-Kühn v FWW Spezial-Gebäudereinigung GmbH & Co KG<sup>12</sup> and R v Secretary of State for Employment, ex p Seymour-Smith<sup>13</sup> in which the discrimination stemmed from legislation. She points out that the same approach has been followed in the case of sector-wide occupational pension schemes, as for example in the Fisscher v Voorhuis Hengelo BV<sup>14</sup> judgment in which the court held that the right to access e to a scheme came within the substantive scope of art 141 EC, that the trustees of the pension scheme must, like employers, comply with the provisions of that article and that workers discriminated against may assert their rights directly against those trustees.

f 62. Ms Allonby observes that the judgments in Fisscher's case<sup>15</sup> and Bilka-Kaufhaus GmbH v Weber von Hartz<sup>16</sup> concerned access to a pension scheme. In that connection the work carried out by the women concerned was not directly in issue. That is in contrast to cases concerning equal benefits under pension schemes. In those cases it may be necessary to determine if the woman is receiving less pension in respect of the same work or work of equal value. Even in such cases the court has not found it necessary to confine its judgment to circumstances in which there is an actual comparator if it is clear g from the terms of the scheme itself that either men or women receive unequal pensions for equal work carried out in the past.

h 63. She states that as a consequence of the provisions of the TSS a lecturer employed under a contract of employment doing the same work receives more pay by way of pension from his employer than she receives from her employer. She refers to the judgment in Liefting v Amsterdam University Hospital<sup>17</sup> and states that in that case, just as in the present case, the employer of a man and a woman may be different. In both cases the discriminator is the legislator and manager of the pension scheme. None the less, Ms Allonby is of the opinion that the pension is in each case pay as it is received from employment and is paid by the employer. She states that the same principle may be deduced from the judgment in Bestuur van het Algemeen Burgerlijk Pensioenfonds v Beune<sup>18</sup>. a

64. Ms Allonby takes the view that the judgment in the Coloroll case<sup>19</sup> on which the United Kingdom government relies in support of its assertion that art 141 EC is confined to situations in which there is a sexually mixed workforce is of no avail to it. In her view that case concerned an occupational pension scheme covering only one workplace which employed only men. For those reasons there could therefore be no discrimination. In contrast the TSS is a nationwide scheme for both male and female teachers. b

65. The United Kingdom government considers that for the same reasons as in connection with the first question the reply to the first part of the second question must also be negative. Mr Johnson and his colleagues are eligible to join the scheme because the College has decided to employ them under a contract of service. Conversely, Ms Allonby and her colleagues cannot join the scheme because ELS has opted to engage them under a contract to provide services. As has been established by the courts, the College has no control over ELS as regards the levels of fees paid by it; it certainly could not be suggested that the College controlled whether persons under contract to ELS were eligible to join the TSS. According to the United Kingdom government, all persons working for ELS are employed under a contract to provide services and are therefore excluded from the TSS. Ms Allonby cannot rely on art 141 EC because she can point to no comparator. c

66. Likewise the United Kingdom government points to the consequences of the view put forward by Ms Allonby. An agency such as ELS providing staff would then be obliged under art 141 EC to ensure that the same pension conditions as those applicable to clients' employees were applied to staff on its database. That would be unworkable. The duty would not only arise in the case of sectoral pension schemes but also where clients have their own occupational pension schemes, which is normal in the private sector in the United Kingdom. It would be impossible for such an agency to secure for its staff membership of a client's pension scheme. It would be equally impossible for it to set up its own pension scheme under which benefits for different periods of service were calculated in different ways according to the terms of each ELS client's pension scheme. d

67. As far as the second part of this question is concerned the United Kingdom government observes that in the national proceedings statistical evidence has yet to be produced which would enable the courts to determine the existence of discrimination. The United Kingdom government doubts whether Ms Allonby can demonstrate that since in regard to ELS alone there is equality as between men and women. On the basis of that relationship of equality it cannot be stated that appreciably more women than men are affected by the contracting-out of tasks. The United Kingdom government further doubts whether the court's case law in Rinner-Kühn's case, Liefting's case and Beune's case confers on Ms Allonby entitlement to join the TSS—and thus obliges ELS to pay contributions in respect of her—even though ELS is not practising any inequality on the ground of sex as between the male and female lecturers on its database. In the United Kingdom government's view the answer in that connection is negative. e a 68. The United Kingdom government refers to the court's case law<sup>20</sup> under which pension benefits may constitute pay within the meaning of art 141 EC when they emanate at least indirectly from the employer. It follows from this that art 141 EC is infringed if an employer discriminates on the ground of sex in the payment of pensions. The trustee of an occupational pension scheme shares the employer's duty to ensure that this does not occur<sup>21</sup>. For he has the express duty of carrying out the employer's obligations. A trustee must therefore pay in such manner as complies with the employer's obligation but his duty does not extend further than that.

b 69. The United Kingdom government points out that Ms Allonby's argument implies that the terms of a pension scheme can infringe art 141 EC without there being any inequality on the ground of sex in pay as between the employees of any participating employer. That is impossible to reconcile, c the United Kingdom government submits, with the grounds on which occupational pensions fall within the scope of art 141 EC. In its view a pension scheme and its trustee cannot infringe art 141 EC if there is no breach of that article by a participating employer.

d 70. The United Kingdom government further points to another illogical consequence of the view contended for on behalf of Ms Allonby. An employer, in this case ELS, who is according equal treatment to all its lecturers, whether male or female, on terms not entitling them to join the TSS would be obliged in pursuance of the principle of equal treatment to pay employer's pension contributions for all lecturers of both sexes on its database. In the United e Kingdom government's view that inverts the relationship between an employer and a trustee, as explained by the court in the Coloroll case. Ms Allonby's argument contrives to impose via the trustee liability under art 141 EC on an employer to participate in a pension scheme, although that employer is not practising pay discrimination and also does not wish to participate in a pension scheme.

f 71. It points out that the TSS was set up as a pension scheme for employees of public educational establishments which also offers employees of private establishments the possibility of joining provided an application is made under a specific procedure by the employer concerned. However, establishments such as ELS which engage lecturers on the basis of contracts to provide services g have never manifested a desire to participate. It further points out that the United Kingdom has a form of state pension and it is for employers to set up pension schemes in substitution thereof but that it is by no means desirable that they should be compelled to do so.

h 72. As far as the definition of 'employment' is concerned the United Kingdom government pointed out that there is a difference under national law between a contract of service and a contract to provide services. The fact that the 1970 Act sought to create a right of action for both persons engaged under a contract of service and for persons engaged under a contract to provide services in no way implies in its view a policy decision that persons engaged under a contract to provide services should at all times be treated in the same way as employees.

i 73. Likewise the Commission considers that if Ms Allonby cannot rely on art 141 EC for the purpose of her claim to equal pay nor can she in regard to 20 Judgments in Bilka's case (cited at footnote 15, above) and Beune's case (cited at footnote 17, above).

21 Judgments in the Coloroll case (paras 17–24), cited at footnote 7, above, and Barber's case (paras 28, 29), cited at footnote 4, above.

pension entitlement. For occupational pensions come within art 141 EC a because they constitute pay by the employer. One cannot be viewed in isolation of the other. It observes that the choice made by ELS to engage all lecturers on the basis of contracts to provide services with the consequence that they cannot join the TSS has nothing to do with discrimination on the ground of sex. The Commission also points out that Ms Allonby's claim would result in a b change not only in regard to her but in regard to all staff.

Assessment

74. I make the observations set out below concerning the question whether in connection with her claim to entitlement to join the TSS Ms Allonby may compare herself with Mr Johnson or whether a comparator is at all necessary. c

75. As to the first part of the second question I am at one with the view put forward by Ms Allonby, the Commission and the United Kingdom government, namely that the reply in that connection must be the same as the reply to the first question. Pay for the purposes of art 141 EC may be defined as all existing and future consideration in cash or in kind which the worker receives directly or indirectly from his employer. The court has held that pension benefits come d within that definition. Accordingly, if Ms Allonby may not in respect of one component of her remuneration compare herself with a specific comparator then nor may she in respect of another component of her remuneration.

76. Since pension benefits come within the concept of pay that means that in that connection no distinction on the ground of sex may be made (1) in regard to entitlement to membership and (2) in regard to the grant of benefits. An e employer who did so would be acting in breach of art 141 EC.

77. In the discussion of the first question it was established that as a result of termination of her employment Ms Allonby now no longer gives lectures at the College on the basis of a contract of employment with the College but as a self-employed person through the intermediary of ELS under a contract to provide services. If she had still been employed by the College as a part-time f employee she would have been entitled to join the TSS. The change in her status on the basis of which she carries out her activities has however altered the situation.

78. Irrespective of the situation concerning the status of employee as opposed to self-employed person, it is the case that a comparator or a g comparative framework is necessary in order to determine whether there is discrimination on the ground of sex. That is true also of entitlement to membership. In dealing with the first question I already observed that the situation may be unsatisfactory but that Ms Allonby, as the law currently stands, cannot by reliance on the direct effect of art 141 EC compare herself with a comparator employed by the College. h

79. Even though Ms Allonby cannot rely directly on art 141 EC in order to compare her situation with that of Mr Johnson, that does not mean that there cannot be indirect discrimination stemming from a sector-wide or legislative scheme. In the present case the TSS regulations exclude lecturers who teach under an agreement to provide services. There may be (indirect) discrimination i if it appears that appreciably more women than men are affected by this condition of membership. Whether that is the case and whether there is an objective justificatory ground are however matters for the national court.

80. In that connection I wish to make the following observations. The first is that by means of the 1970 Act the United Kingdom is in compliance with its obligations under Directive 75/117. Secondly, following the judgment in

- a Barber's case and subsequent judgments the United Kingdom enacted the 1995 Act in order to enshrine the principle of equal treatment in pension legislation as well. The occupational pension scheme for teachers, a national scheme, was set up by the state and is governed by the 1995 Act and the TSS regulations. The latter excludes working relationships under a contract to provide services. The exclusion gives rise to a number of problems which I will discuss below.
- b 81. I am not persuaded by the arguments put forward by the United Kingdom government to the effect that there can be no discrimination. Naturally I share the view that no charge in that connection may be levelled against ELS or the College. The problem does not lie there. For the problem is in the legislation itself. That is also why Ms Allonby has addressed her claim primarily to the Secretary of State, not so much in his capacity as trustee but rather in his capacity as legislator. The United Kingdom government's observation to the effect that the position of a trustee of a pension fund mirrors the obligations of the employer under art 141 EC is in itself indeed correct but disregards the fact that the discrimination may also stem from the wording of the legislation itself.
- d 82. By way of illustration I would observe that, in the event that the College had attempted to resolve its financial problems by offering its part-time employees thenceforth only contracts to provide services the College would have been required to offer to those employees pro rata the same pay as it offered to its full-time staff. The 1970 Act so provides. None the less part-time workers who are not employed by the College would not be entitled to join the
- e TSS since they do not satisfy the condition of membership. A situation then arises in which employees and self-employed persons cannot be treated equally since the latter are not eligible for the deferred pay in the form of pension benefits. If statistical evidence can then be found to show that women are more seriously affected by this unequal treatment than men art 141 EC may be directly relied on.
- f 83. In that light I consider there to be an inherent inconsistency in the United Kingdom's reasoning reproduced at para 72, above. It is said that the 1970 Act pursues the same objective as art 141 EC, namely a prohibition of pay discrimination on the ground of sex and, in order to secure the effectiveness of that prohibition, places employees and self-employed persons on an equal footing; that being so, it is difficult to maintain that, in respect of pension benefits, which constitute deferred pay, there is no requirement for such parity.
- g 84. Moreover, it may be inferred from paras 50 and 109 of the order for reference that the Employment Appeal Tribunal ruled that in such a case the contract to provide services must under the terms of the 1970 Act be deemed to be a contract of employment for occupational pension purposes. In such a situation Ms Allonby would have been entitled to claim access on the basis of the 1995 Act. However, the fact remains that the TSS as a sector-wide scheme treats lecturers under a contract of employment and lecturers who offer their services as self-employed persons unequally. In so doing this scheme is precisely encouraging educational establishments to have recourse to arrangements such as those underlying the main proceedings. The fact that the 1970 Act expressly
- i places both categories of persons on an equal footing in the matter of pay and that the TSS makes a distinction thus creates a situation which, on the supposition that relatively more women than men are affected by it, impinges on the substance of art 141 EC. In such a case the national legislature is under a legal duty to ensure that both categories of persons may join the pension scheme under the same conditions.

85. The United Kingdom government's argument that an employer is not obliged to set up its own occupational pension scheme or to participate in it is not relevant at this stage. Moreover, Ms Allonby considers that private educational establishments are also obliged to contribute to the occupational pension fund in question but that establishments such as ELS on account of the definition used now have no choice. The question arising is whether Ms Allonby on the basis of statistical evidence can show whether the definition used in the TSS regulations is indirectly discriminatory. If she is successful in that, and there is no objective justification, the legislature will be required to enact an amendment. Whether she is then successful in her claim against ELS for it to contribute to the TSS in respect of her is a separate matter. In light of the foregoing I consider that the reply to the question referred must be affirmative.

V—CONCLUSION

86. On the basis of the foregoing considerations I suggest that the Court of Justice should reply as follows to the questions referred by the Court of Appeal (Civil Division) (England and Wales):

(1) In a situation such as that in the main proceedings where differences are established as between the pay of lecturers employed by the College and the pay of lecturers who under contracts for services with a third party provide services at the College, art 141(1) EC cannot be relied on against the College or that third party because the pay differences including entitlement to join a pension scheme cannot be attributed to a single source and there is therefore no entity which can be held responsible for that difference and its elimination.

(2) Article 141(1) EC can be relied on against a statutory occupational pension scheme which is solely open to persons who provide educational services under a contract of employment and is not open to lecturers who teach under contracts for the provision of individual services if it appears that appreciably more women than men are affected by that restriction and there is no objective justificatory ground for it.

13 January 2004. The COURT OF JUSTICE delivered the following judgment.

1. By order of 22 June 2001, received at the Court of Justice of the European Communities on 3 July 2001, the Court of Appeal (Civil Division) (England and Wales) referred to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) two questions on the interpretation of art 141 EC (formerly art 119 of the EC Treaty).

2. Those questions were raised in proceedings brought by Ms Allonby, who works as a lecturer, against Accrington and Rossendale College (the College), Education Lecturing Services, trading as Protocol Professional (ELS), and the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (the Secretary of State) concerning equal pay for men and women.

LEGAL BACKGROUND

Community law

3. According to art 2 EC, the Community is to have as its task to promote, inter alia, equality between men and women.

4. Under art 141(1) EC, each member state is to ensure that the principle of equal pay for male and female workers for equal work or work of equal value is applied.

a 5. The first subparagraph of art 141(2) EC states:

b 6. Article 5 of Council Directive (EEC) 75/117 (on the approximation of the laws of the member states relating to the application of the principle of equal pay for men and women) (OJ 1975 L45 p 19) provides:

‘Member States shall take the necessary measures to protect employees against dismissal by the employer as a reaction to a complaint within the undertaking or to any legal proceedings aimed at enforcing compliance with the principle of equal pay.’

c 7. Article 6 of that directive provides:

‘Member States shall, in accordance with their national circumstances and legal systems, take the measures necessary to ensure that the principle of equal pay is applied. They shall see that effective means are available to take care that this principle is observed.’

d 8. Article 2(1) of Council Directive (EEC) 86/378 (on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women in occupational social security schemes) (OJ 1986 L225 p 40), as amended by Council Directive (EC) 96/97 (OJ 1997 L46 p 20) (Directive 86/378) provides:

“Occupational social security schemes” means schemes not governed by Directive 79/7/EEC whose purpose is to provide workers, whether employees or self-employed, in an undertaking or group of undertakings, area of economic activity, occupational sector or group of sectors with benefits intended to supplement the benefits provided by statutory social security schemes or to replace them, whether membership of such schemes is compulsory or optional.’

f 9. Article 5(1) of Directive 86/378 provides:

‘Under the conditions laid down in the following provisions, the principle of equal treatment implies that there shall be no discrimination on the basis of sex, either directly or indirectly, by reference in particular to marital or family status, especially as regards:

- the scope of the schemes and the conditions of access to them;
- the obligation to contribute and the calculation of contributions ...’

g 10. Article 6(1) of that directive states:

‘Provisions contrary to the principle of equal treatment shall include those based on sex, either directly or indirectly, in particular by reference to marital or family status, for:

- (a) determining the persons who may participate in an occupational scheme;
- (b) fixing the compulsory or optional nature of participation in an occupational scheme ...’

Domestic law

11. In the United Kingdom, the right to equal pay for men and women is laid down by the Equal Pay Act 1970, s 1 of which provides:

'Requirement of equal treatment for men and women in same employment.—(1) If the terms of a contract under which a woman is employed at an establishment in Great Britain do not include (directly or by reference to a collective agreement or otherwise) an equality clause they shall be deemed to include one.

(2) An equality clause is a provision which relates to terms (whether concerned with pay or not) of a contract under which a woman is employed (the "woman's contract"), and has the effect that ... (c) where a woman is employed on work which, not being work in relation to which paragraph (a) or (b) above applies, is, in terms of the demands made on her (for instance under such headings as effort, skill and decision), of equal value to that of a man in the same employment—(i) if (apart from the equality clause) any term of the woman's contract is or becomes less favourable to the woman than a term of a similar kind in the contract under which that man is employed, that term of the woman's contract shall be treated as so modified as not to be less favourable, and (ii) if (apart from the equality clause) at any time the woman's contract does not include a term corresponding to a term benefiting that man included in the contract under which he is employed, the woman's contract shall be treated as including such a term ...

(6) Subject to the following subsections, for purposes of this section—(a) "employed" means employed under a contract of service or of apprenticeship or a contract personally to execute any work or labour, and related expressions shall be construed accordingly ... (c) two employers are to be treated as associated if one is a company of which the other (directly or indirectly) has control or if both are companies of which a third person (directly or indirectly) has control, and men shall be treated as in the same employment with a woman if they are men employed by her employer or any associated employer at the same establishment or at establishments in Great Britain which include that one and at which common terms and conditions of employment are observed either generally or for employees of the relevant classes.'

12. The Pensions Act 1995 contains provisions which the United Kingdom has been required to adopt as a result of the court's decision in Barber v Guardian Royal Exchange Assurance Group Case C-262/88 [1990] 2 All ER 660, [1990] ECR I-1889 and of a number of decisions which followed. Section 62 of that Act, which s 63(4) requires to be construed as one with s 1 of the 1970 Act, provides inter alia as follows:

'The equal treatment rule.—(1) An occupational pension scheme which does not contain an equal treatment rule shall be treated as including one.

(2) An equal treatment rule is a rule which relates to the terms on which—(a) persons become members of the scheme, and (b) members of the scheme are treated.'

13. The Secretary of State administers an occupational pension scheme for teachers (the Teachers' Superannuation Scheme 1988, hereinafter the TSS, governed by the Teachers' Superannuation (Consolidation) Regulations 1988, SI 1988/1652, and the Teachers' Superannuation (Amendment) Regulations 1993, SI 1993/114). The terms thereof confine membership to employment under a contract of employment, whether full-time or part-time, a thereby restricting membership of the TSS to teachers with a contract of employment. Moreover, only certain categories of establishment come within its scope.

14. According to the explanations given by the United Kingdom government at the hearing, the TSS is a scheme for persons employed by public bodies in the teaching sector. It has been expressly extended to certain categories of employees of private entities by virtue of a procedure which the employer applies in order to be accepted as an employer participating in that fund.

15. According to s 9(1) and (2) of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975:

c 'Discrimination against contract workers.—(1) This section applies to any work for a person ("the principal") which is available for doing by individuals ("contract workers") who are employed not by the principal himself but by another person, who supplies them under a contract made with the principal.

d (2) It is unlawful for the principal, in relation to work to which this section applies, to discriminate against a woman who is a contract worker—(a) in the terms on which he allows her to do that work, or (b) by not allowing her to do it or continue to do it, or (c) in the way he affords her access to any benefits, facilities or services or by refusing or deliberately omitting to afford her access to them, or (d) by subjecting her to any other detriment.'

f 16. These proceedings arise out of the dismissal, by non-renewal of their contracts of employment, of a number of lecturers of hourly-paid lecturers employed by the College, including Ms Allonby, and the College's decision to engage hourly-paid lecturers only through ELS, which offered lecturers the possibility of being registered as self-employed persons for teaching assignments at institutes of further education.

g 17. Ms Allonby was originally employed by the College as a part-time lecturer in office technology. She was employed from 1990 to 1996 under a succession of one-year contracts under which she was paid by the hour at a rate determined by the level at which she was teaching.

h 18. By 1996, the College's financial obligations had become increasingly more onerous because of legislative changes which required part-time lecturers to be accorded equal or equivalent benefits to full-time lecturers, in particular as regards retirement pensions. The College employed 341 part-time lecturers. It decided that in order to reduce its overheads it would terminate or not renew their contracts of employment, and instead would retain their services as sub-contractors. This was done in Ms Allonby's case by terminating her employment with effect from 29 August 1996 and offering her re-engagement through ELS.

i 19. ELS operated as an agency, holding a database of available lecturers. Colleges could call on ELS to provide contract lecturers, mentioning the person concerned by name if they so wished. Ms Allonby, and others like her who had to register with ELS if they wanted to continue to work as part-time lecturers, thereby became self-employed. Their pay became a proportion of the fee agreed between ELS and the College. Their income fell and they lost a series of benefits linked to their employment, ranging from sick pay to a career structure. ELS is not an employer contributing to the TSS.

20. Of the 341 hourly-paid part-time lecturers who were made redundant by the College in 1996, 110 were men and 231 were women. Among the College's full-time salaried lecturers, the male:female ratio had gone from 74:40 in the year 1994/1995 to 55:50 in 1995/1996. a

21. ELS's database contained almost as many men as women, namely 18,050 compared with 19,909 on the most recent count available to the tribunal hearing the present case at first instance. b

22. Ms Allonby, supported by her union and, on appeal, by the Equal Opportunities Commission, brought proceedings against the College for a redundancy payment and for redress for unfair dismissal and indirect sex discrimination by reason of the dismissal.

23. Ms Allonby brought a further set of proceedings alleging, first, that the College was discriminating against her as a contract worker contrary to s 9 of the 1975 Act, that ELS was obliged by law to pay her equally—that is, pro rata—with a full-time lecturer at the College and that the state, represented by the Secretary of State, was acting unlawfully in denying her access, as a self-employed worker, to the TSS. Both sets of proceedings are in the nature of a test case for others similarly affected. c

24. The redundancy claim was settled amicably. d

25. In July 1997, the employment tribunal (United Kingdom) decided, as a preliminary issue, that Ms Allonby was not entitled to use as a comparator for equal pay purposes a male lecturer employed full-time by the College. In April 1998 that tribunal decided that the dismissal by the College was unfair but attracted no redress, and that it constituted indirect sex discrimination but was justifiable. It also held that the claim against the College under s 9 of the 1975 Act and those against ELS and the Secretary of State all failed. All those decisions were upheld in March 2000 by the Employment Appeal Tribunal (United Kingdom) which, however, gave permission to appeal on all issues. e

26. In the first two claims before the national court, Ms Allonby alleged that her dismissal by the College constituted unlawful indirect sex discrimination and that, by thereafter denying her benefits available to salaried lecturers, the College was discriminating against her as a contract worker on the ground of her sex. Those two claims were remitted for reconsideration by the employment tribunal. f

27. Regarding the other claims, the national court made the following findings. g

28. Against ELS Ms Allonby claims that art 141 EC entitles her, when she works at the College, to a rate of remuneration equal to that of a male lecturer employed by the College on work which is to be taken to be of equal value. Ms Allonby seeks against ELS a rate of pay equal to that of employed lecturers at the College by means of a comparison with a named teacher, Mr R Johnson. h

29. According to the national court, the material circumstances relating to that equal pay claim are the following:

—Ms Allonby and Mr Johnson undertake lecturing work of presumptively equal value at the College although not always on the same site;

—Mr Johnson is employed by the College as a lecturer and is paid by the College at a rate which the College sets; i

—Ms Allonby is engaged by ELS on a self-employed basis. She works on specific assignments agreed by her with ELS, at the College or elsewhere. She has no contractual relationship with the College; —the College agrees with ELS the fee which it will pay for each lecturer. ELS agrees with Ms Allonby the fee which she is to receive for each assignment and a sets the conditions under which its lecturers are to work. The College has no direct control over ELS in those or other matters;

—the College and ELS employ both male and female staff.

b 30. Against ELS, the College and the Secretary of State Ms Allonby claims access to the TSS. She claims that right either (i) by comparison with a male lecturer employed by the College or (ii) since that pension scheme was set up pursuant to statute, without such comparison if she can show statistically that among the teachers who satisfy all the other conditions for membership, female teachers who can comply with the requirement of being employed under a contract of employment in order to be entitled to membership of the TSS are proportionally much less numerous than male teachers who can do so. Neither the existence of such proof nor the question of objective justification c has yet been determined by the courts in the present case. However, the referring court considers that the least inconvenient course is to refer the questions to the court and then, if the answer makes it appropriate, to order the material facts to be found, thus avoiding duplication of effort.

d 31. According to the national court, the material circumstances relating to the claim for access to the TSS are the following:

—the TSS was set up by the Secretary of State under powers conferred by primary legislation;

—it is a condition of membership of the TSS that the member be an employee and be engaged as a teacher in a specified category of educational institution. The College is in one of these categories;

e —no self-employed person is eligible to be a member of the TSS;

—the TSS provides old age pensions and other benefits calculated principally by reference to the duration of the member's employment and to a reference salary earned in employment to which the TSS relates, which need not have been the same employment throughout but must have been at eligible establishments;

f —the rates of pay which determine the level of benefits under the TSS may differ between employers;

—the benefits payable under the TSS are funded by contributions from the members of the TSS and their employers;

g —no lecturer engaged by ELS is engaged as an employee. In consequence, none is eligible for membership of the TSS.

32. It appears from the explanations given by the United Kingdom government that it is open to ELS to contribute to the TSS in respect of teachers employed by it.

h THE QUESTIONS REFERRED TO THE COURT

i 33. The first question which arises for the Court of Appeal is whether two people working in the same service or establishment, albeit under contracts with different employers, must nevertheless be regarded as working in the same employment for the purposes of art 141 EC, at least where the work is done for the purposes and benefit of the employer whose establishment it is. According to the national court, only if the answer is No is there no conflict between art 141 EC and s 1(6) of the 1970 Act.

34. It is clear, first, that Ms Allonby's contract is not with the College but with ELS and, second, that ELS and the College are not associated employers within the meaning of s 1(6)(c) of the 1970 Act. Mr Johnson is not then

'employed by [the same] employer ... at the same establishment' within the meaning of that provision. He is employed by the College, albeit at the same establishment. a

35. According to the Court of Appeal, the way s 1(6) of the 1970 Act is written makes it possible to construe 'the same employment' in s 1(2)(c) as also covering work in the same establishment or service. However, the original wording of that Act makes that interpretation improbable. Ms Allonby has therefore to fall back on Community law, whether as an aid to the construction of the 1970 Act or as directly effective law. b

36. For the national court, there is no doubt that, if a comparison with Mr Johnson is to be made, the inequalities are numerous: he has, but she has not, security against unfair dismissal and dismissal for redundancy, and rights to sick pay. Ms Allonby does not argue that her right to equality with Mr Johnson extends beyond occasions when ELS allocates Ms Allonby to work at the College. But if the argument succeeds there, it should succeed—or at least be available—in relation to other establishments which obtain her services through ELS. c

37. Second, the Court of Appeal raises the question whether Ms Allonby may, on the basis of art 141 EC, claim access to the TSS. It explains in that connection that, in the context of her employment with ELS, Ms Allonby, having only a contract for services, has no access to the TSS. d

38. The national court states that if Ms Allonby can rely on Mr Johnson as her comparator, she will be entitled in principle to succeed in this aspect of her claim and that in any event she submits that she is entitled to equality of treatment without providing a male comparator. Ms Allonby relies on the Employment Appeal Tribunal's decision—with which the referring court agrees—that, contrary to the view of the employment tribunal, Ms Allonby's contract with ELS, is by virtue of s 1(6)(a) of the 1970 Act, a contract of employment for occupational pension purposes. e

39. In those circumstances the Court of Appeal (Civil Division) (England and Wales) stayed proceedings ([2001] EWCA Civ 529, [2001] IRLR 364, [2001] ICR 1189) and referred the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling: f

'(1) Does Article 141 EC have direct effect so as to enable a woman to claim equal pay with a man in the circumstances of this case? g

(2) Does Article 141 EC have direct effect so as to entitle Ms Allonby to claim access to the pension scheme either (i) by comparing herself with Mr Johnson or (ii) by showing statistically that a considerably smaller proportion of female than of male teachers who are otherwise eligible to join the TSS can comply with the requirement of being employed under a contract of employment, and by establishing that the requirement is not objectively justified?' h

40. Ms Allonby informed the court at the hearing on 28 January 2003 that the claims which had been remitted to the employment tribunal had been settled amicably between her and the College, with payment of compensation but no admission of liability. i

THE FIRST QUESTION

41. The national court submitted the first question to enable it to rule on Ms Allonby's claim for entitlement to remuneration from ELS equal to that of a male lecturer employed by the College.

a 42. Accordingly, this question must be construed as seeking to ascertain whether, in circumstances such as those of the main proceedings, art 141(1) EC must be interpreted as meaning that a woman whose contract of employment with an undertaking has not been renewed and who is immediately made available to her previous employer through another undertaking to provide the same services is entitled to rely, vis-à-vis the intermediary undertaking, on the principle of equal pay, using as a basis for comparison the remuneration received for equal work or work of the same value by a man employed by the woman's previous employer.

b 43. It must be borne in mind at the outset that art 141(1) EC can be relied on only by workers within the meaning of that provision.

c 44. However, even if that condition is satisfied, the first question cannot be answered in the affirmative.

45. Admittedly, there is nothing in the wording of art 141(1) EC to suggest that the applicability of that provision is limited to situations in which men and women work for the same employer. The principle established by that article may be invoked before national courts, in particular in cases of discrimination arising directly from legislative provisions or collective labour agreements, as well as in cases in which work is carried out in the same establishment or service, whether private or public (see, inter alia, Defrenne v Sabena Case 43/75 [1981] 1 All ER 122, [1976] ECR 455 (para 40) (the Defrenne II case) and Lawrence v Regent Office Care Ltd Case C-320/00 [2002] IRLR 822, [2002] ECR I-7325 (para 17)).

d 46. However, where the differences identified in the pay conditions of workers performing equal work or work of equal value cannot be attributed to a single source, there is no body which is responsible for the inequality and which could restore equal treatment. Such a situation does not come within the scope of art 141(1) EC. The work and the pay of those workers cannot therefore be compared on the basis of that provision (see Lawrence's case (para 18)).

e 47. It is clear from the order for reference that the male worker referred to by Ms Allonby is paid by the College under conditions determined by the College, whereas ELS agreed with Ms Allonby on the pay which she would receive for each assignment.

f 48. The fact that the level of pay received by Ms Allonby is influenced by the amount which the College pays ELS is not a sufficient basis for concluding that the College and ELS constitute a single source to which can be attributed the differences identified in Ms Allonby's conditions of pay and those of the male worker paid by the College.

g 49. Moreover, it is clear from the order for reference that ELS and the College are not associated employers within the meaning of s 1(6)(c) of the 1970 Act.

h 50. Therefore, the answer to the first question must be that, in circumstances such as those of the main proceedings, art 141(1) EC must be interpreted as meaning that a woman whose contract of employment with an undertaking has not been renewed and who is immediately made available to her previous employer through another undertaking to provide the same services is not entitled to rely, vis-à-vis the intermediary undertaking, on the principle of equal pay, using as a basis for comparison the remuneration received for equal work or work of the same value by a man employed by the woman's previous employer.

THE SECOND QUESTION

51. The second question, which is in several parts, concerns membership of the TSS. a

52. First, it must be borne in mind that, according to settled case law, a pension scheme such as the TSS at issue in the main proceedings, which essentially relates to the employment of the person concerned, forms part of the pay received by that person and comes within the scope of art 141 EC (to that effect, see in particular Bilka-Kaufhaus GmbH v Weber von Hartz Case 170/84 [1986] IRLR 317, [1986] ECR 1607 (para 22), Barber v Guardian Royal Exchange Assurance Group Case C-262/88 [1990] 2 All ER 660, [1990] ECR I-1889 (para 28), Bestuur van het Algemeen Burgerlijk Pensioenfonds v Beune Case C-7/93 [1995] All ER (EC) 97, [1994] ECR I-4471 (para 46) and Deutsche Telekom AG v Vick Joined cases C-234/96 and C-235/96 [2000] ECR I-799 (para 32)). b

53. Moreover, art 141 EC covers not only entitlement to benefits paid by an occupational pension scheme but also the right to be a member of such a scheme (see, in particular, Fisscher v Voorhuis Hengelo BV Case C-128/93 [1995] All ER (EC) 193, [1994] ECR I-4583 (para 12)). c

54. Part (a) of the second question seeks to ascertain whether art 141(1) EC must be interpreted as meaning that a woman in circumstances such as those of the main proceedings is entitled to rely, vis-à-vis the intermediary undertaking and/or vis-à-vis her previous employer, on the principle of equal pay in order to secure entitlement to membership of an occupational pension scheme for teachers, set up under state legislation, of which only teachers with a contract of employment may become members, using as a basis for comparison the remuneration, including such a right of membership, received for equal work or work of the same value by a man employed by the woman's previous employer. e

55. As far as the relationship between Ms Allonby and ELS is concerned, the same reasoning as that applied to the first question must be followed. f

56. As regards her relationship with the College, it must be held that, following the amicable settlement reached between Ms Allonby and the College while the case was pending before the court, the question whether Ms Allonby suffered indirect discrimination on grounds of sex as a result of her dismissal and the question whether, if appropriate, she may still claim elements of remuneration from the College on the basis of art 141(1) EC no longer arise. g

57. Accordingly, the answer to part (a) of the second question must be that art 141(1) EC must be interpreted as meaning that a woman in circumstances such as those of the main proceedings is not entitled to rely on the principle of equal pay in order to secure entitlement to membership of an occupational pension scheme for teachers set up by state legislation of which only teachers with a contract of employment may become members, using as a basis for comparison the remuneration, including such a right of membership, received for equal work or work of the same value by a man employed by the woman's previous employer. h

Part (b) of the second question i

58. Part (b) of the second question concerns, first, the state, represented by the Secretary of State, and, second, ELS, as an intermediary undertaking.

59. It is concerned with possible discrimination deriving from legislation.

a The first part of part (b) of the second question

60. In so far as the state is concerned, the national court seeks in essence to ascertain whether the requirement of being employed under a contract of employment as a precondition for membership of a pension scheme for teachers, set up by state legislation, must be disapplied where it is shown that, among the teachers who fulfil the other conditions for membership, a clearly lower percentage of women than of men are able to satisfy that condition and it is established that that condition is not objectively justified.

61. In order to answer this question, it is necessary, first, to interpret the concept of 'worker' within the meaning of art 141(1) EC, second, to determine precisely the category of persons who may be included in the comparison and, third, to examine the consequences of possible incompatibility of the condition at issue with that provision.

—The concept of 'worker' within the meaning of art 141(1) EC

62. The criterion on which art 141(1) EC is based is the comparability of the work done by workers of each sex (see, to that effect, Defrenne v SA Belge de Navigation Aérienne (SABENA) Case 149/77 [1978] ECR 1365 (para 22) (the Defrenne III case)). Accordingly, for the purpose of the comparison provided for by art 141(1) EC, only women and men who are workers within the meaning of that article can be taken into consideration.

63. In that connection, it must be pointed out that there is no single definition of worker in Community law: it varies according to the area in which the definition is to be applied (see Martinez Sala v Freistaat Bayern Case C-85/96 [1998] ECR I-2691 (para 31)).

64. The term 'worker' within the meaning of art 141(1) EC is not expressly defined in the EC Treaty. It is therefore necessary, in order to determine its meaning, to apply the generally recognised principles of interpretation, having regard to its context and to the objectives of the Treaty.

65. According to art 2 EC, the Community is to have as its task to promote, among other things, equality between men and women. Article 141(1) EC constitutes a specific expression of the principle of equality for men and women, which forms part of the fundamental principles protected by the Community legal order (see, to that effect, Deutsche Post AG v Sievers Joined cases C-270/97 and C-271/97 [2000] ECR I-929 (para 57)). As the court held in the Defrenne II case (para 12), the principle of equal pay forms part of the foundations of the Community.

66. Accordingly, the term 'worker' used in art 141(1) EC cannot be defined by reference to the legislation of the member states but has a Community meaning. Moreover, it cannot be interpreted restrictively.

67. For the purposes of that provision, there must be considered as a worker a person who, for a certain period of time, performs services for and under the direction of another person in return for which he receives remuneration (see, in relation to free movement of workers, in particular Lawrie-Blum v Land Baden-Württemberg Case 66/85 [1986] ECR 2121 (para 17), and Martinez Sala's case (para 32)).

68. Pursuant to the first paragraph of art 141(2) EC, for the purpose of that article, 'pay' means the ordinary basic or minimum wage or salary and any other consideration, whether in cash or in kind, which the worker receives directly or indirectly, in respect of his employment, from his employer. It is clear from that definition that the authors of the Treaty did not intend that the term 'worker', within the meaning of art 141(1) EC, should include independent providers of services who are not in a relationship of subordination with the person who receives the services (see also, in the context of free movement of workers, Meeusen v Hoofddirectie van de Informatie Beheer Groep Case C-337/97 [1999] ECR I-3289 (para 15)).

69. The question whether such a relationship exists must be answered in each particular case having regard to all the factors and circumstances by which the relationship between the parties is characterised.

70. Provided that a person is a worker within the meaning of art 141(1) EC, the nature of his legal relationship with the other party to the employment relationship is of no consequence in regard to the application of that article (see, in the context of free movement of workers, Bettray v Staatssecretaris van Justitie Case 344/87 [1989] ECR 1621 (para 16) and Raulin v Minister van Onderwijs en Wetenschappen Case C-357/89 [1992] ECR I-1027 (para 10)).

71. The formal classification of a self-employed person under national law does not exclude the possibility that a person must be classified as a worker within the meaning of art 141(1) EC if his independence is merely notional, thereby disguising an employment relationship within the meaning of that article.

72. In the case of teachers who are, vis-à-vis an intermediary undertaking, under an obligation to undertake an assignment at a college, it is necessary in particular to consider the extent of any limitation on their freedom to choose their timetable, and the place and content of their work. The fact that no obligation is imposed on them to accept an assignment is of no consequence in that context (see to that effect, in relation to free movement of workers, Raulin's case (paras 9, 10)).

—The category of persons who may be included in the comparison

73. When it is necessary to consider whether a set of rules conforms with the requirements of art 141(1) EC, it is in principle the scope of those rules which determines the category of persons who may be included in the comparison.

74. Thus, in the case of company pension schemes which are limited to the undertaking in question, the court has held that a worker cannot rely on art 119 of the EC Treaty (arts 117 to 120 of the EC Treaty have been replaced by arts 136 to 143 EC) in order to claim pay to which he could be entitled if he belonged to the other sex in the absence, now or in the past, in the undertaking concerned of workers of the other sex who perform or performed comparable work (see Coloroll Pension Trustees Ltd v Russell Case C-200/91 [1995] All ER (EC) 23, [1994] ECR I-4389 (para 103)). On the other hand, in the case of national legislation, in Rinner-Kühn v FWW Spezial-Gebäudereinigung GmbH & Co KG Case 171/88 [1989] IRLR 493, [1989] ECR 2743 (para 11), the court based its reasoning on statistics for the numbers of male and female workers at national level.

75. In order to show that the requirement of being employed under a contract of employment as a precondition for membership of the TSS—a condition deriving from state rules—constitutes a breach of the principle of equal pay for men and women in the form of indirect discrimination against women, a female worker may rely on statistics showing that, among the teachers who are workers within the meaning of art 141(1) EC and fulfil all the conditions for membership of the pension scheme except that of being employed under a contract of employment as defined by national law, there is a much higher percentage of women than of men.

a 76. If that is the case, the difference of treatment concerning membership of the pension scheme at issue must be objectively justified. In that regard, no justification can be inferred from the formal classification of a self-employed person under national law.

—Legal consequences

b 77. Where it is found that the requirement of being employed under a contract of employment as a precondition for membership of a pension scheme is not in conformity with art 141(1) EC, the condition concerned must be disapplied, in view of the primacy of Community law (see, to that effect, Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato v Simmenthal SpA Case 106/77 [1978] ECR 629 (para 24)).

c 78. Having regard to the observations submitted by the United Kingdom government at the hearing on 28 January 2003, it should be added that, under art 6(1)(b) of Directive 86/378, which specifies the scope of art 141 EC as far as employees are concerned, the compulsory or optional nature of membership of an occupational pension scheme must be fixed without discrimination on grounds of sex.

d 79. In view of the foregoing considerations, the answer to the first part of part (b) of the second question must be that, in the absence of any objective justification, the requirement, imposed by state legislation, of being employed under a contract of employment as a precondition for membership of a pension scheme for teachers is not applicable where it is shown that, among the teachers who are workers within the meaning of art 141(1) EC and fulfil all the other conditions for membership, a much lower percentage of women than of men is able to fulfil that condition. The formal classification of a self-employed person under national law does not change the fact that a person must be classified as a worker within the meaning of that article if his independence is merely notional.

f The second part of part (b) of the second question

g 80. As far as ELS is concerned, the national court seeks to ascertain in essence whether the applicability of art 141(1) EC vis-à-vis an undertaking is subject to the condition that the worker concerned can be compared with a worker of the other sex who is or has been employed by the same employer and has received higher pay for equal work or for work of equal value and that a woman cannot therefore invoke statistics in order to claim, on the basis of that provision, eligibility for membership of a pension scheme set up under state legislation.

h 81. In that connection it must be held that a woman may rely on statistics to show that a clause in state legislation is contrary to art 141(1) EC because it discriminates against female workers. Where that provision is not applicable, the consequences are binding not only on the public authorities or social agencies but also on the employer concerned.

i 82. If, for example, an employer employs only workers for whom normal working time does not exceed ten hours a week or 45 hours a month and, regardless of the sex of the worker, he does not continue to pay remuneration in the event of sickness because a law which discriminates indirectly against women, such as the law at issue in Rinner-Kühn's case so permits, female workers can nevertheless invoke art 141(1) EC against their employer in order to enforce rights which national legislation confers on workers whose normal working time is longer and to ensure that the discriminatory condition is not applied.

83. In such cases, it is the legislature that is the sole source of the difference in treatment referred to in para 18 of Lawrence's judgment. a

84. The answer to the second part of part (b) of the second question must therefore be that art 141(1) EC must be interpreted as meaning that where state legislation is at issue, the applicability of that provision vis-à-vis an undertaking is not subject to the condition that the worker concerned can be compared with a worker of the other sex who is or has been employed by the same employer and who has received higher pay for equal work or work of equal value. b

COSTS

85. The costs incurred by the United Kingdom and German governments and by the Commission of the European Communities, which have submitted observations to the court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. c

On those grounds, the Court of Justice, in answer to the questions referred to it by the Court of Appeal (Civil Division) (England and Wales) by order of 22 June 2001, hereby rules: d

(1) In circumstances such as those of the main proceedings, art 141(1) EC must be interpreted as meaning that a woman whose contract of employment with an undertaking has not been renewed and who is immediately made available to her previous employer through another undertaking to provide the same services is not entitled to rely, vis-à-vis the intermediary undertaking, on the principle of equal pay, using as a basis for comparison the remuneration received for equal work or work of the same value by a man employed by the woman's previous employer. e

(2) Article 141(1) EC must be interpreted as meaning that a woman in circumstances such as those of the main proceedings is not entitled to rely on the principle of equal pay in order to secure entitlement to membership of an occupational pension scheme for teachers set up by state legislation of which only teachers with a contract of employment may become members, using as a basis for comparison the remuneration, including such a right of membership, received for equal work or work of the same value by a man employed by the woman's previous employer. f

(3) In the absence of any objective justification, the requirement, imposed by state legislation, of being employed under a contract of employment as a precondition for membership of a pension scheme for teachers is not applicable where it is shown that, among the teachers who are workers within the meaning of art 141(1) EC and fulfil all the other conditions for membership, a much lower percentage of women than of men is able to fulfil that condition. The formal classification of a self-employed person under national law does not change the fact that a person must be classified as a worker within the meaning of that article if his independence is merely notional. g

(4) Article 141(1) EC must be interpreted as meaning that where state legislation is at issue, the applicability of that provision vis-à-vis an undertaking is not subject to the condition that the worker concerned can be compared with a worker of the other sex who is or has been employed by the same employer and who has received higher pay for equal work or work of equal value. h

(Case C-201/02)

COURT OF JUSTICE OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES (FIFTH CHAMBER)

JUDGES JANN (RAPPORTEUR) (ACTING FOR THE PRESIDENT OF THE FIFTH CHAMBER), EDWARD AND LA PERGOLA

ADVOCATE GENERAL LÉGER

12 JUNE, 25 SEPTEMBER 2003, 7 JANUARY 2004

European Community – Environment – Projects likely to significantly affect environment – Development consent – Environmental impact assessment – Registration of dormant permission to continue mining operation – Competent authorities permitting continuation of mining operations under old mining permission without carrying out environmental impact assessment – Whether competent authority required to carry out environmental impact assessment – Council Directive (EEC) 85/337, arts 1(2), 2(1) – Planning and Compensation Act 1991, s 22.

Registration of an old mining permission had been granted by the competent national authorities of the United Kingdom to the owners of a quarry, pursuant to s 22<sup>a</sup> of the Planning and Compensation Act 1991. The quarry was situated in an area recognised to be environmentally extremely sensitive and at no time had the competent authorities examined whether it had been necessary to carry out an environmental impact assessment. In due course, the claimant, who was the owner of property located proximate to the quarry, brought proceedings before the national court for revocation or modification of the planning permission. The national court decided to stay the proceedings and refer to the Court of Justice of the European Communities certain questions<sup>b</sup> concerning the interpretation of arts 1(2) and 2(1)<sup>c</sup> of Council Directive (EEC) 85/337 (on the assessment of the effects of certain public and private projects on the environment), which provided that before member states granted development consent for a project likely to have significant effects on the environment, an assessment as to the effects of the project was to be carried out. a

<sup>a</sup> Section 22 provides, so far as relevant: '(1) In this section and Schedule 2 to this Act, "old mining permission" means any planning permission for development ... involving the depositing of mineral waste, which was deemed to be granted under Part III of the Town and Country Planning Act 1947 ... (2) An old mining permission shall, if an application under that Schedule to determine the conditions to which the permission is to be subject is finally determined, have effect as from the final determination as if granted on the terms required to be registered. (3) If no such development has, at any time in the period of two years ending with 1st May 1991, been carried out to any substantial extent anywhere in, on or under the land to which an old mining permission relates, that permission shall not authorise any such development to be carried out at any time after the coming into force of this section unless—(a) the permission has effect in accordance with subsection (2) above; and (b) the development is carried out after such an application is finally determined. (4) An old mining permission shall—(a) if no application for the registration of the permission is made under that Schedule, cease to have effect on the day following the last date on which such an application may be made; and (b) if such an application is refused, cease to have effect on the day following the date on which the application is finally determined ...'

Held – (1) For the purposes of art 2(1) of the directive, decisions permitting the resumption of mining operations constituted a ‘development consent’ within the meaning of art 1(2), such that an assessment of the environmental effects of such operations was to be carried out. The directive required an assessment of the environmental effects of the project in question for new consents, namely those sought after the expiry of the time limit laid down for implementation of the directive. In the main proceedings, had the owners of the quarry wished to resume its workings, they were obliged under the Act to have the old mining permission registered and to seek decisions determining new planning conditions and approving matters reserved by those conditions. Had they not done so, the permission would have ceased to have effect and there would no longer have been consent to work the quarry within the meaning of art 2(1). Further, it would undermine the effectiveness of the directive to regard as mere modification of an existing consent the adoption of decisions which, in circumstances such as those in the main proceedings, replaced not only the terms but the very substance of a prior consent, such as the old mining permission. Accordingly, decisions such as the decision determining new conditions and the decision approving matters reserved by the new conditions for the working of the quarry had to be considered to constitute, as a whole, a new consent within the meaning of art 2(1) of the directive (see judgment paras 44–47, 53, below). b

(2) Where a consent procedure comprised several stages, the requisite environmental impact assessment was to be carried out as soon as it was possible to identify and assess all the effects which the project might have on the environment. Since an environmental impact assessment had to be carried out before consent was given and since national authorities were to take account of the environmental effects of a project at the earliest possible stage in the proceedings, it followed that where national law provided that a consent procedure was to be carried out in several stages, one involving a principle decision and the other involving an implementing decision which could not extend beyond the parameters set by the principal decision, the effects which the project might have on the environment had to be identified and assessed at the time of the procedure relating to the principal decision. It was only if those effects were not identifiable until the time of the procedure relating to the implementing decision that the assessment should be carried out in the course of that procedure (see judgment paras 49, 52, 53, below). f

(3) In circumstances such as those in the main proceedings, an individual might, where appropriate, rely on art 2(1) of the directive. Having regard to the principle of legal certainty, directives might only create rights for individuals, not obligations. Therefore, an individual could not rely on a directive against a member state where the state obligation was directly linked to the performance of an obligation falling on a third party. However, mere repercussions on the rights of third parties did not justify preventing an individual from invoking the provisions of a directive against the member state concerned. In the main proceedings, the obligation on the member state concerned to ensure that the competent authorities carried out an assessment of the environmental effects of the working of the quarry was not directly linked to the performance of any obligation which would fall, pursuant to the h

- a directive, on the quarry owners. The fact that mining operations had to be halted to await the results of the assessment was the consequence of the belated performance of that state's obligation, but such a consequence could not be described as an inverse direct effect of the provisions of that directive in relation to the quarry owners (see judgment paras 56–58, 61, below).
- b (4) Pursuant to art 10 EC (formerly art 5 of the EC Treaty), the competent authorities of a member state were obliged to take, within the scope of their competence, all general or particular measures for remedying the failure to carry out an assessment of the environmental effects of a project as provided for in art 2(1) of the directive. The competent authorities of a member state were to take, within the sphere of their competence, all the general or particular measures that were necessary to ensure that projects were examined
- c in order to determine whether they were likely to have significant effects on the environment and, if so, to ensure that they were subject to an impact assessment. In the main proceedings, if the working of the quarry should have been subject to an assessment of its environmental effects in accordance with the requirements of the directive, the competent authorities were obliged to
- d take all general or particular measures for remedying the failure to carry out such an assessment. Further, it was for the national court to determine whether it was impossible under domestic law for a consent already granted to be revoked or suspended in order to subject the project to an assessment of its environmental effects, in accordance with the requirements of the directive or, alternatively, if the individual so agreed, whether compensation for the harm
- e suffered was appropriate (see judgment paras 64, 66–69, 70, below).

By order of 12 February 2002, the High Court of Justice of England and Wales, Queen's Bench Division (Administrative Court), referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) five questions (set out in judgment para 32, below) on the interpretation of Council Directive (EEC) 85/337 (on

- a the assessment of the effects of certain public and private projects on the environment). Those questions were raised in proceedings between Delena Wells and the Secretary of State for Transport, Local Government and the Regions (the Secretary of State) concerning the grant of a new consent for mining operations at Conygar Quarry without an environmental impact assessment having first been carried out. Written observations were submitted on behalf of: Mrs Wells by R Gordon QC and J Pereira, Barrister, instructed by R Buxton, Solicitor; the United Kingdom government by P Ormond, acting as agent, D Elvin QC and J Maurici, Barrister; the Commission of the European Communities by X Lewis, acting as agent, and N Khan, Barrister. Oral observations were made on behalf of: Mrs Wells, represented by R Gordon and J Pereira, instructed by S Ring, Solicitor; the United Kingdom government, represented by R Caudwell, acting as agent, and D Elvin; and the Commission, represented by X Lewis and N Khan. The language of the case was English. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General.

1. In the present case, the High Court of Justice of England and Wales, Queen's Bench Division (Administrative Court), has referred for a preliminary ruling five questions on the interpretation of Council Directive (EEC) 85/337<sup>2</sup>. Those questions were raised in proceedings between Delena Wells and the United Kingdom authorities concerning resumption of the working of Conygar Quarry, a site for the extraction of construction materials which is located near Mrs Wells' dwelling house.

2. Conygar Quarry, consent for the working of which was granted in 1947, had not been operational for a number of years when Mrs Wells purchased her house in 1984. In 1997 and 1999 the competent authorities established the conditions under which the quarry could be worked again. However, they did not first carry out an environmental impact assessment in respect of the proposed operations, as provided for in Directive 85/337.

3. By its questions, the national court seeks to ascertain, first, whether the provisions of the directive must be applied in the present case and, second, whether Mrs Wells may bring proceedings against the state because the directive has not been applied.

I—LEGAL CONTEXT

A—Community law

4. Directive 85/337 falls within the framework of the action programmes of the European Communities on the environment, according to which the correct approach is to prevent the creation of pollution or nuisances at source, rather than subsequently trying to counteract their effects<sup>3</sup>. It has the objective of ensuring that development consent for public and private projects which are likely to have significant effects on the environment is granted only after prior assessment of those effects<sup>4</sup>. A further aim is that the assessment be conducted on the basis of information supplied by the developer and by the authorities and the people concerned by the project<sup>5</sup>. a

4 Sixth recital in the preamble.

5. 'Development consent' is defined in art 1(2) of the directive as 'the decision of the competent authority or authorities which entitles the developer to proceed with the project'. In accordance with the same provision, the term 'project' covers, inter alia, 'interventions in the natural surroundings and landscape including those involving the extraction of mineral resources'. b

6. Article 2(1) of the directive provides:

'Member States shall adopt all measures necessary to ensure that, before consent is given, projects likely to have significant effects on the environment by virtue inter alia, of their nature, size or location are made subject to an assessment with regard to their effects.'

7. Article 4(1) provides that the projects specified in annex I must systematically be the subject of an environmental impact assessment<sup>6</sup>. Article 4(2) states that projects referred to in annex II are to be assessed only where 'Member States consider that their characteristics so require'. The extraction of construction materials is included in annex II. d

8. Directive 85/337 sets out in arts 5 to 10 and annex III the information necessary for the assessment and the procedure to be followed. In accordance with those provisions, the assessment is to be carried out on the basis of information supplied by the developer. That information must be communicated to the authorities concerned and made available to the public. Those authorities and the public are given an opportunity to express their opinion. The authorities empowered to grant consent for the project must take into consideration all the information gathered in the course of the assessment procedure. Finally, the public must be informed of the decision adopted and of any conditions attached thereto. e

B—National law f

9. In order to meet construction needs after the 1939–45 war, Interim Development Orders (IDOs) were adopted in the United Kingdom from 1946 expressly authorising mineral extraction operations<sup>7</sup>.

10. In 1991 the Planning and Compensation Act 1991<sup>8</sup> entered into force. Section 22 of the Act laid down a special set of rules for old mining permissions granted under an IDO. g

11. According to those rules, any person with an interest in the land or minerals benefiting from an old mining permission has to apply for its registration with the mineral planning authority<sup>9</sup> before 25 March 1992. If this is not done, the old mining permission definitively ceases to have effect<sup>10</sup>. Then, in the 12 months following registration, such a person must apply to the MPA for determination, on the basis of the conditions set out in his h a application, of the conditions to which that permission is subject. The permission likewise definitively ceases to have effect if this requirement is not observed.

<sup>6</sup> Examples of such projects are oil refineries, thermal and nuclear power stations, chemical installations and motorway construction. i

b 12. The 1991 Act draws a distinction between what are termed 'active' and 'dormant' permissions. Permissions are dormant if no development was carried out to any substantial extent in the period of two years ending on 1 May 1991. In the case of active permissions, operations may continue and are subject to new conditions once they have been approved. In the case of dormant permissions, no operations may resume until the conditions have been finally determined.

c 13. The MPA must determine the conditions to which the permission is to be subject within a period of three months, failing which the conditions set out in the application are deemed to be approved. If the MPA defines the conditions within the prescribed period, they may include 'any conditions which may be imposed on a grant of planning permission for development consisting of the winning and working of minerals or involving the depositing of mineral waste'<sup>11</sup>.

d 14. If the conditions differ from those set out in the application, the applicant may appeal to the Secretary of State for Transport, Local Government and the Regions<sup>12</sup>. The decision of the Secretary of State may be challenged within a time limit of six weeks<sup>13</sup>. Also, permissions granted under an IDO for which new conditions have been determined pursuant to the 1991 Act may be modified or revoked before the operations authorised by the permission have been completed<sup>14</sup>.

II—FACTS

A—Background to the dispute

f 15. In 1947 permission to work Conygar Quarry was granted under an IDO. In 1991 quarrying works, which had stopped many years earlier, resumed for a short period. The resumption resulted in blasting operations, movements of heavy goods vehicles on the lane running past Mrs Wells' house and crushing operations. Those workings caused cracking to Mrs Wells' house and forced her to keep her windows shut<sup>15</sup>.

g 16. In accordance with the 1991 Act, the operators of Conygar Quarry had their old mining permission registered on 24 August 1992. The permission was classified as dormant, because no operations had taken place in the two years preceding 1 May 1991. The operators also applied to the MPA for it to determine the conditions of the permission. By determination made on 22 December 1994, the MPA imposed on them conditions more stringent than those proposed in their application<sup>16</sup>.

h 17. The operators exercised their right of appeal to the Secretary of State. On 25 June 1997 he issued his decision letter in which he imposed 54 conditions on the planning permission. He also left some issues to be decided by the MPA, such as the monitoring of noise and of blasting on the site. Those matters were approved by the MPA on 8 July 1999<sup>17</sup>. a

18. No environmental impact assessment within the meaning of Directive 85/337 was carried out prior to adoption of the decision of the Secretary of State of 25 June 1997 and that of the MPA of 8 July 1999. At that time the United Kingdom authorities took the view that the directive did not apply to the determination of new planning conditions under the 1991 Act<sup>18</sup>. However, on 11 February 1999 the House of Lords held, in R v North Yorkshire CC, ex p Brown [1999] 1 All ER 969, [2000] 1 AC 397, that the determination of such conditions was a grant of development consent for the purposes of art 1(2) of the directive<sup>19</sup>. As a result of that decision, United Kingdom legislation was amended in order to make the determination of new planning conditions under the 1991 Act subject to environmental impact assessment in accordance with the directive. That amendment entered into force on 15 December 2000. b

B—The main proceedings

19. By letter of 10 June 1999, Mrs Wells requested the Secretary of State to take action to remedy the lack of an environmental impact assessment in respect of the resumption of operations at Conygar Quarry. Mrs Wells received no reply to her request. She then brought proceedings in the High Court. d

20. Pursuant to an undertaking given to the High Court, the Secretary of State responded to the letter of 10 June 1999 by letter of 28 March 2001. He declined to revoke or modify the planning permission in question or to order discontinuance of any mineral operations. The reasons given by him for that decision included that Community law did not allow him to take action directly against the quarry operators and to remove their development rights. He also stated that the appropriate procedure would have been for Mrs Wells to contest the new planning conditions in 1997. He added that, given the time that had passed, it would run counter to the principle of legal certainty and be disproportionate to call those conditions into question. e

21. Mrs Wells requested the High Court to quash that decision.

III—THE QUESTIONS REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

22. The High Court ([2001] EWHC Admin 227, [2001] 14 EGCS 147) decided to stay proceedings and refer the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling: g

(1) Whether an approval of a new set of conditions on an existing permission granted by an [IDO] pursuant to section 22 and Schedule 2 of the [1991 Act] is a “development consent” for the purposes of the EIA [Environmental Impact Assessment] Directive. h

(2) Whether, following the approval of a new scheme of conditions on an IDO “old mining permission” under the [1991 Act], the approval of further matters required under the new scheme of conditions is itself capable of being a “development consent” for the purposes of the EIA Directive. i

a (3) If the answer to (1) is “yes” but (2) is “no”, is the Member State nevertheless under a continuing duty to remedy its failure to require EIA, and if so, how?

(4) Whether (i) it is open to individual citizens to challenge the State’s failure to require EIA, or whether (ii) that may be prohibited under the limitations imposed by the Court on the doctrine of direct effect e.g. by b “horizontal direct effect” or by the imposition of burdens or obligations on individuals by an emanation of the State.

(5) If the answer to (4)(ii) is “yes” what are the limits of such prohibitions on direct effect in the present circumstances and what steps may the UK lawfully take consistent with the EIA Directive?

c IV—APPRAISAL

A—Preliminary observations

23. Before considering the questions referred for a preliminary ruling, it appears to me that it is necessary to make two observations. The first relates to whether the working of Conygar Quarry constitutes a project subject to prior
d assessment of its environmental effects under Directive 85/337. As indicated above, under art 4(2) of the directive and annex II thereto projects for the extraction of construction materials are subject to prior assessment of their environmental effects only where member states consider that their characteristics so require. Accordingly, member states have a discretion as to whether such projects must be assessed<sup>20</sup>.

e 24. Here, the Secretary of State did not indicate in the decision to which the main proceedings relate that the project comprising the working of Conygar Quarry had to be excluded from the assessment procedure in question pursuant to art 4 of the directive. Nor is the significance of the effects of such a project on the environment contested by the United Kingdom government in f its observations submitted to the court. I will therefore proceed on the premiss, implicitly accepted by the parties and the national court, that the resumption of extraction of construction materials at Conygar Quarry is likely to have significant effects on the environment.

25. The second observation relates to the admissibility of the first two questions referred for a preliminary ruling. The Commission of the European g Communities calls their admissibility into question on the ground that they are not relevant for disposing of the main proceedings. It states, first, that the main proceedings relate to the Secretary of State’s refusal to revoke or modify the planning permission for Conygar Quarry, which implies that development consent has indeed been granted at some point or another. Second, those questions are posited on the assumption that identifying the precise stage at h which development consent has been granted is a question of Community law whereas the court stated in Burgemeester en Wethouders van Haarlemmerliede en Spaarnwoude v Gedeputeerde Staten van Noord-Holland<sup>21</sup>, at paras 20 and 21, that it is a question of national law.

i <sup>20</sup> Their discretion is not unlimited. In World Wildlife Fund (WWF) v Autonome Provinz Bozen Case C-435/97 [1999] ECR I-5613, the court held that the limits of that discretion are to be found in the obligation, set out in art 2(1) of Directive 85/337, that projects likely, by virtue inter alia of their nature, size or location, to have significant effects on the environment are to be subject to an impact assessment. It also indicated that it is for the national court to assess whether, having regard to the project in question, the competent authorities exceeded their discretion by excluding the project from the assessment procedure.

26. I consider that those arguments are not well founded. First of all, it is settled case law that, in the context of the co-operation between the Court of Justice and the national courts provided for by art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty), it is solely for the national court before which the dispute has been brought, and which must assume responsibility for the subsequent judicial decision, to determine in the light of the particular circumstances of the case both the need for a preliminary ruling in order to enable it to deliver judgment and the relevance of the questions which it submits to the court. The court has taken that to mean that a request from a national court may be dismissed only where it is obvious that the interpretation of Community law requested by that court has no bearing on the real situation or on the subject matter of the case<sup>22</sup>.

27. That is not so here. It is apparent from the grounds of the order for reference that the first question referred for a preliminary ruling is intended to enable it to be established whether the determination of the planning conditions for Conygar Quarry pursuant to the 1991 Act is to be regarded as a development consent within the meaning of art 1(2) of Directive 85/337. The answer to that question determines whether the directive is applicable in the main proceedings and, consequently, whether the competent authorities in the United Kingdom were required to carry out a prior assessment of the environmental effects.

28. The second question submitted for a preliminary ruling refers to the fact that the planning conditions for Conygar Quarry were determined in two stages, first in the Secretary of State's decision of 25 June 1997 and then when, on 8 July 1999, the MPA approved the matters which had been reserved for subsequent approval. By this question, the national court seeks to ascertain which of those decisions constitutes the development consent envisaged by art 1(2) of the directive. The answer to this question determines whether, prior to the second decision, the competent authorities in the United Kingdom should have carried out an environmental impact assessment.

29. Both the questions at issue thus appear to me to be entirely relevant for the purpose of disposing of the main proceedings.

30. As to the argument that the concept of development consent as defined in Directive 85/337 has already been interpreted by the court to be a matter for national law, it is difficult to see how that argument could result in the two questions being inadmissible. Those questions concern the interpretation of a provision of Community law and, as we have seen, they are relevant for the purpose of disposing of the main proceedings. Accordingly, the interpretation previously provided by the court could possibly result in the questions at issue being answered under the simplified procedure laid down by art 104(3) of the Rules of Procedure, but not in their being dismissed as inadmissible.

31. For those reasons, I suggest that the court should find the first two questions referred for a preliminary ruling to be admissible and answer them.

B—The first question referred for a preliminary ruling

32. By its first question, the national court essentially asks whether art 1(2) of Directive 85/337 is to be interpreted as meaning that the determination of planning conditions attaching to an old mining permission constitutes a development consent within the meaning of that provision where the old a mining permission was deprived of effect in 1991 and operations cannot resume until those planning conditions have been finally determined.

33. It is to be remembered that the term 'development consent' is defined in art 1(2) of the directive as 'the decision of the competent authority or authorities which entitles the developer to proceed with the project' in question.

b 34. The Commission's primary submission is that that term is purely national in nature. It bases that view on paras 20 and 21 of the judgment in the Gedeputeerde Staten van Noord-Holland case and on the wording of the definition of the term. The United Kingdom government and Mrs Wells do not agree with that view. Neither do I.

c 35. It is admittedly apparent from the wording of the definition of development consent that it is the national law of each member state that establishes the moment from which the developer is granted the right to proceed with the project in question. It is thus national law that determines the procedural rules and the conditions for obtaining development consent. However, that renvoi to national law cannot, in my view, be interpreted as requiring that the scope of 'development consent' also be left to the discretion of each member state. Directive 85/337 is designed to remove the disparities between the laws in force in the various member states with regard to the assessment of the environmental effects of public and private projects<sup>23</sup>. The directive also explains that it is necessary to harmonise 'the principles of the assessment of environmental effects ... in particular with reference to the projects which should be subject to assessment'<sup>24</sup>. It would therefore be clearly contrary to the objectives of the directive and to the principle of uniform application of Community law to accept that the member states may, by defining the concept of development consent very restrictively, take outside the directive projects likely to have significant effects on the environment.

f 36. This analysis does not appear to me to be inconsistent with the view taken by the court in the Gedeputeerde Staten van Noord-Holland case. In that case, the court was asked whether Directive 85/337 is to be interpreted as permitting member states to waive the obligations concerning environmental impact assessments in the case of projects listed in annex I where (i) the projects have already been the subject of a consent granted prior to 3 July 1988, the date by which the directive was to have been transposed into national law; g (ii) the consent was not preceded by an environmental assessment in accordance with the requirements of the directive; and (iii) a fresh consent procedure was formally initiated after 3 July 1988.

h 37. As the court mentioned in para 21 of the judgment, the national court considered it established that the project at issue had been the subject of a new consent for the purposes of art 1(2) of the directive. It was in that context that, in para 20, the court noted as a preliminary point that 'it is for the national court to determine in each case and on the basis of the applicable national law whether approval of the development plan constitutes consent within the meaning of Article 1(2)'. That statement does not in my view preclude the concept of consent from being characterised as autonomous. In other words, it i is for the national court to determine, on the basis of the applicable national law and taking account of the criteria supplied by the court, whether a development consent has been issued for the purposes of art 1(2) of the directive. a

23 Second recital in the preamble.

24 Seventh recital in the preamble.

38. Moreover, the court has already provided criteria for interpreting the concept of development consent, thereby confirming indirectly that it must have a Community meaning. Thus, in the WWF case the court found it necessary to specify the conditions that had to be met in order to fall within the derogation provided for in art 1(5) of the directive, according to which the directive does not 'apply to projects the details of which are adopted by a specific act of national legislation'. The court held, in particular, that the legislative act in question must display the same characteristics as a development consent as defined by art 1(2) of the directive. It specified that the act must lay down the project in detail, that is to say in a sufficiently precise and detailed manner so as to include, 'like development consent, following their consideration by the legislature, all the elements of the project relevant to the environmental impact assessment'<sup>25</sup>. b

39. The term 'development consent' in Directive 85/337 must therefore also have an autonomous dimension. d

40. So far as concerns the substance of the answer to be given to the first question submitted for a preliminary ruling, there are two opposing propositions. The United Kingdom submits that the approval of new conditions attaching to an existing consent granted under an IDO does not constitute a development consent for the purposes of the directive. It contends that the situation in the present case may be equated to that of 'pipeline' projects, that is to say projects in respect of which the consent procedure was initiated before 3 July 1988, the date by which the directive was to have been transposed into national law, and was still in progress on that date. It points out that the court has accepted that the directive does not apply to such projects. e

41. Mrs Wells and the Commission argue that the situation in the present case cannot be equated to that of 'pipeline' projects and that a new development consent within the meaning of Directive 85/337 has indeed been issued. I agree with that analysis. f

42. The case law relating to 'pipeline' projects emerged in the court's judgment in European Commission v Germany<sup>26</sup> and was then set out in more precise terms in the Gedeputeerde Staten van Noord-Holland case. Under that case law, the principle stated in art 2(1) of the directive, according to which projects likely to have significant effects on the environment are to be subject to environmental assessment, does not apply to projects in respect of which the consent procedure was initiated before 3 July 1988 and was still in progress on that date. That solution was adopted because the directive does not lay down transitional provisions for such projects. In addition, the directive is primarily designed to cover large-scale projects which will most often require a long time to complete. The court held that it would therefore not be appropriate for procedures which were already complex at national level and which were formally initiated prior to 3 July 1988 to be made more cumbersome and time-consuming by reason of the specific requirements of the directive, and for situations already established to be affected<sup>27</sup>. g a 43. In the present case, the resumption of the working of Conygar Quarry following the decisions of the Secretary of State and the MPA in 1997 and 1999 cannot be regarded as a project in respect of which the consent procedure had been initiated before 3 July 1988 and was still in progress on that date. It is clear from the order for reference that the operators of Conygar Quarry obtained an actual planning permission in 1947, under an IDO, and that that permission b was still valid on 3 July 1988. However, the permission was deprived of effect pursuant to the 1991 Act because, under that Act, the fact that there had been no operations to any substantial extent in the two years preceding 1 May 1991 meant that there could be no resumption of operations until the new conditions governing them had been finally determined<sup>28</sup>.

c 44. Also, it is apparent from the facts and law at issue in the main proceedings that after 3 July 1988 the operators of Conygar Quarry engaged in the necessary procedures with the competent national authorities in order to be permitted once again to extract materials from that site. It is also apparent that it was the decisions made by the Secretary of State on 25 June 1997 and by the MPA on 8 July 1999 that allowed them to resume operations and that those d decisions set out in a precise and detailed manner the conditions under which the operations could be carried out. Furthermore, those decisions could be challenged. I deduce therefrom that the operators of Conygar Quarry did obtain a fresh decision from the competent authorities entitling them to proceed with their project for the extraction of materials, as envisaged by the definition of development consent set out in art 1(2) of Directive 85/337<sup>29</sup>.

e 45. This analysis appears to me to be consistent with the objectives of the directive which, according to the sixth recital in its preamble and as provided in art 2, seeks to subject to prior assessment any project likely to have significant effects on the environment. The analysis is also consonant with the court's case law seeking to give the directive a broad scope. Thus, in Aannemersbedrijf PK Kraaijeveld BV v Gedeputeerde Staten van Zuid-Holland<sup>30</sup> the court held that the f mere fact that Directive 85/337 does not expressly refer to modifications to projects included in annex II, as opposed to modifications to projects included in annex I, does not justify the conclusion that they are not covered by the directive. It stated that the concept of modifications to projects is covered by the directive, even in relation to projects included in annex II, on the ground
g that the directive's purpose would be undermined if modifications to development projects were so construed as to enable certain works to escape the requirement of an impact assessment although, by reason of their nature, size or location, such works were likely to have significant effects on the environment<sup>31</sup>.

h 46. In view of all of the foregoing, I suggest that the court's answer to the first question referred for a preliminary ruling should be that art 1(2) of Directive 85/337 is to be interpreted as meaning that the determination of planning conditions attaching to an old mining permission constitutes a development consent within the meaning of that provision where the old mining permission was deprived of effect in 1991 and operations cannot resume until those planning conditions have been finally determined.

28 See para 12 of this opinion.

29 That is also the conclusion reached by the House of Lords in Ex parte Brown, cited above.

30 Case C-72/95 [1997] All ER (EC) 134, [1996] ECR I-5403.

31 See para 39.

C—The second question referred for a preliminary ruling

47. In its second question, the national court seeks to ascertain, should the first question be answered in the affirmative, whether, if the planning conditions attaching to an old mining permission have been imposed in two stages, determination of the detailed conditions at the second stage is capable of constituting development consent within the meaning of art 1(2) of Directive 85/337. a

48. The national court states that the problem arises because, in accordance with domestic law, the principle of permitting operations to resume was established when the principal conditions were determined by the Secretary of State on 25 June 1997. This means that the determination by the MPA of the matters reserved for its approval could not extend beyond the parameters established by the Secretary of State. However, operations were unable to resume without the MPA's approval on 8 July 1999 of those matters<sup>32</sup>. b

49. It is apparent from the court's case law that the fact that the working of Conygar Quarry could not resume without the MPA's determining the matters reserved for its approval is not the decisive criterion for deciding whether or not the determination of those matters constitutes development consent within the meaning of Directive 85/337. The decisive factor, where the administrative procedure applicable to the implementation of a project covered by the directive involves several stages, concerns when, in the course of that procedure, the objectives of the directive may be regarded as having been achieved. c

50. In Luxembourg v Linster<sup>33</sup>, the court was asked to interpret the concept of a specific act of national legislation in art 1(5) of Directive 85/337, the effects of which are comparable to those of a development consent within the meaning of the directive. The case involved deciding whether the term specific act of national legislation covers a law, adopted by a parliament after public debate, which authorises construction of a motorway but without laying down its route. The court ruled that that term covers such a law— d

'where the legislative process has enabled the objectives pursued by Directive 85/337, including that of supplying information, to be achieved, and the information available to the parliament at the time when the details of the project were adopted was equivalent to that which would have been submitted to the competent authority in an ordinary procedure for granting consent for a project.'<sup>34</sup> e

The court considered that, even if the route of the planned motorway was not laid down by the legislative act in question, it was possible, for example where several alternative routes were studied in detail on the basis of information supplied by the developer and by the authorities and members of the public concerned, for those alternatives to have been recognised by the legislature as having an equivalent environmental impact<sup>35</sup>. f

51. In addition, according to the first recital in its preamble, Directive 85/337 has the objective that the competent authority should take account of the environmental impact of the project in question at the earliest possible stage in the decision-making process. g

a 52. I deduce from those factors that where, as in the present case, the consent procedure is in two stages, one involving determination of the principal planning conditions and the other involving determination of some detailed conditions, the environmental impact assessment is to take place at the first stage. In light of the view taken by the court in Linster's case, cited above, it is also possible to accept that development consent within the meaning of art 1(2) of Directive 85/337 is granted on determination of the principal conditions if the directive's objectives have been achieved. That implies that all the elements of the project in question which are likely to have environmental effects must have been subject to prior assessment under the conditions laid down by the directive<sup>36</sup>.

c 53. It is to be remembered in this regard that, according to the sixth recital in the preamble to the directive, that assessment must be conducted on the basis of the information supplied by the developer and the opinions of the authorities and people concerned. Under art 5(2) of the directive and Annex III thereto, the minimum information to be supplied by the developer is to consist of a description of the project comprising information on the site, design and size of the project, a description of the measures envisaged in order to avoid, reduce and, if possible, remedy significant adverse effects, and the data required to identify and assess the main effects which the project is likely to have on the environment<sup>37</sup>. It is also apparent from arts 6 and 8 that that information must be made available to the public concerned, that the public concerned must have been given the opportunity to express an opinion and that all those matters must be taken into account by the competent authority in the consent procedure for the project.

f 54. It is therefore only if the environmental impact of the conditions remaining to be determined has already been assessed by the competent authority, in accordance with the above-mentioned detailed rules, in the course of adoption of the decision determining the principal conditions that that decision may be regarded as the development consent envisaged by art 1(2) of Directive 85/337. If that is not the case, the assessment will have to be supplemented in order to settle the remaining conditions and it is the decision determining those conditions that will have to be regarded as the development consent within the meaning of the directive.

g 55. It is for national courts to decide, in the particular circumstances of the case, at what stage of the administrative procedure the objectives of Directive 85/337 were achieved<sup>38</sup>. In the present case, as no environmental impact assessment was carried out, it is difficult to see how the national court could take the view that the objectives of the directive were achieved on the adoption by the Secretary of State of the decision of 25 June 1997. Consequently, if the conditions determined by the MPA in its decision of 8 July 1999 were likely to have significant effects on the environment<sup>39</sup>, the MPA, pursuant to the directive, was required to have a prior assessment of those effects carried out. It will be for the national court to appraise whether the conditions determined by the MPA on 8 July 1999 were likely to have significant effects on the environment.

i 36 See, to this effect, the WWF case (para 60), cited in footnote 20, above.

37 See Linster's case (para 55), cited in footnote 33, above.

38 See Linster's case (para 58).

39 It is indicated in the order for reference (para 27) that the operators of Conygar Quarry had to submit to the MPA, inter alia, proposed improvements to access, a detailed scheme of working, a scheme for monitoring of blasting and a scheme of noise monitoring.

56. In view of the foregoing, I suggest that the court's answer to the second question referred for a preliminary ruling should be that art 1(2) of Directive 85/337 is to be interpreted as meaning that, if the planning conditions attaching to an old mining permission have been imposed in two stages, determination of the detailed conditions at the second stage constitutes development consent within the meaning of that provision where those latter conditions are likely to have effects on the environment and those effects were not assessed by the competent authority in accordance with the detailed rules prescribed by the directive in the course of adoption of the decision determining the principal conditions.

D—The third question referred for a preliminary ruling

57. The national court has asked the third question referred for a preliminary ruling only in the event that the first question is answered in the affirmative and the second question is answered in the negative. In view of the answer which I propose to give to the second question, I consider that there is no need to answer the third question.

E—The fourth question referred for a preliminary ruling

58. By this question, the national court asks, in essence, whether arts 1(2) and 2(1) of Directive 85/337 are to be interpreted as meaning that, where their provisions have not been complied with, individuals may rely on them before the court of a member state against national authorities or whether the limits imposed by the court on the direct effect of directives preclude decisions incompatible with those provisions from being set aside or modified.

59. As is apparent from the order for reference, this question arises because the Secretary of State contends that adoption of the measures sought by the claimant, such as revocation of the planning permission or modification of the conditions governing it, would oblige the United Kingdom government to take measures having adverse consequences for the operators of Conygar Quarry. According to the Secretary of State, that would run counter to the limits laid down by the court on the direct effect of directives. He points out that the court stated in Marshall v Southampton and South West Hampshire Area Health Authority (Teaching)<sup>40</sup> that a directive may not of itself impose obligations on an individual. He also observes that it held in Criminal proceedings against Kolpinghuis Nijmegen BV<sup>41</sup> that a national authority may not rely, as against an individual, upon a provision of a directive whose necessary implementation in national law has not yet taken place.

60. Like the claimant and the Commission, I consider that the Secretary of State's line of argument cannot be followed and that the first part of the fourth question should be answered in the affirmative. I found that assessment on the following matters.

61. It is settled case law that where a member state has failed to implement a directive by the end of the period prescribed or to implement it correctly, the provisions of the directive which, so far as their subject matter is concerned, are unconditional and sufficiently precise may be relied upon by individuals against that member state before national courts<sup>42</sup>. It is also settled case law a that where the directive in question confers a genuine discretion on the member states, individuals may request the national courts to review whether the member states have exceeded it. That last possibility has been recognised by the court, in particular, in the context of interpretation of Directive 85/337, in its judgments in the Kraaijeveld case, the WWF case and Linster's case.

b 62. In the present case, it is not in dispute that Mrs Wells is entitled to invoke the provisions of Directive 85/337. Mrs Wells' ability to do so may be deduced from the above-mentioned judgments in that she, like the applicants in the cases which gave rise to those judgments, is asking the national court to review whether a measure of domestic law is consistent with the directive, a review which is capable of resulting in that measure being declared invalid. Such an ability could also follow, in my view, from the fact that the provisions of the directive requiring the member states to make consent for projects likely to have significant effects on the environment subject to a prior assessment of those effects in the context of which the persons concerned must have the opportunity to express their opinion are sufficiently precise.

c 63. The corollary of that entitlement conferred on individuals is the duty of the member states, laid down by art 10 EC (formerly art 5 of the EC Treaty), to take all appropriate measures, whether general or particular, to ensure fulfilment of the obligations on them under Community law. Among these is the obligation to nullify the unlawful consequences of a breach of Community law<sup>43</sup>. That law is binding on all the authorities of the member states, including judicial authorities. It has been consistently held that the national courts, whose task it is to apply the provisions of Community law in areas within their jurisdiction, must ensure that those rules take full effect and must protect the rights which they confer on individuals<sup>44</sup>. The national court must therefore set aside any measure of national law preventing Community rules from having full force and effect<sup>45</sup>. That obligation is owed in light of the principles of direct effect and of precedence of Community law<sup>46</sup>.

f 64. It follows that, where the provisions of Directive 85/337 have not been complied with, the national courts and national administrative authorities have the task, as the court held in the Kraaijeveld case and the WWF case, of taking all the measures, whether general or particular, necessary in order for an environmental impact assessment to be carried out in respect of the project in question.

g 65. In my view, the limits on the direct effect of directives imposed by the court's case law cannot, in any event, prevent that obligation from being performed. It is appropriate to recall those limits.

h 66. In Marshall's case the court indicated that a directive's binding nature, apparent from art 249 EC (formerly art 189 of the EC Treaty), exists only in relation to each member state to which the directive is addressed. It deduced therefrom that a directive may not of itself impose obligations on an individual and that a provision of 'a directive may not be relied upon as such against such a person<sup>47</sup>. The case law has drawn two inferences from this statement that a directive can have only 'ascending' vertical effect. First, directives do not have 'horizontal' direct effect, that is to say they cannot be invoked as such by an individual in proceedings against another individual. According to the court, the effect of extending the case law on the possibility of relying on directives against public authorities to the sphere of relations between individuals 'would be to recognise a power in the Community to enact obligations for individuals with immediate effect, whereas it has competence to do so only where it is empowered to adopt regulations'<sup>48</sup>. Second, directives cannot have 'descending' vertical direct effect, which means that a national authority may not rely, as against an individual, upon a provision of a directive whose implementation in national law has not yet taken place<sup>49</sup>.

67. In my view, neither of those principles in the case law constitutes an obstacle to the adoption by the competent national authorities of the measures sought by Mrs Wells such as revocation of the planning permission or modification of the conditions established in 1997 and 1999.

f
68. First, the principle that directives do not have horizontal direct effect does not amount to an obstacle because the main proceedings are not between Mrs Wells and the operators of Conygar Quarry but between her and a state entity<sup>50</sup>. A classic case of 'vertical' direct effect of directives is therefore involved. In such a case, it is perfectly conceivable that the judicial decision which, following the judgment interpreting Community law pronounced by the Court of Justice, must be delivered by the court having jurisdiction, and then any decision adopted pursuant to the national judgment by the competent administrative authorities, will have repercussions on the rights of individuals. In light of the court's case law, even certainty that that will be so is no justification for denying the applicant the right to rely on provisions of a directive which has not been transposed into national law or has been transposed incorrectly. Thus, in Fratelli Costanzo SpA v Comune di Milano<sup>51</sup> the court accepted the right of a tenderer for a public works contract to plead the provisions of a directive in proceedings with a municipality challenging the latter's decision to award the contract to a competitor<sup>52</sup>. Likewise, in R v

49 See Pretore di Salò v Persons Unknown Case 14/86 [1987] ECR 2545 (para 19) and the Kolpinghuis Nijmegen case (para 10), cited in footnote 41, above.

50 The court has extended the scope of the 'vertical' direct effect of directives by holding that their provisions are enforceable not only against the member state as such, but also against organisations or bodies which are subject to the authority or control of the state or have special powers beyond those which result from the normal rules applicable to relations between individuals, such as local or regional authorities or other bodies which, irrespective of their legal form, have been given responsibility, by the public authorities and under their supervision, for providing a public service (see Kampelmann's case (para 46), cited in footnote 42, above).

52 The national court asked the Court of Justice whether administrative authorities, including municipal authorities, are under the same obligation as a national court to apply the provisions of the directive in question and to refrain from applying provisions of national law which conflict with them. Very logically, the court held that 'it would ... be contradictory to rule that an individual may rely upon the provisions of a directive ... in proceedings ... seeking an order against the administrative authorities, and yet to hold that those authorities are under no obligation to apply the provisions of the directive and refrain from applying provisions of national law which conflict with them' (para 31).

a Medicines Control Agency, ex p Smith & Nephew Pharmaceuticals Ltd<sup>53</sup> it considered that a business could plead the provisions of a directive in order to challenge the validity of a marketing authorisation for a medicinal product granted to a competitor.

b 69. Nor, second, can the principle that directives do not have descending vertical direct effect constitute an obstacle to adoption of the measures sought. It is to be remembered that this principle is intended to prevent a member state from relying on a directive's provisions when, contrary to its obligations pursuant to the directive itself and art 10 EC, it has not taken the measures necessary for transposition of the directive into national law. The principle is thus intended to prevent the state in question from deriving an advantage from its own failure to act<sup>54</sup>. However, it cannot constitute an obstacle to performance, by the national authorities, of their obligation to nullify the consequences of breach of a directive's provisions, first, by setting aside the national measures incompatible with those provisions and, second, by taking the measures necessary in order for the requirements contained therein to be implemented. In such a case the state does not impose obligations on an individual to its own advantage on the basis of an untransposed directive, but adopts all the measures necessary for implementing that directive.

c 70. Acceptance of the converse proposition would mean that a member state which has not transposed a directive into national law within the prescribed period or has transposed it incorrectly would then be precluded from making good its failure wherever implementation of Community law would have the effect of imposing obligations on individuals or compromising their rights. The consequence of such an interpretation of the principle that directives do not have descending vertical direct effect would, without a doubt, be to undermine the principle of primacy of Community law enshrined by the court, in its fundamental judgment in Costa v ENEL<sup>55</sup>, as a condition of the Community's very existence.

f 71. It follows that the limits laid down by the court on the direct effect of directives do not constitute obstacles preventing Mrs Wells from relying on the provisions of Directive 85/337 before national courts or the state judicial and administrative authorities from taking all appropriate measures to nullify the unlawful consequences of the breach of that directive and to ensure that its requirements are observed so far as concerns the working of Conygar Quarry. In the absence of Community rules concerning the conditions under which that obligation is to be performed, it will be for those authorities to fulfil it in accordance with the rules of national law, within the limits, resulting from the principles of equivalence and effectiveness, which circumscribe the procedural autonomy of the national systems<sup>56</sup>.

g 72. In view of the foregoing, I suggest that the court's answer to the fourth question referred for a preliminary ruling should be that arts 1(2) and 2(1) of

i 54 The court has inferred therefrom, in particular, that a directive cannot, of itself and independently of a national law adopted by a member state for its implementation, have the effect of determining or aggravating the liability in criminal law of persons who act in contravention of the provisions of that directive (see the Pretore di Salò case (para 20), cited in footnote 49, above, the Kolpinghuis Nijmegen case (para 13), cited in footnote 41, above, and Criminal proceedings against Arcaro Case C-168/95 [1997] All ER (EC) 82, [1996] ECR I-4705 (para 37)).

56 See Preston v Wolverhampton Healthcare NHS Trust, Fletcher v Midland Bank plc Case C-78/98 [2000] All ER (EC) 714, [2000] ECR I-3201 (para 31).

Directive 85/337 are to be interpreted as meaning that, where their provisions have not been complied with, individuals may rely on them before the court of a member state against the national authorities and the limits laid down by the court on the direct effect of directives do not preclude decisions incompatible with those provisions from being set aside or modified. a

73. The national court has asked this question only if the answer to the preceding question were to be that the limits imposed by the court on the direct effect of directives preclude decisions incompatible with the provisions of Directive 85/337 from being set aside or modified. In view of the answer which I have proposed that the court give to that question, I consider it unnecessary to answer the fifth question. c

V—CONCLUSION

74. In view of the foregoing considerations, I propose that the Court of Justice should answer as follows the questions asked by the national court: d

(1) Article 1(2) of Council Directive (EEC) 85/337 (on the assessment of the effects of certain public and private projects on the environment) is to be interpreted as meaning that the determination of planning conditions attaching to an old mining permission constitutes a development consent within the meaning of that provision where the old mining permission was deprived of effect in 1991 and operations cannot resume until those planning conditions have been finally determined. e

(2) If the planning conditions have been imposed in two stages, determination of the detailed conditions at the second stage constitutes development consent within the meaning of art 1(2) of Directive 85/337 where those latter conditions are likely to have significant effects on the environment and those effects were not assessed by the competent authority in accordance with the detailed rules prescribed by the directive in the course of adoption of the decision determining the principal conditions. f

(3) Articles 1(2) and 2(1) of Directive 85/337 are to be interpreted as meaning that, where their provisions have not been complied with, individuals may rely on them before the court of a member state against national authorities and the limits laid down by the court on the direct effect of directives do not preclude decisions incompatible with those provisions from being set aside or modified. g

7 January 2004. The COURT OF JUSTICE (Fifth Chamber) delivered the following judgment. h

1. By order of 12 February 2002, received at the Court of Justice of the European Communities on 6 May 2002, the High Court of Justice of England and Wales, Queen's Bench Division (Administrative Court), referred to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) five questions on the interpretation of Council Directive (EEC) 85/337 (on the assessment of the effects of certain public and private projects on the environment) (OJ 1985 L175 p 40). i

2. Those questions were raised in proceedings between Mrs Wells and the Secretary of State for Transport, Local Government and the Regions (hereinafter the Secretary of State) concerning the grant of a new consent for

- a mining operations at Conygar Quarry without an environmental impact assessment having first been carried out.

LEGAL CONTEXT

Community legislation

- b 3. As stated in the fifth recital in its preamble, Directive 85/337 is intended to introduce general principles for the assessment of environmental effects with a view to supplementing and co-ordinating development consent procedures for public and private projects likely to have a major effect on the environment.

4. Article 1(2) of the directive defines 'development consent' as 'the decision of the competent authority or authorities which entitles the developer to proceed with the project'.

- c 5. Article 2(1) of the directive states:

'Member States shall adopt all measures necessary to ensure that, before consent is given, projects likely to have significant effects on the environment by virtue inter alia, of their nature, size or location are made subject to an assessment with regard to their effects.

- d These projects are defined in Article 4.'

6. In Article 4, the directive divides projects into two wide categories: those likely by their nature to give rise to significant effects on the environment and those which will not necessarily do so in all cases. Article 4(2) thus provides:

- e 'Projects of the classes listed in Annex II shall be made subject to an assessment, in accordance with Articles 5 to 10, where Member States consider that their characteristics so require.

To this end Member States may inter alia specify certain types of projects as being subject to an assessment or may establish the criteria and/or thresholds necessary to determine which of the projects of the classes listed in Annex II are to be subject to an assessment in accordance with Articles 5 to 10.'

- f 7. Point 2(c) of Annex II to the directive refers to projects for 'extraction of minerals other than metalliferous and energy-producing minerals, such as marble, sand, gravel, shale, salt, phosphates and potash'.

- g National legislation

8. Prior to the Town and Country Planning Act 1947, the Town and Country Planning (General Interim Development) Order 1946 empowered the competent authorities to grant, by interim development orders, consents for mineral extraction (old mining permissions) in order to respond to the need for construction materials which arose during the period immediately following the 1939-45 war.

- h 9. Since then, the Town and Country Planning Act, as enacted in 1947 and in its subsequent versions, has constituted the principal legal instrument relating to land planning in the United Kingdom.

- i 10. The Act lays down general rules concerning both the grant of planning permission and the modification or revocation of such permission.

11. Thus, under ss 97 and 100 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990, the competent authorities have the power to revoke or modify any permission on planning grounds. The power to revoke a permission may be exercised at any time before the operations authorised have been completed.

12. By virtue of paras 1 and 11 of Sch 9 to the Town and Country Planning Act 1990, the competent authorities may by order require discontinuance of the use of land for the winning and working of minerals or impose certain conditions on the continuance of such use. a

13. Section 22 of the Planning and Compensation Act 1991 lays down a special set of rules for old mining permissions.

14. Section 22(3) of the 1991 Act provides that if no development has, at any time in the period of two years ending on 1 May 1991, been carried out to any substantial extent, operations may not resume until 'the conditions to which the [old mining] permission is to be subject' have been determined and registered in accordance with s 22(2). On the other hand, if no application for registration is made before 25 March 1992, the old mining permission will cease to have effect (s 22(4) of the Act and para 1(3) of Sch 2 thereto). b

15. Schedule 2 to the 1991 Act describes in detail the procedures for determining the registration conditions.

16. Under paras 1 and 2 of Sch 2 to the 1991 Act, applications for registration and for determination of planning conditions are to be made to the competent mineral planning authority (hereinafter MPA). d

17. If the conditions determined by the MPA differ from those set out in the application, the applicant may appeal to the Secretary of State (para 5(2) of Sch 2 to the 1991 Act).

18. In accordance with s 22(7) of the 1991 Act, the provisions relating to old mining permissions are to have effect as if they were included in the 1990 Act. That presumption has the effect of integrating the provisions relating to old mining permissions into the general land use planning regime, in so far as no specific provision was adopted in the 1991 Act. e

19. Under the Town and Country Planning (Assessment of Environmental Effects) Regulations 1988, SI 1988/1199, mining permissions granted pursuant to the 1990 Act are subject to environmental impact assessment in accordance with Directive 85/337. The regime prescribed in s 22 of the 1991 Act for old mining permissions was not, on the other hand, considered to be subject to such an environmental impact assessment procedure. f

THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND THE QUESTIONS REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

20. In 1947 an old mining permission was granted for Conygar Quarry by interim development order under the 1946 order. g

21. Conygar Quarry is divided into two sections, of slightly more than 7.5 hectares each, separated by a road on which Mrs Wells' house is situated. Mrs Wells bought her house in 1984, that is to say 37 years after the permission had been granted, but at a time when the quarry had long since been dormant. However, in June 1991 operations recommenced for a short period. h

22. The site is recognised to be environmentally extremely sensitive. The area in or adjacent to which the quarry lies is subject to several designations of nature and environmental conservation importance.

23. At the beginning of 1991, the owners of Conygar Quarry applied to the competent MPA for registration of the old mining permission under the 1991 Act. i

24. Registration was granted by a decision of 24 August 1992, which stated that no development could lawfully be carried out unless and until an application for the determination of new planning conditions had been made to the MPA and finally determined (the registration decision).

a 25. The owners of Conygar Quarry therefore applied to the competent MPA for determination of new planning conditions.

26. After the MPA, by decision of 22 December 1994, had imposed more stringent conditions than those submitted by the owners of Conygar Quarry, the latter exercised their right of appeal to the Secretary of State.

b 27. By decision of 25 June 1997 (hereinafter, together with the decision of 22 December 1994, the decision determining new conditions), the Secretary of State imposed 54 planning conditions, leaving some matters to be decided by the competent MPA.

28. Those matters were approved by the competent MPA by decision of 8 July 1999 (hereinafter the decision approving matters reserved by the new conditions).

c 29. Neither the Secretary of State nor the competent MPA examined whether it was necessary to carry out an environmental impact assessment pursuant to Directive 85/337. At no time was a formal environmental statement considered.

d 30. By letter of 10 June 1999, Mrs Wells requested the Secretary of State to take appropriate action, namely revocation or modification of the planning permission, to remedy the lack of an environmental impact assessment in the consent procedure. Since she received no reply to her request, she brought proceedings before the High Court of Justice.

e 31. Pursuant to an undertaking given to the High Court at the first hearing, the Secretary of State, by letter of 28 March 2001, provided a reasoned response to Mrs Wells' letter, in which he declined to revoke or modify the planning permission. Mrs Wells then amended her initial application to include a challenge to the decision contained in the letter of 28 March 2001.

f 32. Since the High Court of Justice of England and Wales, Queen's Bench Division (Administrative Court) ([2001] EWHC Admin 227, [2001] 14 EGCS 147), considered that interpretation of Community law was needed in the case before it, it decided to stay proceedings and refer the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

g '(1) Whether an approval of a new set of conditions on an existing permission granted by an Interim Development Order ("old mining permission") pursuant to section 22 and Schedule 2 of the Planning and Compensation Act 1991 is a "development consent" for the purposes of the EIA [Environmental Impact Assessment] Directive.

h (2) Whether, following the approval of a new scheme of conditions on an IDO "old mining permission" under the Planning and Compensation Act 1991, the approval of further matters required under the new scheme of conditions is itself capable of being a "development consent" for the purposes of the EIA Directive.

(3) If the answer to (1) is "yes" but (2) is "no", is the Member State nevertheless under a continuing duty to remedy its failure to require EIA, and if so, how?

i (4) Whether (i) it is open to individual citizens to challenge the State's failure to require EIA, or whether (ii) that may be prohibited under the limitations imposed by the Court on the doctrine of direct effect e.g. by "horizontal direct effect" or by the imposition of burdens or obligations on individuals by an emanation of the State.

(5) If the answer to (4)(ii) is “yes” what are the limits of such prohibitions on direct effect in the present circumstances and what steps may the UK lawfully take consistent with the EIA Directive?’

CONSIDERATION OF THE QUESTIONS REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING
The first and second questions: the obligation to carry out an environmental impact assessment

33. By its first two questions, which it is appropriate to consider together, the referring court essentially asks whether art 2(1) of Directive 85/337, read in conjunction with art 4(2) thereof, is to be interpreted as meaning that, in the context of applying provisions such as s 22 of the 1991 Act and Sch 2 to that Act, the decisions adopted by the competent authorities, whose effect is to permit the resumption of mining operations, involve a ‘development consent’ within the meaning of art 1(2) of that directive, so that the competent authorities are obliged, where appropriate, to carry out an assessment of the environmental effects of such operations.

Classification as a ‘development consent’

—Admissibility

34. While recognising that Community law favours giving an autonomous interpretation to concepts used in Community measures, the Commission of the European Communities contends that in Burgemeester en Wethouders van Haarlemmerliede en Spaarnwoude v Gedeputeerde Staten van Noord-Holland Case C-81/96 [1998] ECR I-3923 the court held that the question of when ‘development consent’ is granted is a question of national law. In the Commission’s submission, the court did not resile from that position in World Wildlife Fund (WWF) v Autonome Provinz Bozen Case C-435/97 [1999] ECR I-5613 and Luxembourg v Linster Case C-287/98 [2000] ECR I-6917. The question whether certain procedural measures in national law are development consents for the purpose of Directive 85/337 is therefore inadmissible.

35. As to that, a question referred by a national court for a preliminary ruling is inadmissible only if it is quite obvious that the question does not concern the interpretation of Community law or that it is hypothetical (see, inter alia, Meilicke v ADV/ORGa AG Case C-83/91 [1992] ECR I-4871 (paras 25, 32), BP Supergas Anonimos Etairia Geniki Emporiki-Viomichaniki kai Antiprossopeion v Greece Case C-62/93 [1995] All ER (EC) 684, [1995] ECR I-1883 (para 10) and Furlanis Construzioni Generali SpA v Azienda Nazionale Autonoma Strade (ANAS) Case C-143/94 [1995] ECR I-3633 (para 12)).

36. That is not the case here.

37. The question whether the decision determining new conditions and the decision approving matters reserved by the new conditions constitute development consent within the meaning of art 1(2) of Directive 85/337 is a question concerning the interpretation of Community law. The court has consistently held that, in light of both the principle that Community law should be applied uniformly and the principle of equality, the terms of a provision of Community law which makes no express reference to the law of the member states for the purpose of determining its meaning and scope is normally to be given throughout the Community an autonomous and uniform interpretation which must take into account the context of the provision and the purpose of the legislation in question (see Ekro BV Vee- en Vleeshandel v Produktschap voor Vee en Vlees C-327/82 [1984] ECR 107 (para 11), and Linster’s case (para 43)).

a 38. Accordingly, the question whether the decision determining new conditions and the decision approving matters reserved by the new conditions constitute development consent within the meaning of art 1(2) of Directive 85/337 is admissible.

—Substance

b 39. The United Kingdom government contends that neither the decision determining new conditions nor the decision approving matters reserved by the new conditions constitutes development consent within the meaning of art 1(2) of the directive.

c 40. It states with regard to the decision determining new conditions that development was authorised many years before the directive created obligations for the member states. The determination of conditions under the 1991 Act involves merely the detailed regulation of activities for which the principal consent has already been given. In the United Kingdom government's submission, the reasoning with regard to the decision determining new conditions and the decision approving matters reserved by d the new conditions is therefore the same as in 'pipeline' cases (see para 43 of this judgment). For reasons of legal certainty, the directive does not apply to such projects.

e 41. As regards the decision approving matters reserved by the new conditions, the United Kingdom government observes that the decision likely to affect the environment had already been taken and the approval of details may not extend beyond the parameters set by the initial determination of the scheme of planning conditions.

f 42. As to those submissions, under art 2(1) of Directive 85/337 projects likely to have significant effects on the environment, as referred to in art 4 of the directive read in conjunction with Annexes I and II thereto, must be made subject to an assessment with regard to such effects before consent is given.

g 43. This does not apply only where consent was granted before 3 July 1988 (an old consent), that is to say before the time limit laid down for implementation of Directive 85/337, or where consent was granted after 3 July 1988 but the consent procedure was initiated before that date ('pipeline' projects) (see, to this effect, European Commission v Germany Case C-431/92 [1995] ECR I-2189 (para 32) and the Gedeputeerde Staten van Noord-Holland case (para 23)). The directive thus requires an assessment of the environmental effects of the project in question in the case of new consents.

h 44. In the main proceedings, the owners of Conygar Quarry were obliged under the 1991 Act, if they wished to resume working of the quarry, to have the old mining permission registered and to seek decisions determining new planning conditions and approving matters reserved by those conditions. Had they not done so, the permission would have ceased to have effect.

i 45. Without new decisions such as those referred to in the previous paragraph, there would no longer have been 'consent', within the meaning of art 2(1) of Directive 85/337, to work the quarry.

i 46. It would undermine the effectiveness of that directive to regard as mere modification of an existing 'consent' the adoption of decisions which, in circumstances such as those of the main proceedings, replace not only the terms but the very substance of a prior consent, such as the old mining permission.

47. Accordingly, decisions such as the decision determining new conditions and the decision approving matters reserved by the new conditions for the working of Conygar Quarry must be considered to constitute, as a whole, a new 'consent' within the meaning of art 2(1) of the directive, read in conjunction with art 1(2) thereof. a

48. It should be added that, since those decisions were adopted on 25 June 1997 and 8 July 1999 respectively, an old consent granted before 3 July 1988 is not in issue. Nor is this a 'pipeline' case since the applications leading to the decisions were submitted in 1993 or 1994 and in 1997 or 1998 respectively. b

The time at which the environmental impact assessment must be carried out

49. Given that, in the context of a consent procedure comprising several stages, merely establishing that there is a 'development consent' within the meaning of Directive 85/337 cannot provide the referring court with a complete answer as regards the obligation on member states to carry out an assessment of the environmental effects of the project at issue, it is necessary to consider the question as to when such an assessment must be carried out. c

50. As provided in art 2(1) of the directive, the environmental impact assessment must be carried out 'before consent is given'. d

51. According to the first recital in the preamble to the directive, the competent authority is to take account of the environmental effects of the project in question 'at the earliest possible stage' in the decision-making process.

52. Accordingly, where national law provides that the consent procedure is to be carried out in several stages, one involving a principal decision and the other involving an implementing decision which cannot extend beyond the parameters set by the principal decision, the effects which the project may have on the environment must be identified and assessed at the time of the procedure relating to the principal decision. It is only if those effects are not identifiable until the time of the procedure relating to the implementing decision that the assessment should be carried out in the course of that procedure. e

53. The answer to the first two questions must therefore be that art 2(1) of Directive 85/337, read in conjunction with art 4(2) thereof, is to be interpreted as meaning that, in the context of applying provisions such as s 22 of the 1991 Act and Sch 2 to that Act, the decisions adopted by the competent authorities, whose effect is to permit the resumption of mining operations, comprise, as a whole, a 'development consent' within the meaning of art 1(2) of that directive, so that the competent authorities are obliged, where appropriate, to carry out an assessment of the environmental effects of such operations. f

In a consent procedure comprising several stages, that assessment must, in principle, be carried out as soon as it is possible to identify and assess all the effects which the project may have on the environment. g

The fourth and fifth questions: the ability of individuals to invoke the provisions of Directive 85/337 h

54. By its fourth and fifth questions, which it is appropriate to consider together, the referring court essentially asks whether, in circumstances such as those of the main proceedings, an individual may, where appropriate, rely on art 2(1) of the directive, read in conjunction with arts 1(2) and 4(2) thereof, or whether the principle of legal certainty precludes such an interpretation. i

a The 'direct effect' of art 2(1) of Directive 85/337, read in conjunction with arts 1(2) and 4(2)

55. According to the United Kingdom government, acceptance that an individual is entitled to invoke art 2(1) of the directive, read in conjunction with arts 1(2) and 4(2) thereof, would amount to 'inverse direct effect' directly obliging the member state concerned, at the request of an individual, such as Mrs Wells, to deprive another individual or individuals, such as the owners of Conygar Quarry, of their rights.

b 56. As to that submission, the principle of legal certainty prevents directives from creating obligations for individuals. For them, the provisions of a directive can only create rights (see Marshall v Southampton and South West Hampshire Area Health Authority (Teaching) Case 152/84 [1986] 2 All ER 584, [1986] ECR 723 (para 48)). Consequently, an individual may not rely on a directive against a member state where it is a matter of a state obligation directly linked to the performance of another obligation falling, pursuant to that directive, on a third party (see, to this effect, ECSC v Acciaierie e Ferriere Busseni SpA (in liq) Case C-221/88 [1990] ECR I-495 (paras 23–26), and Verband deutscher Daihatsu-Händler eV v Daihatsu Deutschland GmbH Case C-97/96 [1997] ECR I-6843 (paras 24, 26)).

c 57. On the other hand, mere adverse repercussions on the rights of third parties, even if the repercussions are certain, do not justify preventing an individual from invoking the provisions of a directive against the member state concerned (see to this effect, in particular, Fratelli Costanzo SpA v Comune di Milano Case 103/88 [1989] ECR 1839 (paras 28–33), the WWF case (paras 69, 71), CIA Security International SA v Signalson SA Case C-194/94 [1996] All ER (EC) 557, [1996] ECR I-2201 (paras 40–55), R v Medicines Control Agency, ex p Smith & Nephew Pharmaceuticals Ltd Case C-201/94 (1996) 34 BMLR 141, [1996] ECR I-5819 (paras 33–39) and Unilever Italia SpA v Central Foos SpA Case C-443/98 [2000] ECR I-7535 (paras 45–52)).

d 58. In the main proceedings, the obligation on the member state concerned to ensure that the competent authorities carry out an assessment of the environmental effects of the working of the quarry is not directly linked to the performance of any obligation which would fall, pursuant to Directive 85/337, on the quarry owners. The fact that mining operations must be halted to await the results of the assessment is admittedly the consequence of the belated performance of that state's obligations. Such a consequence cannot, however, as the United Kingdom claims, be described as 'inverse direct effect' of the provisions of that directive in relation to the quarry owners.

e The period that elapsed between the decision determining new conditions and Mrs Wells' request that the situation be remedied

59. The United Kingdom government further submits that the considerable period which has elapsed since the decision determining new conditions in 1997 renders revocation of that decision contrary to the principle of legal certainty. The claimant in the main proceedings should have challenged the decision in due time before the competent court.

f 60. As to that submission, the final stage of the planning consent procedure was not completed when the claimant in the main proceedings submitted her request to the Secretary of State. It cannot therefore be contended that revocation of the consent would have been contrary to the principle of legal certainty.

61. Accordingly, the answer to the fourth and fifth questions must be that, in circumstances such as those of the main proceedings, an individual may, where appropriate, rely on art 2(1) of Directive 85/337, read in conjunction with arts 1(2) and 4(2) thereof.

The third question: the obligation to remedy the failure to carry out an environmental impact assessment

62. By its third question, the referring court essentially seeks to ascertain the scope of the obligation to remedy the failure to carry out an assessment of the environmental effects of the project in question.

63. The United Kingdom government contends that, in the circumstances of the main proceedings, there is no obligation on the competent authority to revoke or modify the permission issued for the working of Conygar Quarry or to order discontinuance of the working.

64. As to that submission, it is clear from settled case law that under the principle of co-operation in good faith laid down in art 10 EC (formerly art 5 of the EC Treaty) the member states are required to nullify the unlawful consequences of a breach of Community law (see, in particular, Humblet v Belgian State Case 6/60 [1960] ECR 559 at 569 and Francovich v Italy Joined cases C-6/90 and C-9/90 [1991] ECR I-5357 (para 36)). Such an obligation is owed, within the sphere of its competence, by every organ of the member state concerned (see, to this effect, Germany v EC Commission Case C-8/88 [1990] ECR I-2321 (para 13)).

65. Thus, it is for the competent authorities of a member state to take, within the sphere of their competence, all the general or particular measures necessary to ensure that projects are examined in order to determine whether they are likely to have significant effects on the environment and, if so, to ensure that they are subject to an impact assessment (see, to this effect, Aannemersbedrijf PK Kraaijeveld BV v Gedeputeerde Staten van Zuid-Holland Case C-72/95 [1997] All ER (EC) 134, [1996] ECR I-5403 (para 61) and the WWF case (para 70)). Such particular measures include, subject to the limits laid down by the principle of procedural autonomy of the member states, the revocation or suspension of a consent already granted, in order to carry out an assessment of the environmental effects of the project in question as provided for by Directive 85/337.

66. The member state is likewise required to make good any harm caused by the failure to carry out an environmental impact assessment.

67. The detailed procedural rules applicable are a matter for the domestic legal order of each member state, under the principle of procedural autonomy of the member states, provided that they are not less favourable than those governing similar domestic situations (principle of equivalence) and that they do not render impossible in practice or excessively difficult the exercise of rights conferred by the Community legal order (principle of effectiveness) (see to this effect, inter alia, SCS Peterbroeck Van Campenhout & Cie v Belgium Case C-312/93 [1996] All ER (EC) 242, [1995] ECR I-4599 (para 12) and Preston v Wolverhampton Healthcare NHS Trust, Fletcher v Midland Bank plc Case C-78/98 [2000] All ER (EC) 714, [2000] ECR I-3201 (para 31)).

68. So far as the main proceedings are concerned, if the working of Conygar Quarry should have been subject to an assessment of its environmental effects in accordance with the requirements of Directive 85/337, the competent authorities are obliged to take all general or particular measures for remedying the failure to carry out such an assessment.

a 69. In that regard, it is for the national court to determine whether it is possible under domestic law for a consent already granted to be revoked or suspended in order to subject the project in question to an assessment of its environmental effects, in accordance with the requirements of the directive, or alternatively, if the individual so agrees, whether it is possible for the latter to claim compensation for the harm suffered.

b 70. The answer to the third question must therefore be that under art 10 EC the competent authorities are obliged to take, within the sphere of their competence, all general or particular measures for remedying the failure to carry out an assessment of the environmental effects of a project as provided for in art 2(1) of Directive 85/337.

c The detailed procedural rules applicable in that context are a matter for the domestic legal order of each member state, under the principle of procedural autonomy of the member states, provided that they are not less favourable than those governing similar domestic situations (principle of equivalence) and that they do not render impossible in practice or excessively difficult the exercise of rights conferred by the Community legal order (principle of effectiveness).

d In that regard, it is for the national court to determine whether it is possible under domestic law for a consent already granted to be revoked or suspended in order to subject the project to an assessment of its environmental effects, in accordance with the requirements of Directive 85/337, or alternatively, if the individual so agrees, whether it is possible for the latter to claim compensation for the harm suffered.

COSTS

f 71. The costs incurred by the United Kingdom government and the Commission, which have submitted observations to the court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the referring court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court.

g On those grounds, the Court of Justice (Fifth Chamber), in answer to the questions referred to it by the High Court of Justice of England and Wales, Queen's Bench Division (Administrative Court), by order of 12 February 2002, hereby rules:

h (1) Article 2(1) of Council Directive (EEC) 85/337 (on the assessment of the effects of certain public and private projects on the environment), read in conjunction with art 4(2) thereof, is to be interpreted as meaning that, in the context of applying provisions such as s 22 of the Planning and Compensation Act 1991 and Sch 2 to that Act, the decisions adopted by the competent authorities, whose effect is to permit the resumption of mining operations, comprise, as a whole, a 'development consent' within the meaning of art 1(2) of that directive, so that the competent authorities are obliged, where appropriate, to carry out an assessment of the environmental effects of such operations.

i In a consent procedure comprising several stages, that assessment must, in principle, be carried out as soon as it is possible to identify and assess all the effects which the project may have on the environment.

(2) In circumstances such as those of the main proceedings, an individual may, where appropriate, rely on art 2(1) of Directive 85/337, read in conjunction with arts 1(2) and 4(2) thereof.

(3) Under art 10 EC the competent authorities are obliged to take, within the sphere of their competence, all general or particular measures for remedying the failure to carry out an assessment of the environmental effects of a project as provided for in art 2(1) of the directive. a

The detailed procedural rules applicable in that context are a matter for the domestic legal order of each member state, under the principle of procedural autonomy of the member states, provided that they are not less favourable than those governing similar domestic situations (principle of equivalence) and that they do not render impossible in practice or excessively difficult the exercise of rights conferred by the Community legal order (principle of effectiveness). b

In that regard, it is for the national court to determine whether it is possible under domestic law for a consent already granted to be revoked or suspended in order to subject the project to an assessment of its environmental effects, in accordance with the requirements of the directive, or alternatively, if the individual so agrees, whether it is possible for the latter to claim compensation for the harm suffered. c f Licences had been issued to an operator by the competent authorities of the Netherlands to carry out mechanical cockle fishing in a special area of conservation. In due course, certain nature protection organisations brought an action before the national court claiming that the cockle fishing, as g authorised, caused permanent damage to the geomorphology, flora and fauna of the seabed in the relevant area and that such fishing reduced the fish stocks of birds that fed on shellfish, thereby causing a decline in their populations.

The national court decided to stay the proceedings and refer to the Court of Justice of the European Communities a number of questions<sup>a</sup> pursuant to art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) concerning the interpretation of h art 6(3)<sup>b</sup> of Council Directive (EEC) 92/43 (on the conservation of natural habitats and of wild fauna and flora) (the Habitats Directive), which provided that any plan or project not directly concerned with or connected to the management of a special area of conservation but likely to have a significant effect thereon was to be the subject of an appropriate assessment.

which a licence had been granted annually for a limited period, with each licence entailing a new assessment both of the possibility of carrying on that

activity and of the site where it might be carried on, fell within the concept of 'plan' or 'project' within the meaning of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive. A definition of the concept of 'project' was to be found within art 1(2) of Council Directive (EEC) 85/337 (on the assessment of the effects of certain public and private projects on the environment), and that definition was relevant for the purposes of the Habitats Directive and it encompassed an activity such as cockle fishing. Further, even though such an activity had been carried on periodically for several years on the site concerned and a licence had had to be obtained for it every year, at the time of each application the activity was to be considered as a distinct plan or project within the meaning of the Habitats Directive (see judgment paras 23–26, 28, 29, below).

(2) Whereas art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive established a procedure intended to ensure, by means of a preliminary examination, that a plan or project which was not directly connected with or necessary to the management of the site concerned, but which was likely to have a significant effect on it, was authorised only to the extent that it would not adversely affect the integrity of that site; art 6(2) established an obligation of general protection consisting in avoiding deterioration and disturbances which might have significant effects in the light of the directive's objectives. Since authorisation of a plan or project granted in accordance with art 6(3) necessarily assumed that it was considered not likely to affect adversely the integrity of the site concerned and, consequently, not likely to give rise to deterioration or significant disturbances within the meaning of art 6(2), the fact that a plan or project had been established according to the procedure laid down in art 6(3) rendered superfluous, as regards the action to be taken on the protected site under the plan or project, a concomitant application of the rule of general protection laid by art 6(2). However, it could not be precluded that such a plan or project subsequently proved likely to give rise to such deterioration or disturbance and, in such a situation, application of art 6(2) made it possible to satisfy the essential objective of the preservation and protection of the quality of the environment (see judgment paras 35–38, below).

(3) For the purposes of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive, any plan or project not directly connected with or necessary to the management of a site was to be the subject of an appropriate assessment where it could not be excluded, on the basis of objective information, that the plan or project would have a significant effect on that site, either individually, or in combination with other plans or projects. The triggering of the environmental protection mechanism provided for in art 6(3) did not presume that the plan or project considered definitively had significant effects on the site concerned, but it followed from the mere probability that such an effect attached to that plan or project. Further, in the light of the precautionary principle, such a risk existed if it could not be excluded on the basis of objective information that the plan or project would have significant effects on the site concerned. Such an interpretation, which implied that in case of doubt as to the absence of significant effects an assessment had to be carried out, made it possible to ensure effectively that plans or projects which affected adversely the integrity of the site concerned were not authorised, thereby contributed to achieving the main aim of the directive, namely the ensuring of biodiversity through the conservation of natural habitats and of wild flora and fauna (see judgment paras 41, 43–45, below).

(4) For the purposes of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive, where a plan or project not directly concerned with or necessary to the management of the site a was likely to undermine the site's conservation objectives, it had necessarily to be considered likely to have a significant effect on that site. The assessment of that risk had to be made in the light of, inter alia, the characteristics and specific environmental conditions of the site concerned by such a plan or project (see judgment paras 47–49, below).

b (5) For the purposes of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive, an appropriate assessment of the implications for the site concerned of the plan or project implied that, prior to its approval, all the aspects of the plan or project which could, by themselves or in combination with other plans or projects, affect the site's conservation objectives had to be identified in the light of the best scientific knowledge in the field. Although art 6(3) did not define any particular method for carrying out an 'appropriate assessment', it was clear that the c authorisation criteria laid by art 6(3) integrated the precautionary principle and made it possible effectively to prevent adverse effects on the integrity of the protected sites as the result of the plans or projects being considered. A less stringent authorisation criterion could not as effectively ensure the fulfilment of the objective of site protection intended under that provision. Therefore, in d the main proceedings, the competent national authorities, taking account of the conclusions of the appropriate assessment of the implications of mechanical cockle fishing for the site concerned, in the light of the site's conservation objectives, were to authorise such activity only if they had made certain that it would not adversely affect the integrity of that site. That was the case where no reasonable scientific doubt remained as to the absence of such e effects. Otherwise, mechanical cockle fishing could, where appropriate, be authorised under art 6(4) of the directive (see judgment paras 52, 54, 56–60, below).

(6) Where a national court was called upon to ascertain the lawfulness of an authorisation for a plan or project within the meaning of art 6(3), it might
f determine whether the limits on the discretion of the competent national authorities set out by that provision had been complied with, even though it had not been transposed into the legal order of the member state concerned despite the expiry of the time limit laid down for that purpose. Member states and their institutions were obliged by directives themselves and by art 249 EC (formerly art 189 of the EC Treaty) to take all measures necessary to achieve the result prescribed by a directive and that duty was binding, for matters g within their jurisdiction, on national courts. Having regard to the requirement that the competent national authorities were to authorise mechanical cockle fishing only if they had made certain, on the basis of there being no reasonable scientific doubt, that it would not adversely affect the integrity of the site concerned, it followed that art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive might be taken h into account by the national court in determining whether a national authority which had granted an authorisation relating to a plan or project had kept within the limits of the discretion set by the provision in question (see judgment paras 65, 67, 69, 70, below).

- By a decision of 27 March 2002, the Raad van State (Council of State), Netherlands, referred under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling questions (set out at judgment para 19, below) concerning the interpretation of art 6 of Council Directive (EEC) 92/43 (on the conservation of natural habitats and of wild fauna and flora) (the Habitats Directive). The language of the case was Dutch. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General.

I—INTRODUCTION

1. This reference for a preliminary ruling from the Netherlands Raad van State (Netherlands Council of State) concerns the interpretation and application of art 6 of Council Directive (EEC) 92/43 (on the conservation of natural habitats and of wild fauna and flora)<sup>2</sup> (the Habitats Directive). The case relates to the grant of authorisations for the mechanical fishing of cockles (cerastoderma edule) in the Netherlands Wadden Sea, which is a protected area for birds under Council Directive (EEC) 79/409 (on the conservation of wild birds)<sup>3</sup> (the Birds Directive).

2. The Raad van State seeks to ascertain whether the annual authorisation of cockle fishing is to be regarded as agreement to a plan or project. This would mean that the procedure for authorising plans or projects laid down in art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive would be applicable. If this is so, the Raad van State seeks further clarification as to the application of this provision.

3. Firstly, it seeks clarification of the relationship between art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive and art 6(2) thereof, which imposes on member states the general obligation to avoid deterioration and significant disturbance of Natura 2000 sites. Secondly, it seeks to ascertain the conditions under which it must be assumed that a plan or project is likely to have a significant effect on such a site, thus making it necessary to carry out an appropriate assessment of its implications for the site in view of the site's conservation objectives. It also raises the question whether the competent authority may authorise a plan or project where there is at least no obvious doubt as to the absence of significant adverse effects.

4. In the event that there is no plan or project within the meaning of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive and therefore art 6(2) thereof must be applied, the Raad van State accordingly asks whether the granting of authorisation complies with the requirements of that provision as long as there is at least no obvious doubt as to the absence of significant adverse effects.

5. Thirdly, the Raad van State seeks to ascertain whether art 6(2) and (3) of the Habitats Directive are directly applicable.

II—LEGAL FRAMEWORK

6. Under art 4 of the Birds Directive, the member states are to designate special protection areas for the species listed in Annex I thereto and for regularly occurring migratory species not listed therein.

- a 7. Under art 7 of the Habitats Directive, the obligations arising under art 6(2), (3) and (4) thereof are to be applied to these special protection areas.
8. Article 6 of the Habitats Directive provides as follows:

b '1. For special areas of conservation, Member States shall establish the necessary conservation measures involving, if need be, appropriate management plans specifically designed for the sites or integrated into other development plans, and appropriate statutory, administrative or contractual measures which correspond to the ecological requirements of the natural habitat types in Annex I and the species in Annex II present on the sites.

c 2. Member States shall take appropriate steps to avoid, in the special areas of conservation, the deterioration of natural habitats and the habitats of species as well as disturbance of the species for which the areas have been designated, in so far as such disturbance could be significant in relation to the objectives of this Directive.

d 3. Any plan or project not directly connected with or necessary to the management of the site but likely to have a significant effect thereon, either individually or in combination with other plans or projects, shall be subject to appropriate assessment of its implications for the site in view of the site's conservation objectives. In the light of the conclusions of the assessment of the implications for the site and subject to the provisions of paragraph 4, the competent national authorities shall agree to the plan or project only after having ascertained that it will not adversely affect the integrity of the site concerned and, if appropriate, after having obtained the opinion of the general public.

e 4. If, in spite of a negative assessment of the implications for the site and in the absence of alternative solutions, a plan or project must nevertheless be carried out for imperative reasons of overriding public interest, including those of a social or economic nature, the Member State shall take all compensatory measures necessary to ensure that the overall coherence of Natura 2000 is protected.'

g III—FACTS, PROCEDURE AND QUESTIONS SUBMITTED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

9. The Wadden Sea is an important habitat for many bird species. Therefore, the Netherlands has designated the majority of the Netherlands Wadden Sea a special protection area within the meaning of the Birds Directive. The eider duck (somateria mollissima) and the oyster-catcher (haematopus ostralegus) are of particular interest in the present case since cockles form a significant part of their food. Both species are present in the Wadden Sea throughout the year but their numbers are at their greatest in the winter on account of the influx of overwintering birds. There are around 150,000 eider ducks and around 200,000 oyster-catchers in the Wadden Sea at that time.

h 10. For many decades cockles have been fished in the Wadden Sea using the mechanical methods at issue in this case. To this end use is made of trawls, that is to say metal cages which are dragged over the seabed by a ship. The upper 4 to 5 cm of the surface are scraped into the cage by a 1 m-wide metal plate. A pipe, from which a powerful water jet emerges, is attached directly in front of the sharp edge. This pulverises the surface so that a mixture of water, sand, cockles and other organisms enter the trawl. The sieved content of the trawl is then sucked on board hydraulically.

11. Since 1975 fishing for cockles in the Wadden Sea has been subject to authorisation in order to avoid overfishing. Initially the law on nature conservation required only an exemption to which no further conditions were attached. Since 1998 this activity has required an annually renewable authorisation under art 12 of the Natuurbeschermingswet (Nature Conservation Law). a

12. On the basis of this law, the Staatssecretaris van Landbouw, Natuurbeheer en Visserij (Secretary of State for Agriculture, Nature Conservancy and Fisheries) granted, in 1999 and 2000, the Coöperatieve Producentenorganisatie van Nederlandse Kokkelvisserij UA (Cooperative Producers Organisation for Netherlands Cockle Fisheries (PO Kokkelvisserij)) an authorisation, subject to certain conditions, for the mechanical fishing of cockles in the Wadden Sea. b

13. In addition to art 12 of the Nature Conservation Law, these authorisations are based on other rules concerning cockle fishing in the Wadden Sea. Under the 'Key Planning Decision for the Wadden Sea' (Planologische Kernbeslissing Waddenzee; the Wadden Sea decision), authorisation is precluded 'where, on the basis of the best available information, there appears to be obvious (in Dutch: "duidelijke") doubt as to the absence of a possible significant adverse effect on the ecosystem'. d

14. A government decision of 21 January 1993, that is to say the Structuurnota Zee- en kustvisserij—'Vissen naar evenwicht' (Regional economic plan for sea and coastal fishing entitled 'Fishing for Balance'; 'the regional economic plan'), contains further guidelines inter alia on cockle fishing in the Wadden Sea. Accordingly, certain sections of the Wadden Sea are closed permanently to this activity. In years in which food is scarce a total of 60% of the average food requirement of birds in the form of cockles and mussels is reserved for these birds. This quota has since been increased to 70% for years in which food is scarce on account of scientific uncertainty as to the cause of a possible shortage of shellfish for the mass death of eider ducks in the winter of 1999/2000. The reason stated why 100% of the average food requirement is not reserved is that the birds also use alternative sources of food (eg Baltic clams, surf clams and shore crabs). Since 1997 work has been carried out on a comprehensive study into the effects of mollusc fishing whose conclusions are to be taken as a guide for future policy. e

15. The plaintiffs, that is to say the Landelijke Vereniging tot Behoud van de Waddenzee (Waddenvereniging) and the Nederlandse Vereniging tot Bescherming van Vogels (Vogelbescherming), two non-governmental organisations which have undertaken to conserve nature, are challenging the authorisations for 1999 and 2000. g

16. They take the view that cockle fishing is likely to affect the Wadden Sea as a habitat in the following respects: h —adverse effects on sediment quality as a consequence of the silt being churned up and fine sediment being lost, —destruction or impairment of the re-establishment of mussel beds and seagrass meadows, and

—shortage of food resources for birds as a consequence of overfishing. i

17. On the basis of the information and studies before it the Raad van State concluded that when the defendant granted the authorisations in question it appraised and took account of the available scientific information in accordance with the requirements of Netherlands law. Although there was a considerable need for clarification as regards the consequences of the cockle

a fishing, the defendant had taken sufficient account of the precautionary principle by placing restrictions thereon, in particular by closing large sections of the Wadden Sea to cockle fishing and laying down fishing quotas having regard to the food requirement of the birds.

18. However, the Raad van State is uncertain whether this action complies with the requirements of the Birds Directive and the Habitats Directive.
b Therefore, it has submitted the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

(1)(a) Are the words “plan or project” in Article 6(3) of [the Habitats Directive] to be interpreted as also covering an activity which has already been carried on for many years but for which an authorisation is in principle granted each year for a limited period, with a fresh assessment being carried out on each occasion as to whether, and if so in which sections of the area, the activity may be carried on?

c (b) If the answer to Question (1)(a) is in the negative, must the relevant activity be regarded as a “plan or project” if the intensity of this activity has increased over the years or an increase in it is made possible by the authorisations?

d (2)(a) If it follows from the answer to Question (1) that there is a “plan or project” within the meaning of Article 6(3) of the Habitats Directive, is Article 6(3) of the Habitats Directive to be regarded as a special application of the rules in Article 6(2) or as a provision with a separate, independent purpose in the sense that, for example: (i) Article 6(2) relates to existing use and Article 6(3) to new plans or projects, or (ii) Article 6(2) relates to management measures and Article 6(3) to other decisions, or (iii) Article 6(3) relates to plans or projects and Article 6(2) to other activities?

e (b) If Article 6(3) of the Habitats Directive is to be regarded as a special application of the rules in Article 6(2), can the two subparagraphs be applicable cumulatively?

f (3)(a) Is Article 6(3) of the Habitats Directive to be interpreted as meaning that there is a “plan or project” once a particular activity is likely to have an effect on the site concerned (and an “appropriate assessment” must then be carried out to ascertain whether or not the effect is “significant”) or does this provision mean that an “appropriate assessment” has to be carried out only where there is a (sufficient) likelihood that a “plan or project” will have a significant effect?

g (b) On the basis of which criteria must it be determined whether or not a plan or project within the meaning of Article 6(3) of the Habitats Directive not directly connected with or necessary to the management of the site is likely to have a significant effect thereon, either individually or in combination with other plans or projects?

h (4)(a) When Article 6 of the Habitats Directive is applied, on the basis of which criteria must it be determined whether or not there are “appropriate steps” within the meaning of Article 6(2) or an “appropriate assessment”, within the meaning of Article 6(3), in connection with the certainty required before agreeing to a plan or project?

i (b) Do the terms “appropriate steps” or “appropriate assessment” have independent meaning or, in assessing these terms, is account also to be taken of Article 174(2) EC and in particular the precautionary principle referred to therein?

(c) If account must be taken of the precautionary principle referred to in Article 174(2) EC, does that mean that a particular activity, such as the cockle fishing in question, can be authorised where there is no obvious doubt as to the absence of a possible significant effect or is that permissible only where there is no doubt as to the absence of such an effect or where the absence can be ascertained?

(5) Do Article 6(2) or Article 6(3) of the Habitats Directive have direct effect in the sense that individuals may rely on them in national courts and those courts must provide the protection afforded to individuals by the direct effect of Community law, as was held inter alia in [SCS Peterbroeck Van Campenhout & Cie v Belgium]<sup>4</sup>?

IV—ASSESSMENT

A—Question (1): the words ‘plan or project’

19. By questions (1)(a) and (b) the Raad van State seeks clarification of the words ‘plan or project’. The answer to this question determines the manner in which this case is considered further. If the annual grant of authorisations for cockle fishing has to be regarded as agreement to a plan or project, art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive must be applied.

1—Submissions of the parties

20. Waddenvereniging, Vogelbescherming and, in the written proceedings also the Commission of the European Communities, take the view that the annual decision on cockle fishing in the Wadden Sea must be regarded as agreement to a plan or project. A broad interpretation must be placed on the words ‘plan and project’. Vogelbescherming in particular goes so far as to contend that it must be considered that there is a plan or project in the case of any authorisation but that, conversely, the use of these words cannot be ruled out on the grounds that no authorisation is required. In the view of the Commission, it must always be considered that there is a plan or project where a particular activity is likely, by its nature, to have a significant effect on a site.

21. All three parties rely on the fact that each year a fresh decision must be taken on cockle fishing and that refusal to grant authorisation is also conceivable in principle. The Commission’s guidelines<sup>5</sup> refer explicitly to fishing even where no authorisation is necessary in that regard. The effects of cockle fishing can vary depending on a large number of factors, in particular population development.

22. Waddenvereniging and Vogelbescherming also note that the catches of 10,000 tonnes first fixed in 1999 had never been attained in previous years. Consequently an extension of fishing had been authorised. Furthermore, Vogelbescherming refers to a 1998 judgment of the Raad van State which resulted in an authorisation of the type in question being granted for the first time in 1999. In that respect Vogelbescherming also refers to the judgment in Aannemersbedrijf PK Kraaijeveld BV v Gedeputeerde Staten van Zuid-Holland<sup>6</sup>, according to which the decisive factor as regards the approval of a project, in

b 23. The Netherlands government also recommends a broad interpretation of the words 'plan' and 'project' but would like—in the same way as PO Kokkelvisserij—to limit the application of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive to new plans and projects. It contends that at the time a special protection area is designated only existing plans and projects are subject to art 6(2) of the Habitats Directive. This applies to activities such as cockle fishing which were already carried on in the past, irrespective of whether or not authorisations must be renewed annually.

c 24. The Netherlands government emphasises that the cockle fishing has no notable effect on a special protection area and the Wadden Sea was therefore designated as such in spite of the fishing. Moreover, it concludes that the authorisation to expand an existing plan or project—or an existing activity—could constitute a new plan or project which would have to be assessed under art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive having regard to the effects of the previous activity.

d 25. PO Kokkelvisserij alone takes the view that there is no new project or plan even where existing activities are expanded. Furthermore, it contends that in any event the cockle fishing was not expanded overall but merely adapted each year to the prevailing circumstances. Between 1980 and 2000 between 0 (1991 and 1996) and 9.3 million kilograms of cockles were caught each year. Seven million kilograms or more were caught in 1980, 1983, 1984, 1988, 1998, e and 1999 and less than 2 million kilograms in 1987, 1991, 1996 and 1997. No increase can be discerned. On the contrary, the catches varied from year to year. The annual differences can be attributed solely to the prevailing conditions, in particular population development. Relative to biomass values of over 20% were reached in 1984, 1985, 1986 and 1990, whilst the maximum values since have been around 10%. Therefore, from this perspective it can f even be concluded that there has been a reduction in fishing.

g 26. At the hearing the Commission pointed to the possibility that there could be a management plan within the meaning of art 6(1) of the Habitats Directive which provides for the cockle fishing in part or in full. A plan or project exists only in so far as a step goes beyond this management plan since art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive is expressly applicable only to steps not directly connected with or necessary to the management of the site. However, even in the absence of a management plan it can be concluded that there is a plan or project only if the annual authorisation of an activity carried on relates to new elements, for example new technologies or intensification.

h 2—Opinion

i 27. Article 6 of the Habitats Directive is intended to ensure that the natural wealth in the Natura 2000 network—the natural habitats and species numbers in the relevant protection areas—remains intact. To this end, art 6(1) provides for conservation measures, that is to say positive action. In general terms art 6(2) requires that deterioration and disturbance likely to have significant effect be avoided.

<sup>7</sup> Council Directive (EEC) 85/337 (on the assessment of the effects of certain public and private projects on the environment) (OJ 1985 L175 p 40), as amended by Council Directive (EC) 97/11 (amending Directive 85/337 on the assessment of the effects of certain public and private projects on the environment) (OJ 1997 L73 p 5).

28. Article 6(3) and (4) of the Habitats Directive lay down particular rules on plans and projects. Under art 6(3), a measure should, as a rule, be authorised only if it will not adversely affect the integrity of a Natura 2000 site. In order to be able to determine whether this will be the case, an appropriate assessment of its implications for the site must be made in view of the site's conservation objectives. Under art 6(4), adverse effects on the integrity of sites are, by way of exception, permitted under certain circumstances, if compensatory measures are taken. Where no appropriate assessment is necessary, there are, under art 6(3) and (4) of the Habitats Directive, no further limitations on the plan or project concerned. a

29. The requirements for an appropriate assessment are laid down in the first sentence of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive. In this multi-stage assessment the words 'plan' and 'project' are the initial filter which removes measures which are not subject to an appropriate assessment. Before an appropriate assessment becomes necessary, other limiting conditions must be assessed, namely the direct connection with the management of the site referred to by the Commission and the likelihood of significant effect on the site mentioned in the third question submitted for a preliminary ruling. Each of these criteria has its own function and justification. In that respect the words 'plan' and 'project' are primarily a formal condition for the application of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive. In view of the structure of the first sentence of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive considerations relating to nature conservation arise in principle only during the two subsequent stages of the assessment. b

30. For unintentional damage to Natura 2000 sites to be avoided effectively, all potentially harmful measures must, where possible, be subject to the procedure laid down in art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive. Therefore, the terms 'plan' and 'project' should be interpreted broadly, not restrictively. This is also consistent with the wording, which expressly refers to any<sup>8</sup> plan or project in almost all language versions<sup>9</sup>. c

31. The question how the words 'plan' and 'project' should be defined in detail may be left open here since mechanical cockle fishing was regarded as a plan or project when it commenced—a matter on which none of the parties has cast doubt. On account of its wide-ranging effects on the upper layer of the seabed it is in principle comparable, in terms of its environmental impact, with the extraction of mineral resources. In that respect it would therefore have to be regarded as another intervention and thus as a project within the meaning of art 1(2) of the directive on environmental impact assessment. That provision defines a project as the execution of construction works or of other installations or schemes or other interventions in the natural surroundings and landscape including those involving the extraction of mineral resources<sup>10</sup>. Without wishing to apply this definition of 'project' definitively to the Habitats Directive, it is at least appropriate and adequate in the present case. In this case the question whether the authorisation relates to one or several projects, or even to a plan co-ordinating various projects, can be left open. It makes no difference as regards the legal consequences. d

<sup>9</sup> As regards the term 'plan', see also the opinion of Advocate General Fenelly in European Commission v France Case C-256/98 [2000] ECR I-2487 at 2489 (para 33). f

<sup>10</sup> Conversely, the definition of 'plans and programmes' set out in art 2(a) of EP and Council Directive (EC) 2001/42 (on the assessment of the effects of certain plans and programmes on the environment) (OJ 2001 L197 p 20) contains no substantive clarification but limits the definition to the results of particular decision-making procedures. g

- a 32. Doubts as to the existence of a plan or a project could arise from that fact that cockle fishing has already been carried on in its present form for many years. However, neither the term 'plan' nor the term 'project' would preclude a measure renewed at regular intervals from being regarded on each occasion as a separate plan or project.
- b 33. Netherlands law also appears to proceed from this basis. Cockle fishing cannot be carried on without the annual grant of an authorisation. Therefore, it requires authorisation by the competent authorities. However, the procedure for authorising plans and projects arises from art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive. Nevertheless, the applicability of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive cannot be based solely on the fact that the Netherlands has granted no permanent authorisation but rather renews the authorisation annually. If the need for an appropriate assessment turned solely on whether national law provided for permanent authorisation or annually renewable authorisation for the relevant measure, there would be an incentive to grant authorisations relating to special protection areas for an unlimited period in order to circumvent the application of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive.
- c 34. However, such circumvention of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive would be incompatible with Community law. In the same way as other directives on the environment, the Habitats Directive provides that certain measures require authorisation by the authorities<sup>11</sup>. The legislature clarified this matter subsequently in the directive on environmental assessment<sup>12</sup>.
- e 35. Since the Habitats Directive does not stipulate which activities are to be authorised in which form, it is primarily for the member states to lay down the relevant rules. However, in laying down the requirements relating to authorisation they must take account of the likelihood of Natura 2000 sites being affected. Temporary authorisations which have to be reviewed on a regular basis are particularly appropriate where the possible effects cannot be assessed with sufficient accuracy at the time of the initial authorisation but instead depend on variable circumstances.
- f 36. Cockle fishing in the Wadden Sea appears to be a typical example of an activity whose authorisation should be reviewed annually. The availability of cockles varies from year to year depending on weather conditions. It does not appear possible to rule out the possibility of overfishing<sup>13</sup>. In winter cockles are very important as a food for eider ducks and oyster-catchers. Therefore, at least annual management is necessary to balance exploitation of the cockle stocks and the food requirement of the birds. Consequently, the Netherlands practice of renewing authorisations for cockle fishing annually satisfies the requirements of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive.
- g 37. However, in principle the need, in terms of nature conservation, for an authorisation requirement is not a condition for regarding an activity subject to authorisation as a plan or project. Such considerations are necessary only where, in the absence of such a requirement, there are grounds for assuming that such activity should be classified as a plan or project.
- h

i 11 See EC Commission v Italy Case C-360/87 [1991] ECR I-791 (para 31) and European Commission v Belgium Case C-230/00 [2001] ECR I-4591 (para 16), in which the court declared tacit authorisation or refusal of requests for authorisation as incompatible with the requirement relating to examination laid down in various other directives on the environment.

12 See art 2(1) of the directive on environmental assessment which was introduced by Directive 97/11.

13 This is emphasised by the fact that natural mussel beds in the Netherlands Wadden Sea have obviously declined.

38. Precisely in the case of repeated measures this interpretation of the terms 'plan' and 'project' does not, furthermore, lead to disproportionate harm. If the effects remain the same from year to year, at the next stage of the assessment it can easily be determined, with reference to the assessments in previous years, that no significant effect is likely. However, where such reference is not possible on account of changing circumstances, the need to carry out more comprehensive fresh assessments cannot be ruled out and is actually also justified. a

39. The answer to the first question must therefore be that the words 'plan and project' in art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive also cover an activity which has already been carried on for many years but for which an authorisation is in principle granted each year for a limited period. b

40. In view of this conclusion there is no need to comment on question (1)(b) which asks whether any difference is made by the fact that the activity increases or authorisation opens up the possibility of an increase. However, it should be noted that the extension of an existing activity, which must be regarded as a plan or project, can in principle be classified as a new plan or new project. Therefore, such extension would have to be assessed to ascertain whether it was likely to have a significant effect on a Natura 2000 site, either individually or together with other plans or projects (including the existing activity). If necessary, the further stages in the procedure laid down in art 6(3) and (4) of the Habitats Directive would have to be carried out. c

B—Question (2): the relationship between art 6(2) and (3) of the Habitats Directive e

41. The second question relates to the relationship between art 6(2) and (3) of the Habitats Directive. The Raad van State seeks to ascertain how a distinction is to be drawn between these two provisions and whether they can be applied cumulatively. It proposes various possible ways of drawing a distinction, that is to say:

- art 6(2) relates to existing use and art 6(3) to new plans or projects, f
- art 6(2) relates to management measures and art 6(3) to other decisions, or
- art 6(3) relates to plans or projects and art 6(2) to other activities.

1—Submissions of the parties

42. Vogelbescherming takes the view that these provisions differ clearly from one another in terms of their nature and scope. Article 6(3) lays down the procedure for authorising projects at a particular time, whilst art 6(2) imposes a permanent obligation to take positive action to avoid deterioration of sites. g

43. It considers that the alternative interpretations put forward by the Raad van State are inadequate. The first alternative raises difficult questions concerning the distinction to be drawn between existing plans or projects. The second alternative fails to appreciate that administrative measures can be of different kinds and would primarily fall within the scope of art 6(1). Furthermore, not all measures necessary to conserve the site could be based on art 6(3). The third alternative is correct in so far as it subjects plans and projects to art 6(3), but fails to understand that art 6(2) cannot be limited to activities. On the contrary, natural developments could also give rise to obligations to act under art 6(2). h

44. In the view of Vogelbescherming and Waddenvereniging, the two subparagraphs could also be applied cumulatively, for example where, in spite of an appropriate assessment, a project authorised under sub-para (3) subsequently had unforeseen adverse effects on a site which necessitated i a measures under sub-para (2). However, Vogelbescherming considers that it would not make sense simultaneously to apply sub-para (2) in connection with authorisation under sub-para (3).

b 45. In the view of the Netherlands government, the purpose of both provisions is to conserve the relevant sites, with sub-para (2) concerning all measures and sub-para (3) only new plans and projects likely to have a significant effect on the relevant sites. A special regime was expressly provided for in respect of such sites. However, it does not make sense to apply the two provisions cumulatively.

c 46. PO Kokkelvisserij essentially refers to the Commission's comments in its guidelines<sup>14</sup>. Accordingly, it concludes that plans or projects must be assessed under sub-para (3) and other measures under sub-para (2). Although both provisions relate to the conservation objectives of the site concerned, they cannot be applied cumulatively.

d 47. Finally, the Commission takes the view that sub-para (3) has independent meaning in so far as this provision relates to plans and projects, whilst sub-para (2) concerns a general obligation to avoid deterioration and significant disturbance. Subparagraph (2) applies to activities which require no prior authorisation. In any event sub-para (3) is not a special rule vis-à-vis sub-para (2).

2—Opinion

e 48. The fields of application of art 6(2) and (3) are evident from the wording thereof. Subparagraph (2) relates to deterioration and disturbance and sub-para (3) to plans and projects. Accordingly, the possibility of an overlap between the two fields of application cannot be ruled out.

f 49. However, sub-para (3) could—where appropriate, in conjunction with sub-para (4)—lay down a definitive special rule on plans and projects which excludes the application of art 6(2). This would mean that following authorisation under art 6(3) or (4) plans and projects could no longer be subjected to further requirements by virtue of the adverse effect on protection areas.

g 50. A strong argument against applying art 6(2) of the Habitats Directive to plans and projects would appear to follow from art 6(4). If art 6(2) were applicable to plans and projects which were authorised under this provision in spite of the adverse effect on protection areas, this derogating authorisation would have no practical effect. Member states would normally be required to prevent such plans and projects as they would result in the deterioration of protection areas. It must therefore be concluded that art 6(2) cannot be applied in such cases. If art 6(3) and (4) were construed as a uniform system for h authorising plans and projects, it would be consistent to exclude the application of art 6(2) also in the case of authorisation under art 6(3).

i 51. The initiators of plans and projects and the competent authorities would enjoy considerably enhanced legal certainty if art 6(3) and (4) of the Habitats Directive alone applied to plans and projects. In the case of new plans and projects definitive authorisation would ensure that considerations relating to protection of a site could no longer affect the implementation of the scheme in question. Furthermore, the existence of previous authorisations for plans and projects which were not granted pursuant to art 6(3) would not be called into question on account of adverse effects on protection areas.

14 Cited in footnote 5, above (pp 8, 30, 64).

52. However, such exclusive application of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive is not imperative under the general scheme of art 6. In any event, the normal authorisation procedure with the appropriate assessment and the derogating authorisation are to be found in different subparagraphs. a

53. Furthermore, there is a fundamental difference between plans and projects authorised under art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive and plans and projects which are to be authorised only by way of exception under art 6(4) thereof. Normal authorisation is based on the assumption that a plan or project will not adversely affect the integrity of protection areas, whereas the derogating authorisation assumes that such adverse effect will occur. b

54. Therefore, even after the conclusion of the normal authorisation procedure under art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive the general obligation laid down in art 6(2) must apply to avoid deterioration and significant disturbance attributable to the implementation of a plan or project. c

55. This is consistent with the particular function of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive in comparison with art 6(2). Article 6(3) primarily establishes an authorisation procedure which uses the opportunity to assess the impact of a plan or a project in light of the conservation objectives of the protection area concerned before it has any adverse effects on that area. However, a preliminary check is not incompatible with the application of the general rule relating to protection laid down in art 6(2). d

56. Where the provisions are complied with, there is, following the authorisation procedure under art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive, no need for subsequent measures under art 6(2). An ideal appropriate assessment would identify precisely any adverse effect which occurred subsequently. Therefore, authorisation would be granted only where the plan or the project did not adversely affect the integrity of the site concerned. For the purpose of providing a consistent standard of protection this would also exclude the possible occurrence of deterioration or disturbance which could be significant in relation to the objectives of the directive. At the same time the practical effectiveness of authorisation under art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive would be safeguarded since the effects expressly permitted therein could not constitute an infringement of art 6(2). e

57. However, practical consequences relating to authorised projects and plans would arise from art 6(2) of the Habitats Directive if they resulted in deterioration or significant adverse effects in spite of an appropriate assessment. In that case the member state concerned would be obliged to take the necessary preventative measures in spite of the fact that authorisation had been given. f

58. This obligation is appropriate since otherwise habitats areas and species numbers within Natura 2000 network could be lost forever. It is further justified, at least in the case of new plans and projects, by the fact that in such cases the member states have accepted either an inadequate appropriate assessment or scientific uncertainty as to the effects of the measure concerned. However, it is also unacceptable for habitats areas and species numbers to be reduced as a consequence of old plans and projects to which art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive did not apply ratione temporis. g

59. The continuing application of art 6(2) of the Habitats Directive to plans and projects would also be consistent with the Court of Justice's judgment in European Commission v Ireland<sup>15</sup>. In that case it ruled that Ireland had not h

- a fulfilled its obligations under art 6(2) of the Habitats Directive in respect of the Owenduff-Nephin Beg Complex. That case concerned overgrazing resulting in erosion and a decline in heath land and also the planting of conifers. In that context the court did not raise the question whether there were plans or projects which required the application of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive and, possibly, precluded the application of art 6(2).
- b 60. Accordingly, the answer to the second question must be that art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive lays down the procedure for authorising plans and projects which do not affect the integrity of protection sites, whereas art 6(2) thereof lays down permanent obligations, irrespective of the authorisation of plans and projects, to avoid deterioration and disturbance which could be significant in relation to the objectives of the directive.
- c

C—Question (3): the possibility of significant adverse effect

61. By its third question the Raad van State seeks to clarify two conditions for carrying out an appropriate assessment under the first sentence of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive. It asks, one, what requirements must be placed on the likelihood of significant adverse effect and, two, when it must be considered that the possible adverse effect is significant.
- d 62. It should first be pointed out that the possibility of significant adverse effect is primarily a question of nature conservation which must be answered on the basis of the circumstances of the individual case. However, the court
- e may provide guidance.

1—Possibility of an adverse effect

(a) Submissions of the parties

- f 63. Waddenvereniging considers that it is always necessary to carry out an appropriate assessment where the absence of significant adverse effects cannot clearly be excluded.
64. Vogelbescherming dismisses the idea of limiting the appropriate assessment to cases in which significant effects will occur with a sufficient degree of probability. On the contrary, it is sufficient that such effects could occur. The likelihood of adverse effects occurring can be assessed only when
- g the actual appropriate assessment is carried out.
65. Vogelbescherming understands the question submitted by the Raad van State as asking whether the possibility of measures to minimise damage could be taken into account as early as this stage of the application of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive. However, such measures can be taken effectively only on
- h the basis of an appropriate assessment. In the present case the questions posed in connection with an ongoing government study already show that cockle fishing is likely to have significant effect.
66. The Commission considers that in addition to the fundamental ability of a plan or project to adversely affect a site the occurrence of significant adverse effect must also be sufficiently likely. This must be assessed in a preliminary assessment. According to the precautionary principle, doubt as to the absence
- i of such effects is sufficient to give rise to an obligation to carry out an appropriate assessment.
67. The Netherlands government takes the view that an appropriate assessment is necessary only where significant adverse effects are sufficiently likely. This must be determined in a preliminary assessment.

68. PO Kokkelvisserij also considers that an appropriate assessment is necessary only where it can be presumed that the plan or project will have significant adverse effect. a

(b) Opinion

69. As regards the degree of probability of significant adverse effect, the wording of various language versions is not unequivocal. The German version appears to be the broadest since it uses the subjunctive 'könnte' (could). This indicates that the relevant criterion is the mere possibility of an adverse effect. On the other hand, the English version uses what is probably the narrowest term, namely 'likely', which would suggest a strong possibility. The other language versions appear to lie somewhere between these two poles. Therefore, according to the wording it is not necessary that an adverse effect will certainly occur but that the necessary degree of probability remains unclear. b
c

70. Since the normal authorisation procedure is intended to prevent protection areas being affected by plans or projects, the requirements relating to the probability of an adverse effect cannot be too strict. If the possibility of an appropriate assessment were ruled out in respect of plans and projects which had only a 10% likelihood of having a significant adverse effect, statistically speaking one in ten measures precisely under this limit would have significant effects. However, all such measures could be authorised without further restrictions. Consequently, such a specific probability standard would give rise to fears that Natura 2000 would slowly deteriorate. Furthermore, the appropriate assessment is also precisely intended to help establish the likelihood of adverse effects. If the likelihood of certain adverse effects is unclear, this militates more in favour than against an appropriate assessment. d

71. In principle, the possibility of avoiding or minimising adverse effects should be irrelevant as regards determining the need for an appropriate assessment. It appears doubtful that such measures could be carried out with sufficient precision in the absence of the factual basis of a specific assessment. f

72. On the other hand, it would be disproportionate to regard any conceivable adverse effect as grounds for carrying out an appropriate assessment. Adverse effects, which are not obvious in view of the site's conservation objectives, may be disregarded. However, this can be assessed and decided on only on a case-by-case basis. g

73. In that regard the criterion must be whether or not reasonable doubt exists as to the absence of significant adverse effects. In assessing doubt, account will have to be taken, on the one hand, of the likelihood of harm and, on the other, also of the extent and nature of such harm. Therefore, in principle greater weight is to be attached to doubts as to the absence of irreversible effects or effects on particularly rare habitats or species than to doubts as to the absence of reversible or temporary effects or the absence of effects on relatively common species or habitats. h

74. Therefore, an appropriate assessment is always necessary where reasonable doubt exists as to the absence of significant adverse effects. i

2—Significance

(a) Submissions of the parties

75. Waddenvereniging proposes various criteria for assessing significance. The effects of comparable schemes on other sites and population a development—in this case the decline of eider ducks—could provide guidance. The size of the areas and the project cannot be taken into consideration since otherwise sections of protection areas could in practice lose their protected status.

76. Vogelbescherming proposes the following stages of assessment:

b —Are adverse effects conceivable?
—Do the areas covered by the plan or project overlap with the areas covered by the natural habitats or species?

—If the answer to both questions is in the affirmative, it is necessary to examine whether or not there is the slightest risk of an adverse effect on the integrity of the site concerned.

c 77. The Commission calls for an objective interpretation which, in terms of its application, must, however, be guided by the particular features of the site concerned. Adverse effects are significant in particular where they:

—render the implementation of the conservation objectives impossible or unlikely, or

d —would irrevocably destroy a vital component of the ecosystem which characterises the site and is essential to its integrity or its importance to the coherence of Natura 2000.

78. The Netherlands government would also like to avoid an arbitrary or casual assessment of significance and expects account to be taken not only of the features of the site concerned but also of the cumulative effects connected with other plans and projects.

e 79. PO Kokkelvisserij refers to the Commission's guidelines<sup>16</sup> and the adverse effects which formed the subject matter of the judgment concerning the Santoña marshes<sup>17</sup>. According to that judgment, the effects must be considerable, relatively serious, irreparable or difficult to repair. In view of the complexity of environmental assessments, it dismisses the idea of an exhaustive list of criteria. However, it does consider that in each case it is necessary to take account of the nature and extent of the site and the actual and foreseeable effects of the plan or project, in particular whether these effects are structural or temporary or can be avoided by natural means. Consideration should also be given to the conservation objectives of the site and other environmental characteristics or consequences.

g (b) Opinion

80. Restricting the appropriate assessment to plans and projects which are likely to have significant effect prevents unnecessary appropriate assessments. A rough assessment must be made of this requirement as part of a preliminary assessment without anticipating the actual appropriate assessment.

h 81. The term 'significant' describes two comparison parameters, in this case the relationship between certain adverse effects on a protection area. The protection area is defined by its conservation objectives. The seriousness of the adverse effects is evident from the extent and nature of the possible harm. Not only the ability to reverse or offset the effects but also the rarity of the habitats or species concerned are relevant in this respect.

i 82. Of the parties, only the Commission seeks to define precisely the threshold beyond which effects become significant. However, the criteria which 16 Cited in footnote 5, above (point 4.4.1 p 36 et seq).

17 EC Commission v Spain Case C-355/90 [1993] ECR I-4221 (the Santoña case).

it proposes—the defeat of the conservation objectives or destruction of essential components of the site—set this threshold very high. a

83. At the hearing Vogelbescherming and Waddenvereniging correctly pointed out that this standard does not reflect the court's case law, in particular that concerning the Birds Directive. For example, it follows from the judgment concerning the Leybucht that any reduction in a special protection area, for example by the construction of a road<sup>18</sup>, is to be equated at least with a considerable adverse effect<sup>19</sup>. In the judgment concerning the Santoña marshes the court also recognised that a marine-farming scheme<sup>20</sup> and the discharge of waste water<sup>21</sup> constituted significant adverse effects without considering cumulative effects. However, it cannot be assumed that these actions would in themselves have been capable of defeating the conservation objectives of the special protection areas concerned or of destroying essential components thereof. b

84. However, I must concur with the Commission in so far as it refers to the conservation objectives of the site. These objectives demonstrate its importance within Natura 2000. Therefore, each of these objectives is relevant to the network. If adverse effects resulting from plans and projects were accepted on the grounds that they merely rendered the attainment of these objectives difficult but not impossible or unlikely, the species numbers and habitat areas covered by Natura 2000 would be eroded by them. It would not even be possible to foresee the extent of this erosion with any degree of accuracy because no appropriate assessment would be carried out. These losses would not be offset because art 6(4) of the Habitats Directive would not apply. c

85. Thus, in principle any adverse effect on the conservation objectives must be regarded as a significant adverse effect on the integrity of the site concerned. Only effects which have no impact on the conservation objectives are relevant for the purposes of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive. d

86. The answer to this part of the third question must therefore be that any effect on the conservation objectives has a significant effect on the site concerned. e

D—Question (4): the appropriate assessment and appropriate steps

87. By its fourth question the Raad van State seeks to obtain the clarifications necessary to determine whether, in the present case, the competent authorities carried out an appropriate assessment and drew the necessary conclusions or took appropriate steps to avoid deterioration and disturbance. f

1—The appropriate assessment

88. In so far as it concerns the appropriate assessment, the fourth question relates, on the one hand, generally to the requirements concerning an appropriate assessment and, on the other, specifically to whether it is justified to refuse cockle fishing authorisations only where there is 'obvious doubt' as to the absence of significant adverse effects. In this connection the Raad van State raises the question whether the precautionary principle must be observed. g a (a) Submissions of the parties

(i) General remarks

89. PO Kokkelvisserij proposes deriving the requirements relating to the appropriate assessment from art 2(2) and (3) of the Habitats Directive under which, on the one hand, natural habitats and species of wild fauna and flora of Community interest are to be maintained or restored at favourable conservation status but, on the other, account is to be taken of economic, social and cultural requirements and regional and local characteristics.

90. The other parties agree that an appropriate assessment must relate to the effects of plans or projects on the conservation objectives of the site concerned. In that regard they propose methods with varying degrees of detail.

c (ii) The precautionary principle

91. Waddenvereniging, the Commission, the Netherlands government and PO Kokkelvisserij take the view that the precautionary principle laid down in art 174(2) EC (formerly art 130r of the EC Treaty) must be taken into account in interpreting art 6(2) and (3) of the Habitats Directive. Vogelbescherming d considers that art 6(2) and (3) of the Habitats Directive already gives sufficiently concrete expression to the precautionary principle and therefore renders unnecessary the reference to art 174(2) EC.

(iii) Doubt as to the absence of adverse effects

92. The Commission refers to the English and French language versions of the second sentence of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive, under which the competent authorities must be certain that the integrity of the site concerned will not be adversely affected. In the same way as Vogelbescherming and Waddenvereniging it consequently concludes that there may be no doubt that such adverse effects are unlikely.

93. The Netherlands government takes the view that criterion relating to obvious doubt must apply to art 6(2) and (3) of the Habitats Directive. For the purpose of applying the first sentence of art 6(3), obvious doubts are necessary to give rise to an appropriate assessment. Within the scope of the second sentence of art 6(3) authorisation must be possible where there is no absolute certainty, but only a high degree of certainty that adverse effects can be ruled out. Absolute certainty can rarely be attained. Accordingly, the authorisation of a plan or project can be denied only where obvious doubts remain after an appropriate assessment has been carried out.

94. PO Kokkelvisserij takes the view that the precautionary principle would be stretched too far if authorisation had to be denied where there was any doubt as to the absence of adverse effects. Referring also to the principle of proportionality, it proposes that where there is scientific uncertainty appropriate steps must be taken which cannot normally rule out all risks.

(b) Opinion

(i) Appropriate assessment

95. It should first be noted that the Habitats Directive does not lay down any methods for carrying out an appropriate assessment. In this respect it may be helpful to refer to the relevant documents of the Commission<sup>22</sup>, even though they are not legally binding. The court can in no way draw up, in abstract terms, a particular method for carrying out an appropriate assessment. However, it is possible to derive certain framework conditions from the directive. a

<sup>22</sup> See, for example, the guidelines cited in footnote 5, above, and the document entitled 'Assessment of plans and projects significantly affecting Natura 2000 sites, Methodological guidance on the provisions of Article 6(3) and (4) of the Habitats Directive 92/43/EEC', November 2001.

96. Most languages versions, and also the tenth recital in the preamble to the German version, expressly require an appropriate assessment. As the Commission in particular correctly states, it is also clear from the wording of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive that an appropriate assessment must precede agreement to a plan or project and that it must take account of cumulative effects which arise from combination with other plans or projects. b

97. This assessment must, of necessity, compare all the adverse effects arising from the plan or project with the site's conservation objectives. To that end, both the adverse effects and the conservation objectives must be identified. The conservation objectives can be deduced from the numbers within the site. However, it will often be difficult to encompass all adverse effects in an exhaustive manner. In many areas there is considerable scientific uncertainty as to cause and effect. If no certainty can be established even having exhausted all scientific means and sources, it will consequently be necessary also to work with probabilities and estimates. They must be identified and reasoned. c

98. Following an appropriate assessment, a reasoned judgment must be made as to whether or not the integrity of the site concerned will be adversely affected. In that respect it is necessary to list the areas in which the occurrence or absence of adverse effects cannot be established with certainty and also the conclusions drawn therefrom. e

(ii) Taking account of the precautionary principle and permissible doubts as regards the authorisation of plans and projects

99. As regards the decision on authorisation, the second sentence of the German version of the second sentence of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive provides that such decision is to be taken only when, in the light of the conclusions of the assessment of the implications for the site, the competent authorities have ascertained that it will not adversely affect the integrity of the site concerned. As the Commission correctly emphasises, the other language versions go further than a mere 'ascertainment' in that they require that the competent authorities establish certainty in this respect. Therefore, it must be concluded that the ascertainment required for agreement in the German version can be made only when, in the light of the conclusions of the assessment of the implications for the site, the competent authorities are certain that it will not adversely affect the integrity of the site concerned<sup>23</sup>. Therefore, as regards the decision the decisive factor is not whether such adverse effect can be proven but—conversely—that the authorising authorities ascertain that there are no such effects. f

100. This rule gives concrete expression to the precautionary principle laid down in art 174(2) EC in relation to a protection area covered by Natura 2000. The precautionary principle is not defined in Community law. It is examined in case law primarily in so far as protective measures may be taken, where there is uncertainty as to the existence or extent of risks, without having to wait until i a the reality and seriousness of those risks become fully apparent<sup>24</sup>. Therefore, the decisive factor is the element of scientific uncertainty as to the risks involved<sup>25</sup>. However, in each particular case the action associated with the protective measures must be proportionate to the assumed risk. In that regard the Commission stated in its communication on the precautionary principle that judging what is an 'acceptable' level of risk for society is an eminently political responsibility<sup>26</sup>. Such responsibility can be met only where the scientific uncertainty is minimised before a decision is taken by using the best available scientific means.

<sup>23</sup> See, to this effect, also the opinion of Advocate General Léger in European Commission v Austria Case C-209/02 (2003) Transcript (opinion), 6 November (para 40 et seq) (the Wörschach golf course case). The German version of the opinion is based, as regards para 30, on the difference set out between the German version of the directive and the other language versions.

c 101. Accordingly, the rulings of the court did not concern a 'failure to observe' the precautionary principle in abstract terms, but the application of provisions which give expression to the precautionary principle in relation to certain areas<sup>27</sup>. On the one hand, these provisions normally provide for a comprehensive scientific assessment and, on the other, specify the acceptable level of risk which remains after this assessment in each case or the margin of discretion of the relevant authorities.

d 102. Article 6(3) of the Habitats Directive constitutes such a rule. In order to avoid adverse effects on the integrity of Natura 2000 sites as a result of plans and projects, provision is firstly made for the use of the best available scientific means. This is done by means of a preliminary assessment of whether there are likely to be significant effects and then, where necessary, an appropriate assessment is carried out. The level of risk to the site which is still acceptable after this examination is set out in the second sentence of art 6(3). According to e that provision, the authorising authority can grant authorisation only when it is certain that the integrity of the site concerned will not be adversely affected. Consequently, remaining risks may not undermine this certainty.

f 103. However, it could be contrary to the principle of proportionality, which is cited by PO Kokkelvisserij, to require certainty as to the absence of adverse effects on the integrity of the site concerned before an authority may agree to a plan or project.

g 104. It is settled case law that the principle of proportionality is one of the general principles of Community law. A measure is proportionate only where it is both appropriate and necessary and not disproportionate to the objective pursued<sup>28</sup>. This principle is to be taken into account in interpreting Community law<sup>29</sup>.

24 See R v Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, ex p National Farmers' Union Case C-157/96 [1998] ECR I-2211 (para 63), UK v European Commission Case C-180/96 [1998] ECR I-2265 (para 99) and Monsanto Agricoltura Italia SpA v Presidenza del Consiglio dei Ministri Case C-236/01 [2003] ECR I-8105 (para 111).

h 25 For example, the Ministerial Declaration of the Sixth Trilateral Governmental Conference on the Protection of the Wadden Sea, Esbjerg, 13 November 1991, defined the precautionary principle as follows: '... to take action to avoid activities which are assumed to have significant damaging impact on the environment, even where there is no sufficient scientific evidence to prove a causal link between activities and their impact.'

28 See, for example, Germany v European Parliament Case C-233/94 [1997] ECR I-2405 (para 54), Norbrook Laboratories Ltd v Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food Case C-127/95 [1998] ECR I-1531 (para 89) and R v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, ex p Omega Air Ltd, Aero Engines Ireland Ltd v Irish Aviation Authority Joined cases C-27/00 and C-122/00 [2002] ECR I-2569 (para 62).

29 See Orkem v EC Commission Case 374/87 [1989] ECR 3283 (para 28).

105. The authorisation threshold laid down in the second sentence of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive is capable of preventing adverse effects on sites. No less stringent means of attaining this objective with comparable certainty is evident. There could be doubts only as regards the relationship between the authorisation threshold and the protection of the site which can be achieved thereby. a

106. However, disproportionate results are to be avoided in connection with the derogating authorisation provided for in art 6(4) of the Habitats Directive. Under this provision, plans or projects may be authorised, by way of derogation, in spite of a negative assessment of the implications for the site where there are imperative reasons of overriding public interest, there are no alternative solutions and all compensatory measures necessary to ensure that the overall coherence of Natura 2000 have been taken. Thus, in art 6(3) and (4) of the Habitats Directive the Community legislature itself set out the relationship between nature conservation and other interests. Consequently, no failure to observe the principle of proportionality can be established. b

107. However, the necessary certainty cannot be construed as meaning absolute certainty since that is almost impossible to attain. Instead, it is clear from the second sentence of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive that the competent authorities must take a decision having assessed all the relevant information which is set out in particular in the appropriate assessment. The conclusion of this assessment is, of necessity, subjective in nature. Therefore, the competent authorities can, from their point of view, be certain that there will be no adverse effects even though, from an objective point of view, there is no absolute certainty. d

108. Such a conclusion of the assessment is tenable only where the deciding authorities at least are satisfied that there is no reasonable doubt as to the absence of adverse effects on the integrity of the site concerned. As in the case of a preliminary assessment—provided for in the first sentence of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive—to establish whether a significant adverse effect on the site concerned is possible, account must also be taken here of the likelihood of harm occurring and the extent and nature of the anticipated harm<sup>30</sup>. Measures to minimise and avoid harm can also be of relevance. Precisely where scientific uncertainty exists, it is possible to gain further knowledge of the adverse effects by means of associated scientific observation and to manage implementation of the plan or project accordingly. f
g

109. In any event, the decisive considerations must be set out in the authorisation. They may be reviewed at least in so far as the authorising authorities' margin of discretion is exceeded. This would appear to be the case in particular where the findings of an appropriate assessment on possible adverse effects are contested without cogent factual arguments<sup>31</sup>. h

110. It is uncertain whether the Netherlands rule on the need for obvious doubt complies with the level of acceptable risk thus defined. It classifies as acceptable a risk of adverse effects which can still give rise to doubts which are reasonable but not obvious. However, such reasonable doubts would preclude the certainty that the integrity of the site concerned will not be adversely i

<sup>31</sup> In his opinion on the Wörschach golf course case (para 39) (see footnote 23, above) Advocate General Léger considered that the fact that the competent authorities had agreed to the project concerned even though the appropriate assessment had identified a not insignificant risk of serious disturbance constituted an infringement of the second sentence of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive.

- a affected which is necessary under Community law. The Raad van State's comments on the available scientific knowledge confirms this assessment. It refers to an expert report which concludes that there are gaps in knowledge and that the majority of the available research findings which are cited do not point unequivocally to serious adverse (irreversible) effects on the ecosystem. However, this finding merely means that serious adverse effects cannot be ascertained with certainty, not that they certainly do not exist.

b 111. In summary, the answer to the fourth question—in so far as it relates to art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive—must be that an appropriate assessment must precede agreement to a plan or project, take account of cumulative effects, and document all adverse effects on conservation objectives.

- c The competent authorities may agree to a plan or project only where, having considered all the relevant information, in particular the appropriate assessment, they are certain that the integrity of the site concerned will not be adversely affected. This presupposes that the competent authorities are satisfied that there is no reasonable doubt as to the absence of such adverse effects.

d 2—Article 6(2) of the Habitats Directive

112. The fourth question concerns not only an interpretation of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive but also the possible application of art 6(2) which would be possible if the annual authorisation of the cockle fishing were not classified as a plan or project.

e (a) Submissions of the parties

113. As regards 'appropriate steps' within the meaning of art 6(2) of the Habitats Directive, the Netherlands government, PO Kokkelvisserij and Vogelbescherming conclude that account must be taken not only of the needs of the relevant site, but also of economic, social and cultural requirements and regional and local characteristics, pursuant to art 2(3) of the Habitats Directive.

- f 114. The Netherlands government takes the view that obvious doubt as to the absence of adverse effects is required to trigger preventative measures also within the scope of art 6(2) of the Habitats Directive.

115. The Commission emphasises that art 6(2) of the Habitats Directive requires preventative measures to avoid deterioration and significant disturbance.

g (b) Opinion

116. In my view, there is no need to answer the fourth question as regards art 6(2) of the Habitats Directive. When a plan or project has been authorised, this provision has no function of its own in addition to art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive<sup>32</sup>. However, if the court should conclude that the annual authorisation of cockle fishing is not to be regarded as a plan or project, the question would arise as to which requirements on this authorisation follow from art 6(2) of the Habitats Directive.

- h 117. In this respect it should be borne in mind that where a plan or project is authorised the ascertainment—referred to in the second sentence of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive—that the integrity of the site concerned will not be adversely affected must also exclude deterioration and significant disruption under art 6(2) of the Habitats Directive<sup>33</sup>. It would be equally unacceptable for a

a measure which adversely affects the integrity of a Natura 2000 site not to be regarded as deterioration or significant disruption. The substantive standard of protection provided for by sub-paras (2) and (3) of art 6 of the Habitats Directive is identical. Consequently, the appropriate steps referred to in art 6(2) of the Habitats Directive must ensure that the integrity of a Natura 2000 site will not be adversely affected.

c
118. This obligation is permanent, that is to say even where it is necessary to take a decision on authorisation of a scheme which is not to be regarded as a plan or project. However, unlike art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive, art 6(2) contains no specific rules on how protection of the site is to be afforded in the authorisation procedure. Therefore, the competent authorities can also take measures other than those provided for in art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive to safeguard the objective of protection. However, such measures may be no less effective than the procedure under art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive. This standard of protection would not be provided if authorisation were granted even though reasonable doubts existed as to the absence of adverse effects on the integrity of the site concerned.

119. For the sake of completeness, it should be noted that in some circumstances the criteria set out in art 6(4) of the Habitats Directive would have to apply to authorise, by way of exception, a scheme which would adversely affect the integrity of the site. Thus, pursuant to art 2(3) of the Habitats Directive account could be taken of economic, social and cultural requirements and regional and local characteristics and at the same time the principle of proportionality could be given concrete expression.

120. The answer to this part of the fourth question must therefore be that where art 6(2) of the Habitats Directive applies to the authorisation of a scheme, such authorisation must, in substantive terms, provide the same standard of protection as authorisation granted pursuant to art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive.

E—Question (5): direct applicability of art 6(2) and (3) of the Habitats Directive

g
121. Finally, the Raad van State seeks to ascertain whether, in the absence of transposition into Netherlands law, art 6(2) and (3) of the Habitats Directive have direct effect in the sense that individuals may rely on them in national courts and those courts must afford them protection.

1—Submission of the parties

122. Waddenvereniging and Vogelbescherming take the view that art 6(2) and (3) of the Habitats Directive are sufficiently clear and unconditional to be directly applicable.

i 123. Vogelbescherming further points out that the Raad van State itself already considers that art 6(2) of the Habitats Directive is directly applicable by referring to the judgments in World Wildlife Fund (WWF) v Autonome Provinz Bozen<sup>34</sup> and Luxembourg v Linster<sup>35</sup>. At any rate, it is possible to ascertain, in accordance with these judgments, that the discretion available to the member states has been exceeded.

a 124. The Netherlands government also states that the two provisions could establish a sufficiently clear obligation at least in cases in which the limits of discretion granted to member states are reached. However, it leaves the decision to the court.

b 125. The Commission considers that the direct applicability of art 6(2) of the Habitats Directive is unlikely since the decision on which measures are to be taken is left to the member states. On the other hand, art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive is sufficiently clear and also unconditional, at least once a special protection area has been designated.

c 126. PO Kokkelvisserij considers that the two provisions are not directly applicable. This follows from the fact that the Commission has still not drawn up a list of sites of Community importance within the meaning of art 4(2) of the Habitats Directive. Moreover, the two provisions grant the member states a margin of discretion and are not sufficiently clear. Furthermore, the present case relates not to the use of the provisions in question as rights of prohibition but as grounds for entitlements. Finally, at the hearing PO Kokkelvisserij took the view that direct application would inevitably result in horizontal application to the detriment of third parties.

2—Opinion

e 127. The question submitted by the Raad van State requires consideration of three partial aspects. It is to be ascertained whether art 6(2) and (3) of the Habitats Directive satisfy the requirements for direct application, to whom and under what conditions they may be invoked in the member states and whether the indirect burden on the shellfish catchers precludes direct applicability.

(a) Direct applicability

f 128. As the court has consistently held, a provision of a directive is directly applicable on expiry of the period laid down for implementation where, as its subject matter is concerned, it is unconditional and sufficiently precise<sup>36</sup>.

g 129. Under art 23 of the Habitats Directive, member states are required to implement it within two years of its notification. The directive was notified on 5 June 1992 and therefore the period laid down for its implementation expired on 5 June 1994<sup>37</sup>.

h 130. Both provisions are unconditional, at least in respect of the Wadden Sea. Contrary to the opinion of PO Kokkelvisserij, the fact that there is no list of sites of Community importance within the meaning of art 4(2) of the Habitats Directive is irrelevant. Under art 7 of the Habitats Directive, art 6(2) to (4) thereof must be applied to the Wadden Sea as a special protection area, irrespective of whether or not this list has been drawn up<sup>38</sup>.

131. As regards the precision of the provisions, art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive lays down a body of rules made up of several stages which sets out i 36 See, inter alia, Marks & Spencer plc v Customs and Excise Comrs Case C-62/00 [2002] STC 1036, [2002] ECR I-6325 (para 25) and the case law cited therein.

37 See European Commission v Greece Case C-329/96 [1997] ECR I-3749 (para 2) and European Commission v Germany Case C-83/97 [1997] ECR I-7191 (para 2).

38 The extent to which these provisions are to be applied to sites within the meaning of the Habitats Directive before this list is drawn up will have to be examined in Società Italiana Dragaggi SpA v Ministero delle Infrastrutture e dei Trasporti and Regione Autonoma del Friuli Venezia Giulia Case C-117/03 OJ 2003 C146 p 19.

clearly the requirements and legal consequences at each stage. Therefore, in the light of the authorising authorities' discretion set out above, this provision is capable of having direct effect. a

132. Furthermore, art 6(2) of the Habitats Directive also contains clearly defined requirements, namely deterioration or significant disturbance of sites. There is, however, a margin of discretion as regards the appropriate steps to avoid such effects. b

133. This discretion could preclude direct application<sup>39</sup>. In the view of the Commission, a judgment of the court relating to art 4 of Council Directive (EEC) 75/442<sup>40</sup> also militates in favour of this conclusion. This provision is couched in general terms in a similar way to art 6(2) of the Habitats Directive. The court ruled that art 4 of Directive 75/442 indicates a programme to be followed and sets out the objectives which the member states must observe in their performance of other more specific obligations imposed on them by the directive. This provision must be regarded as defining the framework for the action to be taken by the member states regarding the treatment of waste and not as requiring, in itself, the adoption of specific measures or a particular method of waste disposal<sup>41</sup>. c

134. However, on closer examination, art 4 of Directive 75/442 and art 6(2) of the Habitats Directive are hardly comparable. Article 6(2) does not set out the objectives of the Habitats Directive, nor is this provision given concrete expression by other provisions. d

135. The parallels with judgments in which the court acknowledged direct applicability in spite of the member states' discretion are much stronger. For example, in the WWF case the court held that in national proceedings too individuals may plead that the national legislature has, in implementing a directive, exceeded the discretion granted to it by Community law<sup>42</sup>. Otherwise the binding effect of the directive would be undermined. e

136. The implementation of art 6(2) of the Habitats Directive does not necessarily involve legislative measures. However, the courts can establish a fortiori whether or not the discretion has been exceeded in selecting the appropriate measures. It is relatively easy to declare misuse of power in particular where no steps were taken to avoid imminent deterioration or significant disturbance or where no further measures were adopted despite the obvious ineffectiveness of the measures taken previously. f

137. Therefore, art 6(2) of the Habitats Directive is directly applicable in so far as misuse of power is claimed. g

(b) The question whether an individual may rely on art 6(2) and (3) of the Habitats Directive

138. It does not inevitably follow from the direct applicability of a provision of Community law that any individual may bring an action before the courts h a where there is failure to comply with it. In the present case the question arises as to whether and under what conditions individuals—or non-governmental organisations—may rely on provisions relating to the conservation of natural habitats and species.

b 139. According to the established case law, wherever the provisions of a directive appear, so far as their subject matter is concerned, to be unconditional and sufficiently precise, they may, in the absence of implementing measures adopted within the prescribed period, be relied on against any national provision which is incompatible with the directive or in so far as they define rights which individuals are able to assert against the state<sup>43</sup>.

c 140. Accordingly, the court draws a distinction between the directly applicable provisions of a directive in terms of rights of prohibition and grounds for entitlements. Whereas rights of prohibition may be invoked against any conflicting national provision, entitlements must be laid down in the relevant provision<sup>44</sup>.

d 141. As regards the aspect of rights of prohibition, the possibility of invoking them stems from the action (contrary to Community law) which is to be prohibited. Where avenues of legal redress against such action exist under national law, all relevant directly applicable provisions of the directive must be complied with within that framework. Therefore, in this regard an individual may rely on art 6(2) and (3) of the Habitats Directive where avenues of legal redress against measures infringing the above-mentioned provisions are available to him<sup>45</sup>.

e 142. In so far as directly applicable provisions of a directive establish entitlements, national law is subject to minimum standards of Community law as regards the availability of legal redress. It follows from the settled case law of the court that although, in the absence of Community rules governing the matter, it is for the domestic legal system of each member state to designate the courts and tribunals having jurisdiction and to lay down the detailed procedural rules governing actions for safeguarding rights which individuals derive directly from Community law, such rules may not be less favourable than those governing similar domestic actions (the principle of equivalence) and may not render practically impossible or excessively difficult the exercise of rights conferred by Community law (the principle of effectiveness)<sup>46</sup>.

g 143. However, there is no evidence to suggest that rights of an individual are established. The objective of protection laid down by art 6(2) and (3) of the Habitats Directive is to conserve habitats and species within areas which form part of Natura 2000. Unlike in the case of rules on the quality of the atmosphere or water<sup>47</sup>, the protection of common natural heritage is of particular interest<sup>48</sup> but not a right established for the benefit of individuals. The close interests of individuals can be promoted only indirectly, as a reflex so to speak. a

144. The answer to the fifth question must therefore be that individuals may rely on art 6(2) and (3) of the Habitats Directive in so far as avenues of legal redress against measures infringing the above-mentioned provisions are available to them under national law. b

(c) Burden imposed on third parties by the direct application of art 6(2) and (3) of the Habitats Directive

145. In the present case the direct application of arts 6(2) and (3) of the Habitats Directive could be precluded by the disadvantages to cockle fishermen stated by PO Kokkelvisserij. c

146. It is true that, according to case law, a directive which has not been transposed does give rise to obligations on individuals either in regard to other individuals or, a fortiori, in regard to the member state itself<sup>49</sup>. This case law is based on the fact that under art 249 EC (formerly art 189 of the EC Treaty) a directive is binding upon each member state to which it is addressed but not upon the individual. It could be understood as meaning that any burden on citizens as a result of directly applicable directives must be excluded. d

147. In this regard, it should be noted, firstly, that in any event the provisions of the relevant national law must, as far as possible, be interpreted in such a way that the purposes of Community law, and in particular of the relevant provisions of the directive, are achieved<sup>50</sup>. The Raad van State itself states that such an interpretation, in accordance with the directive, of art 12 of the Netherlands Natural Conservation law is possible. Moreover, any discretion which may exist must be exercised to this effect. e

148. Secondly, on closer examination the case law does not necessarily preclude any burden on citizens resulting from directly applicable directives. The judgments rejecting direct applicability concerned, on the one hand, the application of directives in the civil law relationship between citizens<sup>51</sup>, and on the other, citizen's obligations towards the state, in particular in the field of criminal law<sup>52</sup>. Moreover, it can be inferred from ECSC v Acciaierie e Ferriere Busseini SpA (in liq)<sup>53</sup>, which concerned the status of a Community claim in bankruptcy proceedings, that directly applicable directives cannot undermine vested rights. f

149. However, where an activity requires authorisation before it can be carried on, direct application of the provisions of a directive does not, as regards the decision on such authorisation, result in a direct obligation on individuals, nor would it encroach on vested rights. On the contrary, it merely g

- a* precludes granting an advantage to an individual which would involve a state decision in his favour. This decision would be based on provisions of national law contrary to the requirements of the directive. Therefore, by adopting such a decision the member state would be failing to fulfil its obligations under the directive. However, member states may not adopt such a decision which grants an advantage to an individual but infringes Community law. Either the relevant provisions of national law underlying the grant of such advantage must be interpreted and applied in conformity with the directive, or—where interpretation in conformity with the directive is not possible—they must not be applied. At least as long as legal positions protected by Community law are not affected, such an indirect burden on citizens does not preclude state authorities from being bound by directly applicable directives.

c 150. This view can be based on other cases in which the court permitted an indirect burden on individuals by the direct application of directives<sup>54</sup>. The court recently confirmed this view when it ruled that mere adverse repercussions on the rights of third parties, even if the repercussions are certain, do not justify preventing an individual from invoking the provisions of a directive against the member state concerned<sup>55</sup>.

- d* 151. In summary, the answer to the fifth question must therefore be that individuals may rely on art 6(3) of Directive 92/43 in so far as avenues of legal redress against measures infringing the above-mentioned provisions are available to them under national law. They may, under the same conditions, rely on art 6(2) of Directive 92/43 in so far as error of assessment is claimed.
- e* An indirect burden on citizens which does not encroach on legal positions protected by Community law does not preclude the recognised (vertical) binding of state authorities to directly applicable directives.

V—CONCLUSION

- f* 152. I propose that the Court of Justice answer the questions referred for a preliminary ruling by the Raad van State as follows:

g (1) The words ‘plan and project’ in art 6(3) of Council Directive (EEC) 92/43 (on the conservation of natural habitats and of wild fauna and flora) also cover an activity which has already been carried on for many years but for which an authorisation is in principle granted each year for a limited period.

h (2) Article 6(3) of Directive 92/43 lays down the procedure for authorising plans and projects which do not affect the integrity of protection sites, whereas art 6(2) thereof lays down permanent obligations irrespective of the authorisation of plans and projects, namely to avoid deterioration and disturbance which could be significant in relation to the objectives of the directive.

(3) An appropriate assessment is always necessary where reasonable doubt exists as to the absence of significant adverse effects. Any effect on the conservation objectives has a significant effect on the site concerned.

i 54 See Tögel v Niederösterreichische Gebietskrankenkasse Case C-76/97 [1998] ECR I-5357 (para 52), Fratelli Costanzo SpA v Comune di Milano Case 103/88 [1989] ECR 1839 (para 28), both concerning public procurement; and R v Medicines Control Agency, ex p Smith & Nephew Pharmaceuticals Ltd Case C-201/94 (1996) 34 BMLR 141, [1996] ECR I-5819 (para 35 et seq), concerning the licensing of medicinal products. See also the opinion of Advocate General Léger in R (on the application of Wells) v Secretary of State for Transport, Local Government and the Regions Case C-201/02 [2005] All ER (EC) 323 (para 65 et seq), concerning the directive on environmental impact assessment.

55 See the judgment in Wells’ case (para 57), cited in footnote above.

(4) An appropriate assessment must precede agreement to a plan or project, take account of cumulative effects, and document all adverse effects on conservation objectives. a

The competent authorities may agree to a plan or project only where, having considered all the relevant information, in particular the appropriate assessment, they are certain that the integrity of the site concerned will not be adversely affected. This presupposes that the competent authorities are satisfied that there is no reasonable doubt as to the absence of such adverse effects. b

Where art 6(2) of Directive 92/43 applies to the authorisation of a scheme such authorisation must, in substantive terms, provide the same standard of protection as authorisation granted pursuant to art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive. c

(5) Individuals may rely on art 6(3) of Directive 92/43 in so far as avenues of legal redress against measures infringing the above-mentioned provisions are available to them under national law. They may, under the same conditions, rely on art 6(2) of Directive 92/43 in so far as error of assessment is claimed. An indirect burden on citizens which does not encroach on legal positions protected by Community law does not preclude the recognised (vertical) binding of state authorities to directly applicable directives. d

1. The reference for a preliminary ruling concerns the interpretation of art 6 of Council Directive (EEC) 92/43 (on the conservation of natural habitats and of wild fauna and flora) (OJ 1992 L206 p 7) (the Habitats Directive). f

2. The reference was made in proceedings between the Landelijke Vereniging tot Behoud van de Waddenzee (National association for conservation of the Waddenzee, the Waddenvereniging) and the Nederlandse Vereniging tot Bescherming van Vogels (Netherlands association for the protection of birds, the Vogelbeschermingsvereniging) on the one hand and the Staatssecretaris van Landbouw, Natuurbeheer en Visserij (Secretary of State for agriculture, nature conservation and fisheries, the Secretary of State) on the other in respect of licences which the latter issued to the Coöperatieve Producentenorganisatie van de Nederlandse Kokkelvisserij UA (Cooperative producers' association of Netherlands cockle fisheries, the PO Kokkelvisserij) for the mechanical fishing of cockles in the special protection area (SPA) of the Waddenzee, classified within the meaning of art 4 of Council Directive (EEC) 79/409 (on the conservation of wild birds) (OJ 1979 L103 p 1) (the Birds Directive). g

LEGAL FRAMEWORK

The Birds Directive

3. Article 4(1) and (2) of the Birds Directive requires member states to classify as SPAs the territories satisfying the ornithological criteria established by those provisions. i

4. Article 4(4) of the Birds Directive provides:

'In respect of the protection areas referred to in paragraphs 1 and 2 above, Member States shall take appropriate steps to avoid pollution or deterioration of habitats or any disturbances affecting the birds, in so far as

- a these would be significant having regard to the objectives of this article. Outside these protection areas, Member States shall also strive to avoid pollution or deterioration of habitats.'

The Habitats Directive

5. Article 6 of the Habitats Directive states:

- b '1. For special areas of conservation, Member States shall establish the necessary conservation measures involving, if need be, appropriate management plans specifically designed for the sites or integrated into other development plans, and appropriate statutory, administrative or contractual measures which correspond to the ecological requirements of the natural habitat types in Annex I and the species in Annex II present on the sites.

- c 2. Member States shall take appropriate steps to avoid, in the special areas of conservation, the deterioration of natural habitats and the habitats of species as well as disturbance of the species for which the areas have been designated, in so far as such disturbance could be significant in relation to the objectives of this Directive.

- d 3. Any plan or project not directly connected with or necessary to the management of the site but likely to have a significant effect thereon, either individually or in combination with other plans or projects, shall be subject to appropriate assessment of its implications for the site in view of the site's conservation objectives. In the light of the conclusions of the assessment of the implications for the site and subject to the provisions of paragraph 4, the competent national authorities shall agree to the plan or project only after having ascertained that it will not adversely affect the integrity of the site concerned and, if appropriate, after having obtained the opinion of the general public.

- e 4. If, in spite of a negative assessment of the implications for the site and in the absence of alternative solutions, a plan or project must nevertheless be carried out for imperative reasons of overriding public interest, including those of a social or economic nature, the Member State shall take all compensatory measures necessary to ensure that the overall coherence of Natura 2000 is protected. It shall inform the Commission of the compensatory measures adopted.

- g Where the site concerned hosts a priority natural habitat type and/or a priority species, the only considerations which may be raised are those relating to human health or public safety, to beneficial consequences of primary importance for the environment or, further to an opinion from the Commission, to other imperative reasons of overriding public interest.'

- h 6. Article 7 of the Habitats Directive states that—

- i 'obligations arising under Article 6(2), (3) and (4) of this Directive shall replace any obligations arising under the first sentence of Article 4(4) of [the Birds Directive] in respect of areas classified pursuant to Article 4(1) or similarly recognised under Article 4(2) thereof, as from the date of implementation of this Directive or the date of classification or recognition by a Member State under [the Birds Directive], where the latter date is later.'

NATIONAL LEGISLATION

7. Under art 12(1) of the Natuurbeschermingswet (Nature Conservation Law), it is prohibited to carry out, to have carried out or to allow actions which are harmful to the natural integrity or the scientific importance of a protected natural site or disfigure it, without authorisation by the Minister van Landbouw, Natuurbeheer en Visserij (Minister for Agriculture, nature conservation and fisheries, the Minister) or in breach of the conditions accompanying that authorisation. Under art 12(2), activities harmful to the essential characteristics of a protected natural site, as set out in the designation decision, are always to be considered harmful to the natural integrity of such a site or its interest in natural science terms. a

8. It is clear from the order of 17 November 1993 designating the Waddenzee as a national natural site and from the explanatory memorandum for that order, which is an integral part of it, that the policy of authorisations and revocations under the Natuurbeschermingswet is linked to that followed under the Planologische Kernbeslissing Waddenzee (Key planning decision for the Waddenzee, hereinafter the PKB Waddenzee). According to that explanatory memorandum, applying the procedures of the Natuurbeschermingswet creates an adequate framework for controlling activities which might harm the main objective of the PKB Waddenzee, namely, sustainable protection and development of that sea as a natural site and, in particular, of feeding, nesting and resting areas for birds frequenting that site. Human activities for economic purposes are allowed subject to an adequate assessment in the light of the main objective. Activities envisaged in the Waddenzee must therefore be examined in the light of the above-mentioned objective and policy guidelines and assessed in terms thereof. b

9. The section in the PKB Waddenzee devoted to coastal fisheries management is implemented in the government decision of 21 January 1993, namely, the Structuurnota Zee- en kustvisserij 'Vissen naar evenwicht' (Structure Document on Marine and Inshore Fisheries 'Fishing for equilibrium'). This establishes the policy for shellfish fishing, inter alia in the Waddenzee, for the years 1993–2003 and includes a number of restrictions as regards cockle fishing. Certain areas in the national natural site are permanently closed to cockle fishing and in years in which food is scarce, 60% of the average food requirement of birds in the form of cockles and mussels is reserved for them. While 100% of their average food requirement is not thus reserved, that is because they can also turn to alternative food sources (Baltic clams, surf clams and shore crabs). c

10. Under the PKB Waddenzee, it follows from the precautionary principle that where the most reliable information available leaves obvious doubt as to the absence of possible significant adverse effects on the ecosystem, the benefit of the doubt will favour conservation of the Waddenzee. The order for reference makes clear that most of the available scientific studies consulted do not unequivocally indicate the existence of significant adverse effects on the ecosystem of the Waddenzee linked to mechanical cockle fishing. d

THE MAIN ACTION AND THE QUESTIONS REFERRED

11. By decisions of 1 July 1999 and 7 July 2000 (the decisions at issue in the main action), the Secretary of State issued licences to PO Kokkelvisserij, subject to certain conditions, to engage in mechanical cockle fishing in the Waddenzee SPA during the periods from 16 August to 25 November 1999 and 14 August to 30 November 2000 respectively. e

12. The Waddenvereniging and the Vogelbeschermingsvereniging challenged those decisions before the Secretary of State, who, by decisions of f a 23 December 1999 and 19 February 2001, held that the complaints made against the decisions at issue in the main action were not founded and rejected the applications against them.

b 13. Those nature protection associations brought an action against those rejections before the Raad van State (Council of State). They claimed in essence that cockle fishing, as authorised by the decisions at issue in the main action, causes permanent damage to the geomorphology, flora and fauna of the Waddenzee's seabed. They also submitted that such fishing reduces the food stocks of birds which feed on shellfish, causing a decline in their populations, in particular for oyster-catchers and eider ducks. The Waddenvereniging and the Vogelbeschermingsvereniging also claimed that those decisions were contrary to the Habitats and Birds Directives.

c 14. As regards the correct transposition of art 6(2) to (4) of the Habitats Directive into Netherlands law, the Raad van State states that art 12 of the Natuurbeschermingswet, although not expressly intended to implement the obligations laid down in art 6(2) of the Habitats Directive, may be interpreted in a manner consistent with that provision. Similarly, the d Natuurbeschermingswet does not contain rules which implement art 6(3) and (4) of that directive. Nor are there generally binding rules intended to implement the provisions of those two paragraphs which are otherwise applicable to the Waddenzee.

e 15. The national court also states that according to the Waddenvereniging and the Vogelbeschermingsvereniging, in view of the expansion of cockle fishing in the Waddenzee SPA, there is a 'plan or project' which should be subject to 'appropriate assessment' in accordance with art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive whereas the Secretary of State contends that the activity in question, inasmuch as it has been carried on for many years without any intensification, falls within art 6(2) of that directive.

f 16. As regards the relationship between art 6(2) and (3) of the Habitats Directive, the Waddenvereniging and the Vogelbeschermingsvereniging submit that although the activity for which licences were granted must be described as a 'plan' or 'project' within the meaning of art 6(3), it must nevertheless be examined in the light of art 6(2). It is therefore appropriate to consider whether art 6(3) must be regarded as a specific application of the rules in art 6(2), so that g those two paragraphs must be applied cumulatively, or as a provision with a separate, independent purpose, so that art 6(2) relates to existing use while art 6(3) applies to new plans or projects.

h 17. The Raad van State asks under what conditions an 'appropriate assessment' of the effect of the plan or project on the site concerned must be carried out. In addition, it asks what the criteria are on the basis of which it must be determined whether 'appropriate steps' or an 'appropriate assessment' are concerned, also in the light of the requirement laid down in art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive for the competent authorities to agree to a plan or project only after having ascertained that it will not adversely affect the integrity of the site concerned.

i 18. Finally, the national court considers it relevant to know whether art 6(2) and (3) of the Habitats Directive has direct effect.

19. In those circumstances, the Raad van State decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following questions to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling:

(1)(a) Are the words “plan or project” in Article 6(3) of Council Directive 92/43/EEC of 21 May 1992 on the conservation of natural habitats and of wild fauna and flora to be interpreted as also covering an activity which has already been carried on for many years but for which an authorisation is in principle granted each year for a limited period, with a fresh assessment being carried out on each occasion as to whether, and if so in which sections of the area, the activity may be carried on? a

(b) If the answer to Question (1)(a) is in the negative, must the relevant activity be regarded as a “plan or project” if the intensity of this activity has increased over the years or an increase in it is made possible by the authorisations? b

(2)(a) If it follows from the answer to Question (1) that there is a “plan or project” within the meaning of Article 6(3) of the Habitats Directive, is Article 6(3) of the Habitats Directive to be regarded as a special application of the rules in Article 6(2) or as a provision with a separate, independent purpose in the sense that, for example: (i) Article 6(2) relates to existing use and Article 6(3) to new plans or projects, or (ii) Article 6(2) relates to management measures and Article 6(3) to other decisions, or (iii) Article 6(3) relates to plans or projects and Article 6(2) to other activities? c

(b) If Article 6(3) of the Habitats Directive is to be regarded as a special application of the rules in Article 6(2), can the two subparagraphs be applicable cumulatively? d

(3)(a) Is Article 6(3) of the Habitats Directive to be interpreted as meaning that there is a “plan or project” once a particular activity is likely to have an effect on the site concerned (and an “appropriate assessment” must then be carried out to ascertain whether or not the effect is “significant”) or does this provision mean that an “appropriate assessment” has to be carried out only where there is a (sufficient) likelihood that a “plan or project” will have a significant effect? e

(b) On the basis of which criteria must it be determined whether or not a plan or project within the meaning of Article 6(3) of the Habitats Directive not directly connected with or necessary to the management of the site is likely to have a significant effect thereon, either individually or in combination with other plans or projects? f

(4)(a) When Article 6(3) of the Habitats Directive is applied, on the basis of which criteria must it be determined whether or not there are “appropriate steps” within the meaning of Article 6(2) or an “appropriate assessment”, within the meaning of Article 6(3), in connection with the certainty required before agreeing to a plan or project? g

(b) Do the terms “appropriate steps” or “appropriate assessment” have independent meaning or, in assessing these terms, is account also to be taken of Article 174(2) EC and in particular the precautionary principle referred to therein? h

(c) If account must be taken of the precautionary principle referred to in Article 174(2) EC, does that mean that a particular activity, such as the cockle fishing in question, can be authorised where there is no obvious doubt as to the absence of a possible significant effect or is that permissible only where there is no doubt as to the absence of such an effect or where the absence can be ascertained? i

(5) Do Article 6(2) or Article 6(3) of the Habitats Directive have direct effect in the sense that individuals may rely on them in national courts and a those courts must provide the protection afforded to individuals by the direct effect of Community law, as was held inter alia in [SCS Peterbroeck Van Campenhout & Cie v Belgium Case C-312/93 [1996] All ER (EC) 242, [1995] ECR I-4599]?’

b 20. By order of 28 April 2004, the application by PO Kokkelvisserij to be allowed to submit written observations in response to Advocate General Kokott’s opinion or otherwise to be given an opportunity to respond to that opinion was rejected.

THE QUESTIONS REFERRED

First question

c Question (1)(a)

21. By question (1)(a), the national court in essence asks whether mechanical cockle fishing which has been carried on for many years but for which a licence is granted annually for a limited period, with each licence entailing a new assessment both of the possibility of carrying on that activity and of the site
d where it may take place, falls within the concept of ‘plan’ or ‘project’ within the meaning of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive.

22. The tenth recital in the preamble to the Habitats Directive states that ‘an appropriate assessment must be made of any plan or programme likely to have a significant effect on the conservation objectives of a site which has been designated or is designated in future’. That recital finds expression in art 6(3) of e the directive, which provides inter alia that a plan or project likely to have a significant effect on the site concerned cannot be authorised without a prior assessment of its effects.

23. The Habitats Directive does not define the terms ‘plan’ and ‘project’.

24. By contrast, Council Directive (EEC) 85/337 (on the assessment of the effects of certain public and private projects on the environment) (OJ 1985 L175 p 40), the sixth recital in the preamble to which states that development consent for projects which are likely to have significant effects on the environment should be granted only after prior assessment of the likely significant environmental effects of these projects has been carried out, defines f ‘project’ as follows in art 1(2):

g ‘—the execution of construction works or of other installations or schemes, —other interventions in the natural surroundings and landscape including those involving the extraction of mineral resources.’

25. An activity such as mechanical cockle fishing is within the concept of h ‘project’ as defined in the second indent of art 1(2) of Directive 85/337.

26. Such a definition of ‘project’ is relevant to defining the concept of plan or project as provided for in the Habitats Directive, which, as is clear from the foregoing, seeks, as does Directive 85/337, to prevent activities which are likely to damage the environment from being authorised without prior assessment of their impact on the environment.

i 27. Therefore, an activity such as mechanical cockle fishing is covered by the concept of plan or project set out in art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive.

28. The fact that the activity has been carried on periodically for several years on the site concerned and that a licence has to be obtained for it every year, each new issuance of which requires an assessment both of the possibility of carrying on that activity and of the site where it may be carried on, does not in itself constitute an obstacle to considering it, at the time of each application, as a distinct plan or project within the meaning of the Habitats Directive. a

29. The answer to question (1)(a) must therefore be that mechanical cockle fishing which has been carried on for many years but for which a licence is granted annually for a limited period, with each licence entailing a new assessment both of the possibility of carrying on that activity and of the site where it may be carried on, falls within the concept of 'plan' or 'project' within the meaning of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive. b

Question (1)(b)

30. In the light of the reply to question (1)(a), there is no need to reply to question (1)(b). c

Second question

31. By its second question, the national court in essence asks what the relationship is between art 6(2) and (3) of the Habitats Directive.

32. It should be recalled that art 6(2) of the Habitats Directive, in conjunction with art 7 thereof, requires member states to take appropriate steps to avoid, in SPAs, the deterioration of habitats and significant disturbance of the species for which the areas have been designated. d

33. Article 6(3) of the Habitats Directive provides that the competent national authorities are to authorise a plan or project not directly connected with or necessary to the management of the site but likely to have a significant effect thereon only after having ascertained, by means of an appropriate assessment of the implications of that plan or project for the site, that it will not adversely affect the integrity of the site. e

34. That provision thus establishes a procedure intended to ensure, by means of a preliminary examination, that a plan or project which is not directly connected with or necessary to the management of the site concerned but likely to have a significant effect on it is authorised only to the extent that it will not adversely affect the integrity of that site. f

35. The fact that a plan or project has been authorised according to the procedure laid down in art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive renders superfluous, as regards the action to be taken on the protected site under the plan or project, a concomitant application of the rule of general protection laid down in art 6(2). g

36. Authorisation of a plan or project granted in accordance with art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive necessarily assumes that it is considered not likely adversely to affect the integrity of the site concerned and, consequently, not likely to give rise to deterioration or significant disturbances within the meaning of art 6(2). h

37. Nevertheless, it cannot be precluded that such a plan or project subsequently proves likely to give rise to such deterioration or disturbance, even where the competent national authorities cannot be held responsible for any error. Under those conditions, application of art 6(2) of the Habitats Directive makes it possible to satisfy the essential objective of the preservation and protection of the quality of the environment, including the conservation of natural habitats and of wild fauna and flora, as stated in the first recital in the preamble to that directive. i

38. The answer to the second question must therefore be that art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive establishes a procedure intended to ensure, by means of a preliminary examination, that a plan or project which is not directly connected

- a with or necessary to the management of the site concerned but likely to have a significant effect on it is authorised only to the extent that it will not adversely affect the integrity of that site, while art 6(2) of the Habitats Directive establishes an obligation of general protection consisting in avoiding deterioration and disturbances which could have significant effects in the light of the directive's objectives, and cannot be applicable concomitantly with
- b art 6(3).

Third question

Question (3)(a)

- c 39. According to the first sentence of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive, any plan or project not directly connected with or necessary to the management of the site but likely to have a significant effect thereon, either individually or in combination with other plans or projects, is to be subject to appropriate assessment of its implications for the site in view of the site's conservation objectives.
- d 40. The requirement for an appropriate assessment of the implications of a plan or project is thus conditional on its being likely to have a significant effect on the site.
- e 41. Therefore, the triggering of the environmental protection mechanism provided for in art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive does not presume—as is, moreover, clear from the guidelines for interpreting that article drawn up by the Commission of the European Communities, entitled 'Managing Natura 2000 Sites: The provisions of art 6 of the "Habitats" Directive (92/43/EEC)'—that the plan or project considered definitely has significant effects on the site concerned but follows from the mere probability that such an effect attaches to that plan or project.
- f 42. As regards art 2(1) of Directive 85/337, the text of which, essentially similar to art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive, provides that 'Member States shall adopt all measures necessary to ensure that, before consent is given, projects likely to have significant effects on the environment ... are made subject to an assessment with regard to their effects', the Court of Justice has held that these are projects which are likely to have significant effects on the environment (see to that effect European Commission v Portugal Case C-117/02 (2004) Transcript (judgment), 29 April (para 85)).
- g 43. It follows that the first sentence of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive subordinates the requirement for an appropriate assessment of the implications of a plan or project to the condition that there be a probability or a risk that the latter will have significant effects on the site concerned.
- h 44. In the light, in particular, of the precautionary principle, which is one of the foundations of the high level of protection pursued by Community policy on the environment, in accordance with the first subparagraph of art 174(2) EC (formerly art 130r of the EC Treaty), and by reference to which the Habitats Directive must be interpreted, such a risk exists if it cannot be excluded on the basis of objective information that the plan or project will have significant effects on the site concerned (see, by analogy, inter alia UK v European Commission Case C-180/96 [1998] ECR I-2265 (paras 50, 105, 107)).
- i Such an interpretation of the condition to which the assessment of the implications of a plan or project for a specific site is subject, which implies that in case of doubt as to the absence of significant effects such an assessment must be carried out, makes it possible to ensure effectively that plans or projects which adversely affect the integrity of the site concerned are not authorised, and thereby contributes to achieving, in accordance with the third recital in the preamble to the Habitats Directive and art 2(1) thereof, its main aim, namely, ensuring biodiversity through the conservation of natural habitats and of wild fauna and flora. a

45. In the light of the foregoing, the answer to question (3)(a) must be that the first sentence of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive must be interpreted as meaning that any plan or project not directly connected with or necessary to the management of the site is to be subject to an appropriate assessment of its implications for the site in view of the site's conservation objectives if it cannot be excluded, on the basis of objective information, that it will have a significant effect on that site, either individually or in combination with other plans or projects. b

Question (3)(b)

46. As is clear from the first sentence of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive in conjunction with the tenth recital in its preamble, the significant nature of the effect on a site of a plan or project not directly connected with or necessary to the management of the site is linked to the site's conservation objectives. d

47. So, where such a plan or project has an effect on that site but is not likely to undermine its conservation objectives, it cannot be considered likely to have a significant effect on the site concerned.

48. Conversely, where such a plan or project is likely to undermine the conservation objectives of the site concerned, it must necessarily be considered likely to have a significant effect on the site. As the Commission in essence maintains, in assessing the potential effects of a plan or project, their significance must be established in the light, inter alia, of the characteristics and specific environmental conditions of the site concerned by that plan or project. e

49. The answer to question (3)(b) must therefore be that, pursuant to the first sentence of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive, where a plan or project not directly connected with or necessary to the management of a site is likely to undermine the site's conservation objectives, it must be considered likely to have a significant effect on that site. The assessment of that risk must be made in the light inter alia of the characteristics and specific environmental conditions of the site concerned by such a plan or project. f

Fourth question

50. By questions (4)(a) to (c), the national court in essence asks the court to clarify the concepts of 'appropriate steps' within the meaning of art 6(2) of the Habitats Directive and 'appropriate assessment' within the meaning of art 6(3) thereof and the conditions under which an activity such as mechanical cockle fishing may be authorised. h

51. In the light of the context of the main action, as well as the foregoing observations, and in particular the answers to the first two questions, there is no need, as stated in para 116 of Advocate General Kokott's opinion, to answer the fourth question as regards art 6(2) of the Habitats Directive.

52. As regards the concept of 'appropriate assessment' within the meaning of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive, it must be pointed out that the provision does not define any particular method for carrying out such an assessment. i

53. None the less, according to the wording of that provision, an appropriate assessment of the implications for the site concerned of the plan or project must precede its approval and take into account the cumulative effects which a result from the combination of that plan or project with other plans or projects in view of the site's conservation objectives.

54. Such an assessment therefore implies that all the aspects of the plan or project which can, either individually or in combination with other plans or projects, affect those objectives must be identified in the light of the best scientific knowledge in the field. Those objectives may, as is clear from arts 3 and 4 of the Habitats Directive, in particular art 4(4), be established on the basis, inter alia, of the importance of the sites for the maintenance or restoration at a favourable conservation status of a natural habitat type in Annex I to that directive or a species in Annex II thereto and for the coherence of Natura 2000, and of the threats of degradation or destruction to which they are exposed.

55. As regards the conditions under which an activity such as mechanical cockle fishing may be authorised, given art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive and the answer to the first question, it lies with the competent national authorities, in the light of the conclusions of the assessment of the implications of a plan or project for the site concerned, to approve the plan or project only after having made sure that it will not adversely affect the integrity of that site.

56. It is therefore apparent that the plan or project in question may be granted authorisation only on the condition that the competent national authorities are convinced that it will not adversely affect the integrity of the site concerned.

57. So, where doubt remains as to the absence of adverse effects on the integrity of the site linked to the plan or project being considered, the competent authority will have to refuse authorisation.

58. In this respect, it is clear that the authorisation criterion laid down in the second sentence of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive integrates the precautionary principle (see R v Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, ex p National Farmers' Union Case C-157/96 [1998] ECR I-2211 (para 63)) and makes it possible effectively to prevent adverse effects on the integrity of protected sites as the result of the plans or projects being considered. A less stringent authorisation criterion than that in question could not as effectively ensure the fulfilment of the objective of site protection intended under that provision.

59. Therefore, pursuant to art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive, the competent national authorities, taking account of the conclusions of the appropriate assessment of the implications of mechanical cockle fishing for the site concerned, in the light of the site's conservation objectives, are to authorise such activity only if they have made certain that it will not adversely affect the integrity of that site. That is the case where no reasonable scientific doubt remains as to the absence of such effects (see, by analogy, Monsanto Agricoltura Italia SpA v Presidenza del Consiglio dei Ministri Case C-236/01 [2003] ECR I-8105 (paras 106, 113)).

60. Otherwise, mechanical cockle fishing could, where appropriate, be authorised under art 6(4) of the Habitats Directive, provided that the conditions set out therein are satisfied.

61. In view of the foregoing, the answer to the fourth question must be that, under art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive, an appropriate assessment of the implications for the site concerned of the plan or project implies that, prior to its approval, all the aspects of the plan or project which can, by themselves or in combination with other plans or projects, affect the site's conservation objectives must be identified in the light of the best scientific knowledge in the field. The competent national authorities, taking account of the appropriate assessment of the implications of mechanical cockle fishing for the site concerned in the light of the site's conservation objectives, are to authorise such an activity only if they have made certain that it will not adversely affect the integrity of that site. That is the case where no reasonable scientific doubt remains as to the absence of such effects.

Fifth question

62. In the light of the finding in para 51, above, it is not necessary to consider the fifth question in so far as it relates to art 6(2) of the Habitats Directive.

63. It is therefore appropriate to consider that question only in so far as it concerns art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive.

64. By its fifth question, the national court asks in essence whether, when a national court is called on to ascertain the lawfulness of an authorisation for a plan or project within the meaning of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive, it may examine whether the limits of discretion of the competent national authorities laid down by that provision have been complied with even though it has not been transposed into the legal order of the member state concerned despite the expiry of the time limit laid down for that purpose.

65. It should be recalled that the obligation of a member state to take all the measures necessary to achieve the result prescribed by a directive is a binding obligation imposed by the third paragraph of art 249 EC (formerly art 189 of the EC Treaty) and by the directive itself. That duty to take all appropriate measures, whether general or particular, is binding on all the authorities of member states including, for matters within their jurisdiction, the courts (see Aannemersbedrijf PK Kraaijeveld BV v Gedeputeerde Staten van Zuid-Holland Case C-72/95 [1997] All ER (EC) 134, [1996] ECR I-5403 (para 55)).

66. As regards the right of an individual to rely on a directive and of the national court to take it into consideration, it would be incompatible with the binding effect attributed to a directive by art 249 EC to exclude, in principle, the possibility that the obligation which it imposes may be relied on by those concerned. In particular, where the Community authorities have, by directive, imposed on member states the obligation to pursue a particular course of conduct, the effectiveness of such an act would be weakened if individuals were prevented from relying on it before their national courts, and if the latter were prevented from taking it into consideration as an element of Community law in order to rule whether the national legislature, in exercising the choice open to it as to the form and methods for implementation, has kept within the limits of its discretion set by the directive (see the Kraaijeveld case (para 56)). That also applies to ascertaining whether, failing transposition into national law of the relevant provision of the directive concerned, the national authority which has adopted the contested measure has kept within the limits of its discretion set by that provision.

67. More particularly, as regards the limits of discretion set by art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive, it follows from that provision that in a case such as that in the main action, the competent national authorities, taking account of the conclusions of the appropriate assessment of the implications of mechanical cockle fishing for the site concerned in the light of the site's conservation objectives, are to authorise such an activity only if they have made certain that it will not adversely affect the integrity of that site, that being the case if there remains no reasonable scientific doubt as to the absence of such effects (see para 59, above).

a 68. Such a condition would therefore not be observed were the national authorities to authorise that activity in the face of uncertainty as to the absence of adverse effects for the site concerned.

b 69. It follows that art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive may be taken into account by the national court in determining whether a national authority which has granted an authorisation relating to a plan or project has kept within the limits of the discretion set by the provision in question.

c 70. Consequently, the answer to the fifth question must be that where a national court is called on to ascertain the lawfulness of an authorisation for a plan or project within the meaning of art 6(3) of the Habitats Directive, it can determine whether the limits on the discretion of the competent national authorities set by that provision have been complied with, even though it has not been transposed into the legal order of the member state concerned despite the expiry of the time limit laid down for that purpose.

COSTS

d 71. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. Costs incurred in submitting observations to the court, other than the costs of those parties, are not recoverable.

On those grounds, the Court of Justice (Grand Chamber) rules as follows:

e (1) Mechanical cockle fishing which has been carried on for many years but for which a licence is granted annually for a limited period, with each licence entailing a new assessment both of the possibility of carrying on that activity and of the site where it may be carried on, falls within the concept of 'plan' or 'project' within the meaning of art 6(3) of Council Directive (EEC) 92/43 (on the conservation of natural habitats and of wild fauna and flora).

f (2) Article 6(3) of Directive 92/43 establishes a procedure intended to ensure, by means of a preliminary examination, that a plan or project which is not directly connected with or necessary to the management of the site concerned but likely to have a significant effect on it is authorised only to the extent that it will not adversely affect the integrity of that site, while art 6(2) of that directive establishes an obligation of general protection consisting in avoiding deterioration and disturbances which could have significant effects in the light of the directive's objectives, and cannot be applicable concomitantly with art 6(3).

g (3)(a) The first sentence of art 6(3) of Directive 92/43 must be interpreted as meaning that any plan or project not directly connected with or necessary to the management of the site is to be subject to an appropriate assessment of its implications for the site in view of the site's conservation objectives if it cannot be excluded, on the basis of objective information, that it will have a significant effect on that site, either individually or in combination with other plans or projects.

h (b) Pursuant to the first sentence of art 6(3) of Directive 92/43, where a plan or project not directly connected with or necessary to the management of a site is likely to undermine the site's conservation objectives, it must be considered likely to have a significant effect on that site. The assessment of that risk must be made in the light inter alia of the characteristics and specific environmental conditions of the site concerned by such a plan or project.

i (4) Under art 6(3) of Directive 92/43, an appropriate assessment of the implications for the site concerned of the plan or project implies that, prior to its approval, all the aspects of the plan or project which can, by themselves or in combination with other plans or projects, affect the site's conservation objectives must be identified in the light of the best scientific knowledge in the field. The competent national authorities, taking account of the appropriate assessment of the implications of mechanical cockle fishing for the site concerned in the light of the site's conservation objectives, are to authorise such an activity only if they have made certain that it will not adversely affect the integrity of that site. That is the case where no reasonable scientific doubt remains as to the absence of such effects. a

b

(5) Where a national court is called on to ascertain the lawfulness of an authorisation for a plan or project within the meaning of art 6(3) of Directive 92/43, it can determine whether the limits on the discretion of the competent national authorities set by that provision have been complied with, even though it has not been transposed into the legal order of the member state concerned despite the expiry of the time limit laid down for that purpose. c d European Community – Rules on state aids – Power of Council unanimously to authorise state aid – Commission declaring state aid contrary to common market and ordering repayment – Member state requesting that Council authorise subsequent aid intended to compensate for repayment obligation – Whether Council competent to declare compatible with common market aid allocating to beneficiaries of unlawful aid an amount designed to compensate for requisite repayments – Article 88(2) EC (formerly EC Treaty, art 93(2)).

11 DECEMBER 2003, 29 JUNE 2004

e Acting under art 88(2)<sup>a</sup> EC (formerly art 93(2) of the EC Treaty), the Commission of the European Communities had declared aid measures granted by the Portuguese government to operators in the pig-farming sector to be contrary to the common market. However, thereafter, at the request of the Portuguese government, the Council of the European Union, acting unanimously, had adopted Council Decision (EC) 2002/114 (authorising the government of Portugal to grant aid to Portuguese pig farmers who were the beneficiaries of the measures granted in 1994 and 1998), by which it had authorised further aid measures granted by the Portuguese government to compensate the pig farmers who were obliged to repay the aid that had been declared incompatible with the common market by the Commission. The Council's reasoning in adopting that decision had been that the repayment obligation threatened the economic viabilities of more than a few of the beneficiaries with damaging social effects in certain regions, such that exceptional circumstances existed for the purposes of art 88(2) EC, rendering, by way of derogation and to the extent necessary to remedy the imbalance that had arisen, the aid measure compatible with the common market. The Commission applied to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for annulment of that decision.

i Held – Where the Commission had declared an aid measure to be incompatible with the common market and ordered repayment, on the proper construction of art 88(2) EC, the Council was not competent validly to declare compatible with the common market an aid measure allocating to the beneficiaries of the unlawful aid measure an amount designed to compensate them for the repayments that they were required to make. It was clear that the Treaty had reserved a central role for the Commission in determining whether aid was incompatible with the common market, and the Council was not to a paralyse the effectiveness of a Commission decision declaring aid to be incompatible with the common market by itself declaring the same aid to be compatible with the common market on the basis of the third subparagraph of art 88(2) EC. Nor, therefore, might the Council thwart the effectiveness of

 b
 such a decision by declaring compatible with the common market an aid designed measure to compensate the beneficiaries of the unlawful aid for the repayments they are required to make pursuant to that decision. The aim of obliging the state concerned to abolish the unlawful aid was to restore situation existing before that aid had been granted, and that objective was attained once the unlawful aid had been repaid. In any event, the aid granted in the second instance was so indissolubly linked to that aid previously found
 c
 by the Commission to be unlawful that it appeared largely artificial to make a distinction between them for the purposes of applying art 88(2) EC. It followed that the Council had lacked the competence to have adopted the decision, which would be annulled (see judgment paras 29, 31, 33, 35, 42, 44–47, 51, below).

Application

By an application lodged on 25 March 2002 at the Registry of the Court of Justice of the European Communities, the Commission of the European Communities sought an annulment, pursuant to art 230 EC (formerly art 173 of the EC Treaty), of Council Decision (EC) 2002/114 (authorising the

- a government of Portugal to grant aid to Portuguese pig farmers who were beneficiaries of the measures granted in 1994 and 1998). By orders of the President of the Court of Justice of 16 and 19 September 2002, Portugal and France were each granted leave to intervene in support of the Council, the latter, however, being authorised to submit observations only in the event of oral proceedings taking place. The Commission was represented by F Santaolalla Gadea, D Triantafyllou and V Di Bucci, acting as agents, with an address for service in Luxembourg. The Council of the European Union was represented by J Carbery and F Florindo Gijón, acting as agents. Portugal was represented by L Fernandes and I Palma, acting as agents, with an address for service in Luxembourg. The language of the case was French. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General.

11 December 2003. The Advocate General (FG Jacobs) delivered the following opinion<sup>1</sup>.

1. In these proceedings, brought under art 230 EC (formerly art 173 of the EC Treaty), the Commission of the European Communities seeks
- d the annulment of Council Decision (EC) 2002/114<sup>2</sup>.

2. That decision (hereinafter the contested measure) was taken pursuant to the third subparagraph of art 88(2) EC (formerly art 93(2) of the EC Treaty), which empowers the Council of the European Union, where justified by exceptional circumstances, to declare compatible with the common market an aid which a member state is granting or intends to grant. It authorises Portugal
- e to make payments to a group of Portuguese pig farmers equivalent in amount to aid which those farmers have already received but have been required to repay following Commission decisions<sup>3</sup> declaring it incompatible with the Common Market.

3. The contested measure is apparently not the only recent decision of the
- f Council relying on the procedure laid down in the third subparagraph of art 88(2) EC to authorise an aid which serves to reimburse its recipients for having to repay another aid previously subject to a negative Commission decision<sup>4</sup>. The present proceedings therefore offer the Court of Justice of the European Communities the opportunity to determine whether such a use of the Council's power is consistent with the system laid down by the Treaty
- g for the control of state aid.

LEGAL FRAMEWORK

4. Article 87(1) EC (formerly art 92(1) of the EC Treaty) states that—

- h 'Save as otherwise provided in this Treaty, any aid granted by a Member State or through State resources in any form whatsoever which distorts or threatens to distort competition by favouring certain undertakings or the production of certain goods shall, insofar as it affects trade between Member States, be incompatible with the common market.’ a

4 See Council Decision (EC) 2000/257 (concerning aid granted in Italy by RIBS SpA in accordance with the provisions of national law no 700 of 19 December 1983 on the restructuring of the sugar beet sector) (OJ 2000 L79 p 38).

Article 87(2) specifies categories of aid which are compatible with the common market. Article 87(3) lays down categories of aid which may be considered to be so compatible.

5. The Treaty confers a central role on the Commission in supervising and controlling the granting of aid by the member states. Under art 88(1) EC, it is for the Commission, in co-operation with the member states, to ‘keep under constant review all systems of aid existing in those States’. The first subparagraph of art 88(2) EC empowers and requires the Commission to assess the compatibility of an aid with art 87 EC, and, if such aid is incompatible, to ‘decide that the state concerned shall abolish or alter it’ within a specified time period. Article 88(3) EC requires member states to notify the Commission of any plans to grant or alter aid, and prohibits them from implementing such plans until the Commission has reached a decision pursuant to the first paragraph of art 88(2) EC. Should the state in question not comply with such a decision, the second subparagraph of art 88(2) EC permits the Commission or any other interested state to refer the matter directly to the Court of Justice. b

6. The third and fourth subparagraphs of art 88(2) EC provide as follows:

‘On application by a Member State, the Council may, acting unanimously, decide that aid which that State is granting or intends to grant shall be considered to be compatible with the common market, in derogation from the provisions of Article 87 or from the regulations provided for in Article 89, if such a decision is justified by exceptional circumstances. If, as regards the aid in question, the Commission has already initiated the procedure provided for in the first subparagraph of this paragraph, the fact that the State concerned has made its application to the Council shall have the effect of suspending that procedure until the Council has made its attitude known.’ e

If, however the Council has not made its attitude known within three months of the said application being made, the Commission shall give its decision on the case.’

7. Article 89 EC (formerly art 94 of the EC Treaty) empowers the Council to make regulations for the application of arts 87 and 88 EC. Pursuant to that power, the Council has adopted Council Regulation (EC) 659/1999, which lays down detailed rules regarding the procedures to be followed in the application of art 88 EC<sup>5</sup>. g

8. Under art 36 EC, the competition rules contained in the Treaty, including those relating to state aid, apply to production of and trade in agricultural products only to the extent determined by the Council in legislation working out and implementing the common agricultural policy pursuant to art 37 EC (formerly art 43 of the EC Treaty). h

9. Article 21 of Council Regulation (EEC) 2759/75 (on the common organisation of the market in pigmeat)<sup>6</sup> states that, except as otherwise specified in that regulation, the state aid provisions of the Treaty are to apply to the production of and trade in pigs and pigmeat products. i

a THE FACTUAL BACKGROUND AND THE CONTESTED MEASURE

10. In 1994 and 1999, Portugal granted aid to its pig-farming sector (hereinafter the original aid). The 1994 aid was not notified to the Commission, and the 1999 aid was notified but implemented before the Commission decided as to its compatibility with the common market.

b 11. By Commission Decisions (EC) 2000/200 and (EC) 2001/86 (hereinafter the Commission decisions)<sup>7</sup> the Commission declared most of the original aid to be incompatible with the common market and ordered it to be repaid.

12. On 21 January 2002, following an application from the Portuguese government, the Council adopted the contested measure, which declared compatible with the common market a grant of aid by Portugal to the pig farmers who had benefited from the original aid 'equivalent to the amounts c which those beneficiaries must reimburse' under the Commission decisions.

13. Recitals (13) and (14) in the preamble to the contested measure contain the following justification for that measure:

'(13) ... refunding the [original aid] threatens the economic viability of not a few beneficiaries and would have extremely damaging social effects in certain regions because 50% of the pig herd is concentrated in less than 5% of the territory.

(14) Exceptional circumstances therefore exist, making it possible to consider such aid, by way of derogation and to the extent strictly necessary to remedy the imbalance which has arisen, to be compatible with the common market on the terms specified in this Decision.'

PROCEDURE AND CLAIMS OF THE PARTIES

14. In its application pursuant to art 230 EC, the Commission asks the court to annul the contested measure and to order the Council to pay the costs. It submits, in essence, that the Council was not entitled to adopt the measure given the Commission decisions on the original aid. By so doing, the Council is alleged to have exceeded its competence, misused its powers, and infringed the Treaty as well as general principles of Community law. Alternatively, the Commission submits that the Council committed a manifest error of appreciation in concluding that there were the exceptional circumstances required under the third subparagraph of art 88(2) EC. Further in the alternative, the Commission asserts that the contested measure is not adequately and correctly reasoned.

15. The Council asks the court to dismiss the application as unfounded and order the Commission to bear the costs. The Portuguese government has intervened in its support. The French government also applied for leave to intervene, but did so only after the expiry of the time limit specified in art 93(1) of the court's Rules of Procedure. It was therefore given leave, pursuant to art 93(7), to submit its observations during the oral procedure, if that procedure were to take place. In the event, a hearing was not requested, and none was held.

16. The Council and the Portuguese government argue principally that the contested measure relates to a new aid, and that from a legal viewpoint, it therefore leaves intact, and is unaffected by, the previous Commission decisions.

7 Cited in footnote 3, above.

IDENTIFICATION OF THE ISSUES

17. In the light of the arguments of the parties, the following issues fall to be considered.

—Is the Council entitled under the third subparagraph of art 88(2) EC to adopt a decision in respect of aid which has previously been the subject of a negative Commission decision?

—May the Council in any event authorise aid which has as its object and effect to assist its recipients to repay aid previously the subject of a negative Commission decision?

—Was the Council manifestly in error in concluding that exceptional circumstances justified the adoption of the contested measure?

—Is the contested measure adequately and correctly reasoned?

IS THE COUNCIL ENTITLED TO ADOPT A DECISION IN RESPECT OF AID WHICH HAS PREVIOUSLY BEEN THE SUBJECT OF A NEGATIVE COMMISSION DECISION?

18. The Commission develops a number of overlapping arguments to show that once it has decided against a given aid, the Council may not adopt a contrary decision. The following four of its submissions appear to me the most important. First, it has the primary competence to determine the compatibility of aid with the common market, and that the Council's power to do likewise is exceptional and should be narrowly interpreted. Secondly, the procedure specified in respect of that power only makes sense on the assumption that the Commission has yet to reach a decision. Otherwise, there would be no point in the requirement that the Commission suspend its investigation for a three-month period following a member state's application to the Council. Thirdly, if the Council were able to override the Commission, there would be the risk of a conflict between the supervision of the Commission by the Community judicature and that exercised by the Council. Fourthly, a loss of legal certainty would also result.

19. I find the Commission's submissions on the first issue compelling.

20. It seems to me clear that, as the Commission contends, the relationship between the competences conferred upon the Council and the Commission under art 88(2) EC must be regulated on the basis of a principle of pre-emption, so that once either institution has decided upon the compatibility of a given aid, the other is thereby pre-empted from reaching a decision with regard to that aid.

21. In my view, that principle follows clearly from the text of the Treaty. Without it, there would be no purpose to the requirement in the third and fourth subparagraphs of art 88(2) EC that the Commission suspend its investigation for three months whilst the Council considers an application from a member state<sup>8</sup>. The three-month period would serve neither to protect the Council's freedom to decide upon an aid nor to impose a time limit within which the Council must act, given that the Council would retain its power to act, apparently indefinitely, even after the Commission had reached a decision.

22. The principle also accords with the general objective of the relevant Treaty provisions of securing the effective and impartial control of state aid. The Commission is better suited to the task of overseeing the activities of the member states than the Council, which comprises their representatives. It is a therefore given primary responsibility for assessing the compatibility of an aid with the common market<sup>9</sup>. The Council's power is by contrast subject to the procedural limitation discussed in the previous paragraph and is expressly confined to exceptional circumstances. A power in the Council to overturn at any time a negative Commission decision would clearly set at nought the allocation of responsibility thus envisaged by the Treaty.

b 23. Without such a principle, there would, to my mind, be a real possibility for conflict between a Council decision under the third subparagraph of art 88(2) EC and a judgment of the Community judicature in relation to a prior Commission decision. If the Council retained its power to act for an indefinite period after the Commission had decided upon the compatibility of an aid, it might intervene only after proceedings relating to the Commission's prior decision had been commenced, or even concluded, before the Community courts<sup>10</sup>. In the words of Advocate General Mayras, it is surely—

d 'inconceivable that the authors of the Treaty could have allowed for a possible conflict between a decision of the Council based on a determination of circumstances which are exceptional, and which derogate from Article [87], and a judgment of the Court which can only be based on a definitive interpretation of this provision of the Treaty.'<sup>11</sup>

e 24. Further, a principle of pre-emption appears to me to be necessary in order to secure legal certainty. Without it, the Council could reverse a decision of the Commission apparently at any stage and, as the present proceedings illustrate, potentially long after it had been taken<sup>12</sup>. Such a possibility would inject a significant element of uncertainty into the relations between the Commission, the member states and the recipients of state aid. The incentive would be very great for beneficiaries to withhold repayment of illegal aid and to concentrate their efforts instead upon lobbying the state concerned to make application to the Council. Such aid as was recouped by action of the member state or by order of the national courts might later have to be restored to the beneficiaries. Awards of damages in favour of competitors might also have been made in the interim.

g 25. The time limits specified in the Treaty—in the fifth paragraph of art 230 EC for direct actions, for example, and, in the present context, in the fourth subparagraph of art 88(2) EC—aim precisely to minimise the period during which parties are uncertain as to their legal position. The drafters of the Treaty cannot in my view have intended to confer upon the Council a power, unlimited in time, to reverse a negative decision of the Commission in the field of state aid.

h 26. The main response offered by the Council and the Portuguese government is to argue that the contested measure did not purport to authorise the original aid, but related rather to a new and distinct aid. I shall i 9 The Commission's primary role in that regard has been recognised by the court in its case law which denies to the national courts any power to assess the compatibility of an aid with the common market. See Fédération Nationale du Commerce Extérieur des Produits Alimentaires v France Case C-354/90 [1991] ECR I-5505 (para 14 of the judgment).

10 Those proceedings might take the form of a challenge under art 230 EC, or they might arise out of an application by the Commission or another interested state under the second subparagraph of art 88(2) EC.

11 Commission v Germany Case 70/72 (at 835, second column), cited in footnote 8, above.

12 The contested measure was adopted on 21 January 2002, over two years after the first of the Commission decisions.

consider that argument when I turn to the second issue. However, both of those parties also advance arguments contesting the Commission's position in relation to the first issue. a

27. The Council submits that its power under art 88(2) EC is limited only by the requirement of exceptional circumstances. On that view, the three-month period specified in the fourth subparagraph serves to suspend the Commission investigation, but has no consequences for the Council. b

28. The Council also argues that the principle of pre-emption, advocated by the Commission, would run counter to the second paragraph of art 7(1) EC (formerly art 4(1) of the EC Treaty), which provides that each institution is to act within the limits of the powers conferred on it by the Treaty, in that it would render the competence of an institution conditional upon the willingness and speed of another institution to act first. c

29. Finally, the Council notes that ordinarily, in the case of incompatible legal acts which are not subject to any formal hierarchy, it is the subsequent act that overrules the former in time and not the reverse.

30. I am not convinced by the Council's submissions.

31. As I have already explained<sup>13</sup>, I cannot see what purpose the three-month time limit specified in the fourth subparagraph of art 88(2) EC would serve if the Commission's decision, once reached, did not pre-empt the Council from deciding upon the same subject matter. I therefore cannot accept that the only limitation on the Council's power under the third subparagraph is the existence of exceptional circumstances. d

32. Nor do I consider that the principle of pre-emption would in any way infringe the principle of attribution of competences, enshrined in art 7(1) EC. In my view, the Council's competence under the third subparagraph of art 88(2) EC only accrues on the assumption that there has yet to be a Commission decision relating to the same aid. There is no reason why the competence of one institution should not depend upon whether or not there has been some prior act by another. Such is an essential feature of the legislative procedures specified in the Treaty. e

33. Lastly, it is not clear to me that the principle lex posterior derogat priori is of any application in the present context, which concerns two decisions relating to the same circumstances rather than two conflicting pieces of legislation. In any event, for the reasons set out above, I consider that there are good reasons for applying instead a principle of pre-emption<sup>14</sup>. f

34. The Portuguese government advances a further argument. It submits that the inclusion in the third subparagraph of art 88(2) EC of a reference to aid which a state 'is granting' demonstrates that that provision encompasses aid upon which the Commission has already taken a position, given that under art 88(3) EC, the state could not have proceeded to grant that aid until the Commission had reached its final decision upon it. Ex hypothesi, the Commission's decision would be negative, for otherwise there would be no need for the state to apply to the Council. g

35. I am unconvinced by that argument. h

36. As the Commission submits, the reference in the third subparagraph of art 88(2) EC to aid which a state is granting can be explained as relating either to illegal aid (granted without notification or after notification but prior to any positive decision by the Commission) or existing aid (which does not need to i a be notified or authorised prior to its implementation). Such an interpretation does not imply any need for a prior Commission decision on the aid. For the reasons already explained, any other reading would seem to me incompatible with both the letter and the spirit of art 88(2) EC.

MAY THE COUNCIL AUTHORISE AID WHICH HAS AS ITS OBJECT AND EFFECT TO ASSIST ITS RECIPIENTS TO REPAY AID PREVIOUSLY THE SUBJECT OF A NEGATIVE COMMISSION DECISION?

c 37. The Council and the Portuguese government submit that the contested measure deals not with the original aid which formed the subject of the Commission decisions, but with a new aid, involving separate legislation, a distinct transfer of resources, and its own criteria of eligibility and payment. The aid at issue therefore required a fresh assessment under art 87(2) EC, which it received, in the event, from the Council by the adoption of the contested measure.

d 38. Because the contested measure relates to a new aid, it does not in the Council's submission affect the legal status of the Commission decisions, which remain valid and operational. In consequence, the supposed principle of pre-emption is of no application to the contested measure.

e 39. The Council considers irrelevant to its legal analysis the fact that the aid authorised by the contested measure had some of the same beneficiaries as the original aid, that its effect was to counterbalance some of the economic consequences flowing from the repayments ordered by the Commission decisions, or that its object was more or less similar to that of the original aid.

f 40. The Council submits that the possibility of divergent decisions relating to successive aid schemes in favour of the same recipients is explicitly recognised by the third subparagraph of art 11(2) of Regulation 659/1999<sup>15</sup>, according to which 'the Commission may authorise [a] Member State to couple the refunding of [an] aid [which is subject to an injunction providing for its provisional recovery] with the payment of rescue aid to the firm concerned'. It also follows from the court's judgment in Textilwerke Deggendorf GmbH (TWD) v European Commission<sup>16</sup>, upholding the validity of a Commission decision which declared new aid to be compatible with the common market provided that aid previously prohibited by another decision was duly recovered.

g 41. Such a possibility is, in the Council's view, only logical given that a negative decision relating to a particular aid can hardly serve to prohibit any subsequent aid to the same beneficiary in the more or less distant future. The court indeed acknowledged the need to examine each aid individually when it set aside the 'once and once only' principle in the context of restructuring aid on the basis that such a principle 'would not allow the Commission to examine, in each particular case, whether a project for restructuring aid was necessary in order to attain Treaty objectives'<sup>17</sup>.

h 42. I am not convinced by the Council's arguments.

43. It is self-evident that a negative Commission decision does not serve to prevent any subsequent aid to the same beneficiaries from being found compatible with the common market<sup>18</sup>.

44. However, the contested measure purports to authorise an aid which is in my view clearly and simply intended to compensate the beneficiaries of the original aid for having to repay that aid. The aid permitted under art 1 of the measure is stated to be 'equivalent to the amounts which [the] beneficiaries [of the original aid] must reimburse under th[e Commission] decisions'. As recital (13) in the preamble to the contested measure makes clear, the specific difficulties which the contested measure aims to address arise out of the requirement that the beneficiaries of the new aid refund the original aid. The effect of the contested measure is therefore to counteract, in so far as is possible, the economic consequences of the Commission decisions.

45. As the Commission rightly submits, if the Council were able to adopt a decision authorising the grant of an aid which has its object and effect to compensate the recipients for having to repay a previous aid, it could easily circumvent the principle of pre-emption which, for the reasons which I have outlined above, must in my view govern the relationship between the competences conferred by art 88(2) EC.

46. Thus, I consider that the Council may not adopt under the third subparagraph of art 88(2) EC a decision to authorise a new aid the object and effect of which are to relieve the beneficiaries of the costs entailed in reimbursing another aid which must be repaid pursuant to a previous Commission decision.

47. Given my conclusions on the first two issues, I am of the opinion that the contested measure should be annulled on the grounds that the Council lacked competence to act as it did, and therefore also infringed the third subparagraph of art 88(2) EC. It is unnecessary to consider the other cumulative pleas in law relating to misuse of powers or to the infringement of other provisions or principles of Community law, given that they overlap with and would if successful result in the same outcome as the grounds which I have already addressed.

48. The approach which I have here proposed does not appear to me in any way to undermine either the liberty of a member state to make an application or the power of the Council to reach a decision under the third subparagraph of art 88(2) EC. In the course of its investigation of a given aid under art 88(2) EC, the Commission must inform the member state concerned of its doubts. That state will therefore have sufficient notice to bring the matter before the Council, should it wish to do so, before the Commission reaches its final decision<sup>19</sup>. Moreover, if a member state is dissatisfied with the Commission's decision, once taken, the appropriate route for it to follow, in my view, is to bring judicial proceedings under art 230 EC within the specified time limit.

49. Notwithstanding my above conclusions, I propose also to consider the alternative pleas advanced by the Commission: namely, that the Council

<sup>19</sup> In the present proceedings, as regards the Commission decisions, cited in footnote 3, above, see the Commission's decisions initiating the procedure laid down in art 88(2) EC (OJ 1998 C83 p 5; and OJ 1999 C220 p 19). For the current position, see arts 4(4) and 6(1) of Regulation 659/1999, cited in footnote 5, above.

a committed a manifest error of appreciation in concluding that there existed exceptional circumstances sufficient to justify recourse to the procedure specified in the third subparagraph of art 88(2) EC; and that it failed to offer adequate reasoning in support of the contested measure.

b WAS THE COUNCIL MANIFESTLY IN ERROR IN CONCLUDING THAT EXCEPTIONAL CIRCUMSTANCES JUSTIFIED THE ADOPTION OF THE CONTESTED MEASURE?

50. The Commission submits in the alternative that the Council committed a manifest error of appreciation in concluding that the hardship to the beneficiaries of the original aid arising out of the obligation to repay that aid

c constituted in itself an exceptional circumstance within the meaning of the third subparagraph of art 88(2) EC.

51. In reaching the conclusion, in recital (14) of the preamble to the contested measure, that exceptional circumstances existed, the Council had regard, in recital (13), to the fact that a refund of the original aid would threaten the economic viability of not a few beneficiaries and would have extremely damaging social effects in certain regions because 50% of Portugal's pig herd is concentrated in less than 5% of its territory.

d 52. I have no doubt that the Council enjoys a substantial margin of discretion in determining whether and when the exceptional circumstances exist which would justify it in authorising a given aid<sup>20</sup>. The Council is called upon in that context to carry out an assessment of a complex economic situation. The complexity of its task may be all the more pronounced in the agricultural field. That said, there must in my view be certain limits to the Council's discretion.

e 53. The Commission is correct in contending that the reimbursement of an aid illegally paid prior to a negative Commission decision is an entirely normal and logical consequence of a finding that it is incompatible with the common market. The court has repeatedly held that the Commission may order the repayment of an aid when reaching a negative decision<sup>21</sup>. Under art 14 of Regulation 659/1999<sup>22</sup>, the Commission is now required to order recovery of an aid following a negative decision, unless to do so would be contrary to a general principle of Community law. The recovery of aid serves to restore the previously existing situation, thereby removing the distortion to competition resulting from the aid in question. It is therefore a necessary and fundamental feature of the Community system for the control of state aid.

f 54. Nor, in my view, can the difficulties encountered by undertakings in reimbursing aid be qualified as in any way exceptional. As the court has held, when ordered by the Commission, recovery must be pursued by the state in question even if it leads to the failure of the undertaking to which the aid was granted<sup>23</sup>. The only defence available to the member state is that it is absolutely impossible for it to recover the aid.

g 55. Accordingly, the Council appears to me, in adopting the contested measure, to have committed a manifest error of appreciation when it concluded that exceptional circumstances existed by reason of the economic difficulties encountered by the beneficiaries of the original aid in having to repay that aid. a

56. Whilst the Council may, of course, justify its intervention on the basis of economic and social circumstances, those circumstances must, in my view, be independent of the reimbursement required by a previous Commission decision. b

57. I therefore consider that the Commission succeeds also in its first alternative plea and that the contested measure must in any event be set aside on the basis that the Council committed a manifest error of appreciation in concluding that there were the exceptional circumstances necessary for its adoption. c

IS THE CONTESTED MEASURE ADEQUATELY AND CORRECTLY REASONED?

58. Finally, and also in the alternative, the Commission asserts that, even assuming that exceptional circumstances may exist in the present case, the Council has not sufficiently demonstrated their existence in the contested measure. Most of the preamble to that measure is devoted to setting out the history of the Commission decisions and the situation of the Portuguese pig-farming sector in 1998. In the Commission's submission, such reasons as are offered for the contested measure all relate to the original aid, without explaining why the current situation is to be regarded as exceptional or why it justifies the grant of a new aid. d

59. It appears to me that a distinction must be drawn between the substantive and the formal inadequacies which might be attributed to the reasoning of the contested measure. e

60. As regards the former, I have already concluded that the Council was incorrect to identify as an exceptional circumstance the difficulty experienced by recipients of the original aid as a result of their obligation to repay that aid. f

61. As regards the latter, the contested measure clearly and unequivocally states the Council's justification for authorising the aid, namely the need to compensate Portuguese pork producers in difficulty as a consequence of their obligation to reimburse the original aid. Although such reasoning is in my view not valid, it is quite adequate to inform those affected by the contested measure of the Council's motivation in adopting it, and to permit the court to exercise its supervisory jurisdiction. g

CONCLUSION

62. In the light of the foregoing observations, I am therefore of the opinion that the Court of Justice should: h

(1) annul Council Decision (EC) 2002/114 (authorising the government of Portugal to grant aid to Portuguese pig farmers who were beneficiaries of the measures granted in 1994 and 1998);

(2) order the Council to pay the costs;

(3) order Portugal and France, as interveners, to bear their own costs. i

29 June 2004. The COURT OF JUSTICE delivered the following judgment.

1. By an application lodged at the Registry of the Court of Justice on 25 March 2002, the Commission of the European Communities sought the annulment, pursuant to art 230 EC (formerly art 173 of the EC Treaty), of Council Decision (EC) 2002/114 (authorising the government of Portugal to a grant aid to Portuguese pig farmers who were beneficiaries of the measures granted in 1994 and 1998) (OJ 2002 L43 p 18).

2. By orders of the President of the Court of Justice of 16 and 19 September 2002, the Portuguese Republic and the French Republic were each granted leave to intervene in support of the Council of the European Union, the latter, however, being authorised to submit observations only in the event of oral proceedings taking place.

LEGAL BACKGROUND

3. Article 88(2) and (3) EC (formerly art 93 of the EC Treaty) provide:

c '(2) If, after giving notice to the parties concerned to submit their comments, the Commission finds that aid granted by a State or through State resources is not compatible with the common market having regard to Article 87, or that such aid is being misused, it shall decide that the State concerned shall abolish or alter such aid within a period of time to be determined by the Commission.

d If the State concerned does not comply with this decision within the prescribed time, the Commission or any other interested State may, in derogation from the provisions of Articles 226 and 227, refer the matter to the Court of Justice direct.

e On application by a Member State, the Council may, acting unanimously, decide that aid which that State is granting or intends to grant shall be considered to be compatible with the common market, in derogation from the provisions of Article 87 or from the regulations provided for in Article 89, if such a decision is justified by exceptional circumstances. If, as regards the aid in question, the Commission has already initiated the procedure provided for in the first subparagraph of this paragraph, the fact that the State concerned has made its application to the Council shall have the effect of suspending that procedure until the Council has made its attitude known.

f If, however, the Council has not made its attitude known within three months of the said application being made, the Commission shall give its decision on the case.

g (3) The Commission shall be informed, in sufficient time to enable it to submit its comments, of any plans to grant or alter aid. If it considers that any such plan is not compatible with the common market having regard to Article 87, it shall without delay initiate the procedure provided for in paragraph 2. The Member State concerned shall not put its proposed measures into effect until this procedure has resulted in a final decision.'

h THE CONTESTED DECISION AND ITS CONTEXT

i 4. By Decree-Law No 146/94 of 24 May 1994 (Diário da República I, series A, No 120, of 24 May 1994; the Decree-Law of 1994), the Portuguese Republic established an aid scheme setting up lines of credit for reducing the debt burden on intensive stock farms and assisting the recovery of pig farming. That aid system was not notified to the Commission.

5. Acting under the first paragraph of art 88(2) EC, the Commission adopted Commission Decision (EC) 2000/200 (concerning an aid scheme implemented by Portugal with a view to reducing the debt burden of intensive stock farms and assisting recovery in the pig-farming sector) (OJ 2000 L66 p 20). Under art 1(1) of that decision, it declared the credit line for reducing the debt burden on intensive stock farms incompatible with the common market in cases where, together with the investment aid received, the grant equivalent exceeded 35% in farming areas other than less-favoured farming areas. Article 1(2) declared the credit line for assisting recovery in the pig-farming sector incompatible with the common market. Repayment of the aid already unlawfully paid to the beneficiaries, with interest, was ordered under art 3 of that decision. a

6. By Decree-Law No 4/99 of 4 January 1999 (Diário da República I, Series A, No 2, of 4 January 1999; the Decree-Law of 1999), the Portuguese Republic further introduced a moratorium extending by one year the period for repayment of certain loans contracted by pig farms which produced, fattened and slaughtered pigs in a closed cycle, and also introduced short-term financing for such farms by means of loans at favourable rates. Although those measures were notified to the Commission, they were put into effect before the Commission stated its position in respect of them. b

7. Those aid measures were declared incompatible with the common market, and their repayment was ordered by Commission Decision (EC) 2001/86 (on the aid scheme implemented by Portugal in favour of the pig-farming sector) (OJ 2001 L29 p 49). c

8. On 23 November 2001, the Portuguese Republic requested the Council of the European Union to adopt, on the basis of the third subparagraph of art 88(2) EC, a 'decision authorising it to grant aid to Portuguese pig farmers obliged to repay the aid granted in 1994 and 1998 and [declaring] that aid compatible with the common market'. d

9. Acceding to that request, the Council adopted the contested decision, art 1 of which is worded as follows: e

'Exceptional aid by the Portuguese Government to the Portuguese pig sector involving the grant of aid to beneficiaries covered by the Commission Decisions of 25 November 1999 and 4 October 2000, totalling not more than EUR 16,3 million, equivalent to the amounts which those beneficiaries must reimburse under those Decisions, shall be considered compatible with the common market.' f

10. After setting out the particular circumstances and features of the Portuguese pig-farming industry which had led the Portuguese Republic to adopt the Decree-Laws of 1994 and 1999, the grounds for the contested decision state, in para (9), that— g

'as the pattern of trade shows, [the aid instituted under those Decree-Laws] did not have any particular effect on intra-Community trade and consequently did not cause any distortion of competition.' h

11. According to paras (12)–(14) of the grounds for the contested decision:

'(12) In its decisions of 25 November 1999 and 4 October 2000, the Commission held that the measures in question were not compatible with the common market. Pursuant to those decisions, the Portuguese authorities initiated a procedure to recover the aid granted. i

(13) However, refunding the aid granted threatens the economic viability of not a few beneficiaries and would have extremely damaging social effects in certain regions because 50% of the pig herd is concentrated in less than 5% of the territory.

- a* (14) Exceptional circumstances therefore exist, making it possible to consider such aid, by way of derogation and to the extent strictly necessary to remedy the imbalance which has arisen, to be compatible with the common market on the terms specified in this Decision.'

b THE ACTION

12. The Commission makes five pleas in law in support in its action, claiming that the Council did not have the power to adopt the contested decision, misuse of powers and procedure, infringement of the EC Treaty and various general principles, manifest error of assessment, and failure to state sufficient reasons for the contested decision.

The first plea

Arguments of the parties

13. The Commission argues in its first plea that the Council did not have the power to adopt the contested decision, and its reasoning in that respect is in two stages.

14. First, the Commission argues that the contested decision has effects identical to a revocation or annulment of Decisions 2000/200 and 2001/86, whereby the Commission declared the aid paid under the Decree-Laws of 1994 and 1999 incompatible with the common market and ordered it to be repaid.

15. By authorising the payment to the Portuguese pig farmers concerned of aid equivalent in amount to that which they had to repay in accordance with those Commission decisions, the contested decision nullified the effects of the latter. It prevented the effective withdrawal of aid which the Commission had declared incompatible with the common market and the return to the status quo required by the first subparagraph of art 88(2) EC in order to preserve the market from distortions of competition.

16. According to the Commission, the contested decision effectively amounted to an authorisation of the initial aid, which the Commission had previously declared incompatible.

17. Secondly, the Commission argues that it is clear from the wording of art 88 EC that the Treaty intended to confer upon it, as a monopoly, the tasks of controlling and managing state aids. That, it maintains, is explained by the fact that only a body totally independent of member states is capable of examining aid measures adopted by the latter with the required objectivity and impartiality, and of ensuring that competition is not distorted to an extent contrary to the common interest.

18. As for the power conferred on the Council under art 88(2) EC, the Commission argues that that is exceptional in character. That is clear from the wording both of the third subparagraph of that provision, which refers to 'exceptional circumstances', and of the fourth subparagraph, which lays down a period during which the member state's application is to suspend the procedure before the Commission, at the expiry of which period the Commission recovers its power to 'give a decision', that is to say decide definitively on the aids concerned. The granting to the Council of such a power of decision, taking precedence over that of the Commission for a limited period, would, moreover, be devoid of meaning if the Council's decision could prevail over that of the Commission in all circumstances.

19. It follows, in the Commission's view, that the Council does not have the power to adopt a decision on the basis of the third subparagraph of art 88(2)

EC where an aid has been declared incompatible with the common market by a Commission decision. Nor, to that extent, did the Council have the power to override the effects of such a decision, by authorising the grant of aids designed to compensate the beneficiaries of the aid declared incompatible for the repayment which that decision obliged them to make. a

20. The Council argues, first, that the Commission's reasoning is based entirely on the premiss that the contested decision annulled or revoked Decisions 2000/200 and 2001/86. In reality, the Council argues, the contested decision did not call into question the repayment obligations under those decisions, since it was, on the contrary, in the context of the full implementation of those obligations, and taking account of the social and economic consequences which such implementation would have, that the Council decided to authorise the new aid which the Portuguese government was proposing to grant. b

21. What counts as new aid, the Council argues, depends on formal and objective considerations. In this case the aid authorised by the contested decision consisted of an entirely new payment, arising from a national provision other than the Decree-Laws of 1994 and 1999, corresponding to different eligibility and payment conditions from those which applied to the aids granted under those Decree-Laws. d

22. According to the Council, the fact that the aid authorised by the contested decision constitutes new aid is also demonstrated by the definition of 'new aid' in art 1 of Council Regulation (EC) 659/1999 (laying down detailed rules for the application of art 93 of the EC Treaty) (OJ 1999 L83 p 1) as 'aid schemes and individual aid, which is not existing aid, including alterations to existing aid'. The term 'existing' implies that the aid in question has already been authorised, which is precisely not the case with the aid to which the contested decision relates. e

23. Moreover, the third subparagraph of art 11(2) of Regulation 659/1999, which allows the possibility of authorising the member state to accompany repayment of the illegal aid with an aid to rescue the undertaking concerned, also confirms that it is possible to adopt divergent decisions concerning state aids granted successively to the same operators. The same applies to Community case law, which, the Council argues, has implicitly acknowledged that the Commission may make the payment of new aid declared compatible with the common market subject to the recovery of earlier aid declared incompatible (see Textilwerke Deggendorf GmbH (TWD) v European Commission Joined cases T-244/93 and T-486/93 [1995] ECR II-2265; affirmed Case C-355/95 P [1997] ECR I-2549). f

24. Finally, the Council argues that neither decisions of the Commission declaring an aid incompatible with the common market nor any other text constitute a prohibition against the beneficiaries of such aid receiving other aid sooner or later. The principle that each successive aid is to be examined individually should be complied with in all circumstances (see Wirtschaftsvereinigung Stahl v European Commission Case C-441/97 P [2000] ECR I-10293 (para 55)). If the contested decision had not been taken, the aid which it authorised, which had, moreover, been notified to the Commission by the Portuguese Republic, would have had to have been examined by the Commission and to have given rise to a decision by the latter. h

25. Concerning, secondly, the scope of art 88(2) EC, the Council argues that the three-month period referred to in the fourth subparagraph of that provision is laid down for purely suspensive purposes. It follows, in the a Council's submission, that it remained at liberty to authorise the aid concerned notwithstanding the expiry of that period.

26. As for the conflict capable of arising in that respect between a previous decision of the Commission, finding aid incompatible with the common market, and a subsequent decision of the Council, authorising that aid, the Council argues that the principle to be applied when dealing with incompatible rules, in the absence of a hierarchy between them, is that the later rule derogates from the previous one.

27. The Portuguese Republic essentially shares the analysis of the Council. The aid authorised by the contested decision was a new aid, distinct from those established by the Decree-Laws of 1994 and 1999, having been notified as new aid to the Commission. Portugal adds that the fact that the third subparagraph of art 88(2) EC empowers the Council to rule not only on aid which a member state 'intends to grant' but also on aid which it 'is granting' confirms that the Council is empowered to authorise aid even where the Commission has already expressed its view on it. Article 88(3) shows that any granting of aid requires prior examination by the Commission, with the result that the aid cannot be granted unless there has been a favourable decision by the Commission in that regard.

Findings of the court

28. In order to rule on the Commission's first plea in support of its action, it first needs to be determined whether, as the Commission has argued, art 88(2) EC must be interpreted in such a way that, where the Commission has adopted a decision finding aid incompatible with the common market, the Council no longer has the power to decide, on the basis of the third subparagraph of that provision, that that aid must be regarded as compatible with the common market.

29. In that respect, it should be noted that the intention of the Treaty, in providing through art 88 EC for aid to be kept under constant review and supervised by the Commission, is that the finding that aid may be incompatible with the common market is to be arrived at, subject to review by the Community judicature, by means of an appropriate procedure which it is the Commission's responsibility to set in motion. Articles 87 EC (formerly art 92 of the EC Treaty) and 88 EC thus reserve a central role for the Commission in determining whether aid is incompatible (see Fédération Nationale du Commerce Extérieur des Produits Alimentaires v France Case C-354/90 [1991] ECR I-5505 (paras 9, 14)).

30. As is clear from its very wording, the third subparagraph of art 88(2) EC covers an exceptional case (see EC Commission v Belgium Case 156/77 [1978] ECR 1881 (para 16)). According to that provision, the Council acting unanimously, 'on application by a Member State', may decide that aid which that state is granting or intends to grant must be regarded as compatible with the common market 'in derogation from the provisions of Article 87 or from the regulations provided for in Article 89', if such a decision is justified by 'exceptional circumstances'.

31. It follows that, as the Commission has rightly pointed out, the power conferred upon the Council by the third subparagraph of art 88(2) EC is clearly exceptional in character.

32. In such a context, the further provisions in the third and fourth subparagraphs of art 88(2), whereby, on the one hand, application to the Council by a member state suspends examination in progress at the Commission for a period of three months, and, on the other, in the absence of a decision by the Council within that period, the Commission is to give a ruling, undeniably indicate that, where that period has expired, the Council is no longer competent to adopt a decision under that third subparagraph in relation to the aid concerned. The taking of decisions the operative parts of which might contradict is thereby avoided. a

33. The enactment of a temporal limitation of that kind on the Council's competence where the Commission has already opened the procedure under the first subparagraph of art 88(2) EC, without, however, yet having adopted a decision declaring the aid incompatible with the common market, and the fact that, at the end of the three-month period laid down by the fourth subparagraph of that provision, the Commission alone retains the competence to rule on the aid concerned, also demonstrate that, if the member state concerned has made no application to the Council under the third subparagraph of art 88(2) EC before the Commission declares the aid in question incompatible with the common market and thereby closes the procedure referred to in the first subparagraph of art 88(2), the Council is no longer authorised to exercise the exceptional power conferred upon it by the third subparagraph in order to declare such aid compatible with the common market. b

34. It may be observed on that latter point that, in European Commission v EU Council Case C-122/94 [1996] ECR I-881, the contested decision of the Council did not follow a Commission decision declaring aid incompatible with the common market, the Commission in that case having merely taken the view on the basis of art 88(3) EC that the aid project in question was not compatible with the common market and opened the procedure laid down by the first subparagraph of art 88(2). c

35. As the Commission has rightly pointed out, the interpretation adopted in paras 32 and 33 of this judgment, which makes it possible to avoid the same state aid being the subject of contrary decisions taken successively by the Commission and the Council, contributes to legal certainty. It should be noted in particular that the definitive nature of an administrative decision which is acquired on the expiry of reasonable time limits for bringing an action or by the exhaustion of remedies contributes to such certainty (see Kühne & Heitz NV v Produktschap voor Pluimvee en Eieren Case C-453/00 (2003) Transcript (opinion), 17 June, (2004) Transcript (judgment) (para 24)). d

36. As for the argument of the Portuguese government that the third subparagraph of art 88(2) EC also authorises the Council to rule on aid which a member state is 'granting', whereas in accordance with art 88(3) any 'grant' of aid requires precisely that the Commission should have expressed a view on it first, so that the Council has the power to rule on aid which has already been the subject of a previous decision by the Commission, the court finds that this argument arises from a contradiction in terms. It cannot concomitantly be argued that an aid which a member state is 'granting' within the meaning of the third subparagraph of art 88(2) EC is an aid which must necessarily have been previously declared compatible with the common market by the Commission, pursuant to the provisions of art 87 EC, and that the Council has the power subsequently to declare such an aid compatible with the common market in derogation from those provisions. e

37. Secondly, the court has to determine whether the fact that the Council does not have the power to rule on the compatibility with the common market f

a of an aid in relation to which the Commission has already definitively ruled implies, as the latter argues, that the Council also lacks the power to rule on an aid measure whose aim is to allocate to beneficiaries of the illegal aid previously declared incompatible by a Commission decision an amount designed to compensate for the repayments which they are obliged to make pursuant to that decision.

b 38. It should be noted first in that respect, contrary to what the Council maintains, that it cannot be inferred from the case law of the Court of Justice that, in relation to such aid, the Community institutions retain full liberty to make such a ruling without being required to pay due regard to the previous decision of the Commission finding the aid originally granted to the persons concerned incompatible with the common market.

c 39. The court has, on the contrary, held that when the Commission considers the compatibility of a measure of state aid with the common market, it must take all the relevant factors into account, including, where relevant, the circumstances already considered in a prior decision and the obligations which that previous decision may have imposed on a member state (see, in particular, d Italy v EC Commission Case C-261/89 [1991] ECR I-4437 (para 20), the TWD case (para 26)). The court deduced in particular that, where the Commission has not been informed of any new fact allowing it to assess whether the aid in question might have the benefit of a derogation under the Treaty, it is justified in basing its decision on the assessments it has already made in its previous decision and the failure to comply with the condition it has imposed thereby e (see Italy v Commission Case C-261/89 (para 23)).

40. Similarly, the court has held that a transitional system maintaining the effects of a state aid scheme not notified to the Commission and declared incompatible with Community law by a Commission decision—without, however, the Commission demanding repayment of the aid concerned—had to be interpreted as far as possible in such a way as to ensure its compatibility f with that decision, namely in such a way that it does not authorise the granting of new state aid after the abrogation of the aid scheme censured by that Commission decision (order of 24 July 2003 in Sicilcassa SpA v IRA Costruzioni SpA Case C-297/01 [2003] ECR I-7849 (para 44)).

41. It has, moreover, consistently been held that the abolition, by means of recovery, of state aid which has been unlawfully granted is the logical consequence its being found unlawful (see Belgium v EC Commission Case C-142/87 [1990] ECR I-959 (para 66), Italy v European Commission Case C-310/99 [2002] ECR I-2289 (para 98)).

42. The aim of obliging the state concerned to abolish aid found by the Commission to be incompatible with the common market is to restore the previous situation, and that objective is attained once the aid in question, h increased where appropriate by default interest, has been repaid by the recipient. By repaying the aid, the recipient forfeits the advantage which it had enjoyed over its competitors on the market, and the situation prior to payment of the aid is restored (see, in particular, European Commission v Italy Case C-350/93 [1995] ECR I-699 (paras 21, 22) and Italy v Commission Case C-310/99 i (paras 98, 99)).

43. In those circumstances, to hold that a member state is able to grant to beneficiaries of unlawful aid, which has previously been declared incompatible with the common market by a Commission decision, new aid in an amount equivalent to that of the unlawful aid, intended to neutralise the impact of the repayments which the beneficiaries are obliged to make pursuant to that decision, would clearly amount to thwarting the effectiveness of decisions taken by the Commission under arts 87 and 88 EC (see, by analogy, EC Commission v Germany Case C-5/89 [1990] ECR I-3437 (para 17), Italy v Commission Case C-310/99 (para 104)).

44. Finally, it should be noted that, as is clear from paras 33 and 35 of this judgment, where a decision finding an aid incompatible with the common market has been adopted by the Commission, the Council cannot paralyse the effectiveness of that decision by itself declaring the aid compatible with the common market on the basis of the third subparagraph of art 88(2) EC.

45. Nor, therefore, can the Council thwart the effectiveness of such a decision by declaring compatible with the common market, in accordance with that provision, an aid designed to compensate the beneficiaries of the unlawful aid declared incompatible with the common market for the repayments they are required to make pursuant to that decision.

46. In such circumstances, moreover, the aid granted in the second instance is so indissolubly linked to that previously found by the Commission to be incompatible with the common market that it appears largely artificial to claim to make a distinction between those aids for the purposes of applying art 88(2) EC.

47. It follows from the whole of the above considerations that, on a proper interpretation of the third subparagraph of art 88(2) EC, the Council cannot, on the basis of that provision, validly declare compatible with the common market an aid which allocates to the beneficiaries of an unlawful aid, which a Commission decision has previously declared incompatible with the common market, an amount designed to compensate for the repayments which they are required to make pursuant to that decision.

48. In this case, it is undisputed that the Portuguese Republic has not applied to the Council under the third subparagraph of art 88(2) EC for a declaration that the aids granted by the Decree-Laws of 1994 and 1999 are compatible with the common market. It is also undisputed that those aids have been declared incompatible with the common market and that their recovery has been ordered by Decisions 2000/200 and 2001/86.

49. As for the contested decision, it is obvious from the very wording of its title, and from the wording of art 1 thereof, that the aid which it sought to declare compatible with the common market was specifically designed to grant to the beneficiaries of the aids previously declared incompatible with that market, by Decisions 2000/200 and 2001/86, an amount intended to allow them to meet the repayments which they are required to make pursuant to those two decisions.

50. As is clear from para 47 of this judgment, the Council could not validly adopt such a decision.

51. It follows that the Commission's first plea in support of its action, arguing that the Council lacked the competence to adopt the contested decision, is well founded, and that the latter must therefore be annulled.

The second, third, fourth and fifth pleas

52. Since the Commission's first plea has been accepted, and the contested decision must be annulled on that account, it is not necessary to examine the Commission's other pleas in support of its action.

a COSTS

53. Under art 69(2) of the Rules of Procedure, the unsuccessful party is to be ordered to pay the costs if they have been applied for in the successful party's pleadings. Since the Commission has applied for costs and the Council has been unsuccessful, the Council must be ordered to pay the costs. Pursuant to the first paragraph of art 69(4), the Portuguese Republic and the French Republic

b must bear their own costs.

On those grounds, the Court of Justice, hereby:

(1) Annuls Council Decision (EC) 2002/114 (authorising the government of Portugal to grant aid to Portuguese pig farmers) who were beneficiaries of the measures granted in 1994 and 1998;

c (2) Orders the Council of the European Union to pay the costs;
(3) Orders the Portuguese Republic and the French Republic to bear their own costs.

Van den Bergh Foods Ltd v European Commission

(Case T-65/98)

COURT OF FIRST INSTANCE OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES (FIFTH CHAMBER)

JUDGES GARCÍA-VALDECASAS (PRESIDENT), LINDH AND COOKE

3 OCTOBER 2002, 23 OCTOBER 2003

European Community – Rules on competition – Abuse of dominant position – Undertaking marketing ice cream products in Ireland – Undertaking supplying freezer cabinets to retailers at no or nominal charge for use exclusively for sale of undertaking's products – Whether agreements preventing, restricting or distorting competition – Whether undertaking entitled to exemption from competition rules – Whether undertaking abusing dominant position – Whether application of competition rules infringing undertaking's right to property – EC Treaty, arts 85(1), (3), 86, 222 (now arts 81(1), (3), 82, 295 EC).

The applicant was a wholly-owned subsidiary of a multinational group and was the principle manufacturer of single-wrapped ice creams for immediate consumption in Ireland. It had concluded distribution agreements with ice cream retailers, under which freezer cabinets that were to be maintained by the applicant at no cost were supplied free of charge or at nominal rent, subject to an exclusivity clause that the freezer cabinets were to be used only for the sale of the applicant's products. Those agreements were terminable at any time on two months' notice by either side. Certain complaints were lodged by the applicant's competitors with the Commission of the European Communities, which adopted Commission Decision (EC) 98/531 (relating to a proceeding under arts 85 and 86 of the EC Treaty (now arts 81 and 82 EC) (Case Nos IV/34.073, IV/34.395 and IV/35.436—Van den Bergh Foods Ltd)). That decision: (i) declared the exclusivity clause, in so far as it applied to retailers not having a freezer cabinet either procured by themselves or provided by an ice cream manufacturer other than the applicant, contrary to art 85(1) of the EC Treaty; (ii) rejected a request by the applicant for an exemption for the exclusivity clause pursuant to art 85(3) of the Treaty; and (iii) declared the applicant's inducements to enter into freezer cabinet agreements subject to the exclusivity clause contrary to art 86 of the Treaty. In particular, the Commission stated that the applicant's position on the market was dominant and that the exclusivity clause restricted the ability of retailers to stock and offer for sale products from competing suppliers, since it was not economically viable for retailers to allocate space to the installation of an additional cabinet, having regard to the space constraints inevitably experienced by retail outlets. Further, only a small proportion of retail outlets in Ireland had freezer cabinets which were not subject to an exclusivity clause and other suppliers did not have access to retailers who had concluded such agreements with the result that the outlet was foreclosed rendering very difficult entry by competing suppliers. In due course, the applicant brought an action under art 173 of the Treaty (now art 230 EC) before the Court of First Instance of the European Communities for annulment of the decision, contending: (i) that the Commission had committed a number of manifest errors of assessment in analysing the

- a* existence and extent of foreclosure of the relevant market resulting from the distribution agreements in question, by having materially overestimated the degree of market foreclosure; (ii) that the exclusivity clause fell within the scope of art 85(3) of the Treaty and might thus be the subject of an exemption; (iii) that the Commission had erred in finding that there had been an abuse of the dominant position, and in finding that the applicant had induced retailers to grant it exclusivity by supplying freezer cabinets to them and by maintaining them at no direct charge to the retailer; and (iv) that the application of the competition rules constituted an unjustified and disproportionate infringement of its rights to property, as recognised by art 222 of the Treaty (now art 295 EC).
- c* Held – (1) It was clear from an examination of the entirety of the similar distribution agreements concluded on the relevant market, and other evidence of the economic and legal context of which those agreements formed part, that the distribution agreements concluded by the applicant were liable to have an appreciable effect on competition for the purposes of art 85(1) of the Treaty.
- d* Contractual restrictions on retailers had to be examined not just in a purely formal manner from the legal point of view, but also taking into account the specific economic context in which the agreements in question operated, including the particular features of the relevant market, which might, in practice, reinforce those restrictions and thus distort competition. In the instant case, rather than having penalised the applicant for its legitimate business
- e* success, the Commission had merely identified the features that formed part of the economic context of the case, namely, the effective dependence of retailers, the dominant position of the applicant on the market, the popularity of its product range, the constraints associated with the lack of space characterising typical sales outlets, and the disadvantages and risks associated with stocking a second range of ice cream. Further, there was objective and
- f* specific evidence demonstrating the existence of demand in Ireland for the ice creams of other manufacturers where they were available. Therefore, despite the fact that it was theoretically possible for retailers who had only a freezer cabinet provided by the applicant to sell the ice creams of other manufacturers, the effect of the exclusivity clause in practice was to restrict the commercial
- g* freedom of retailers to choose the products they wished to sell in their sales outlets. Accordingly, the effect of compliance with the exclusivity clause was to cause retailers to act differently in relation to the applicant's products than they did in relation to ice creams of other brands and in a way that was likely to distort competition in the relevant market. The fact the distribution agreements were terminable at any time in no way precluded the effective
- h* enforcement of the agreements during the period in which that option was not used, since that option was not exercised in practice. Moreover, the provision by the applicant of the maintenance costs of the freezers represented a financial barrier to the entry of new suppliers on the market and to the expansion of existing suppliers, since retailers were not inclined to accept freezer cabinets from suppliers who did not offer terms that were at least as
- i* advantageous as those offered by the suppliers of the cabinets already in place (see judgment paras 84, 89–92, 97, 98, 105, 113, 118, below).

(2) The exclusivity clause failed to satisfy the first of the conditions laid down by art 85(3) of the Treaty. Where an undertaking sought an exemption under art 85(3) of the Treaty, it was to produce evidence to establish that the agreement fulfilled the conditions laid down by that provision. If any one of the four preconditions laid down by the provision was not satisfied, the exemption had to be refused. In the instant case, although the wide availability in outlets of freezer cabinets intended for the sale of ice creams covering the entire geographic market and consisting mainly of the applicant's products might be considered an objective advantage in the distribution of those products in the public interest, it was nevertheless unlikely that the applicant would definitively cease to supply freezer cabinets to retailers if its power to impose an obligation of exclusivity in respect of those freezers were to be restricted (see judgment paras 136, 137, 143, below). a

(3) The Commission had properly concluded that the applicant had abused a dominant position on the relevant market by having induced retailers to obtain its supplies exclusively. The applicant was an unavoidable trading partner for many retailers on the relevant market and thus occupied a dominant position. Where an undertaking was found to occupy such a position, it had a special responsibility not to allow its conduct to impair genuine undistorted competition on the common market. In the instant case, the provision of freezer cabinets subject to a condition of exclusivity was a standard practice on the relevant market that was not prohibited in a competitive market as a matter of principle. However, the nature of the exclusivity clause was such that it prevented retailers from selling other brands of ice cream (or of reducing the opportunity for them to do so), even though there was a demand for such brands, and of preventing competing manufacturers from gaining access to the relevant market (see judgment paras 158–160, 162, below). c

(4) The decision did not contain any undue limitation on the exercise of the applicant's right to property in its freezer cabinets. Although the right to property formed part of the general principles of Community law, the exercise of that right was not absolute and it had to be viewed in relation to its social function, such that it might be restricted. Any such restriction had to correspond in fact to the objectives of general interest pursued by the Community which were not to constitute a disproportionate and intolerable interference, and the application of arts 85 and 86 of the Treaty constituted one of those aspects of public interest in the Community. In the instant case, the decision in no way affected the applicant's ownership of its assets, but it merely regulated, in the public interest, one particular manner of exploiting them. Further, it provided merely that if the applicant decided to exploit its property by making it available without charge to retailers, it was not to do so on the basis of an exclusivity clause so long as it held a dominant position on the relevant market. It followed that the application would be dismissed (see judgment paras 170, 171, 210, below). e

Application

By application lodged on 21 April 1998 at the Registry of the Court of First Instance, Van den Bergh Foods Ltd, formerly HB Ice Cream Ltd (HB), established in Dublin, Ireland, brought an action under the fourth paragraph of art 173 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, the fourth paragraph of art 230 EC) for the annulment of Commission Decision (EC) 98/531 relating to a proceeding under arts 85 and 86 of the EC Treaty (now arts 81 and 82 EC) (Case Nos IV/34.073, IV/34.395 and IV/35.436—Van den Bergh Foods Ltd) (the contested decision). By order of the President of the Fifth Chamber of the Court of First Instance of 2 March 1999, Mars and Treats Frozen Confectionery Ltd, now Richmond Frozen Confectionery Ltd, were given leave to intervene in the present case in support of the form of order sought by the Commission of the European Communities. By an order of 16 June 1998, received at the Court of Justice of the European Communities, the Supreme Court of Ireland referred for a preliminary ruling under art 177 of the EC Treaty (now art 234 EC) three questions on the interpretation of arts 85, 86 and 222 of the EC Treaty (now art 295 EC). That case was registered as Case C-344/98. By an order of 28 April 1999, the President of the Fifth Chamber of the court stayed the proceedings in the present case pursuant to art 47(3) of the Statute of the Court of Justice pending delivery of judgment in Case C-344/98. On 14 December 2000 the Court of Justice gave judgment g

23 October 2003. THE COURT OF FIRST INSTANCE (Fifth Chamber) delivered the following judgment.

1. This action is for the annulment of Commission Decision (EC) 98/531 (relating to a proceeding under arts 85 and 86 of the EC Treaty (Case Nos IV/34.073, IV/34.395 and IV/35.436—Van den Bergh Foods Ltd)) (OJ 1998 L246 p 1) (hereinafter the contested decision).
- e* 2. Van den Bergh Foods Ltd (hereinafter HB), a wholly-owned subsidiary of Unilever plc, is the principal manufacturer of ice cream products in Ireland, particularly single-wrapped ice creams for immediate consumption (hereinafter impulse ice creams). For a number of years HB has supplied ice cream retailers with freezer cabinets, in which it retains ownership, and which are supplied free of charge or at a nominal rent, provided that they are used exclusively for HB ice creams (hereinafter the exclusivity clause). Pursuant to the standard terms of the freezer agreements, they can be terminated at any time on two months' notice on either side. HB maintains the cabinets at no cost to the retailer, save in cases of negligence.
- f* 3. Masterfoods Ltd (hereinafter Mars), a subsidiary of the United States corporation Mars Inc, entered the Irish ice cream market in 1989.
- g* 4. In the summer of 1989 many retailers with freezer cabinets supplied by HB began to stock and display Mars products. This led to a demand by HB that they comply with the exclusivity clause.
- h* 5. In March 1990, Mars brought an action in the Irish High Court seeking, inter alia, a declaration that the exclusivity clause was void under domestic law and under arts 85 and 86 of the EC Treaty (now arts 81 and 82 EC). In a separate cross-action HB claimed injunctions restraining Mars from inducing or procuring breaches of the exclusivity clause.
6. In April 1990, the High Court granted an interlocutory injunction in favour of HB.
- i* 7. On 28 May 1992, the High Court gave judgment in the actions brought by Mars and HB (see [1992] 3 CMLR 830). It dismissed the action brought by Mars, and granted HB a permanent injunction restraining Mars from inducing retailers to stock Mars ice cream in freezer cabinets belonging to HB.
8. Mars appealed against that judgment to the Irish Supreme Court on 4 September 1992. The Supreme Court decided to stay proceedings and to refer to the Court of Justice of the European Communities three questions for a preliminary ruling (see para 30, below). That reference was the subject of the judgment of the Court of Justice in Masterfoods Ltd v HB Ice Cream Ltd, HB Ice Cream Ltd v Masterfoods Ltd (t/a Mars Ireland) Case C-344/98 [2001] All ER (EC) 130, [2000] ECR I-11369. At the date of the present judgment, the proceedings before the Supreme Court are still pending. a

9. In parallel to those proceedings before the Irish courts, on 18 September 1991 Mars lodged a complaint with the Commission of the European Communities under art 3 of Council Regulation 17/62 (first regulation implementing arts 85 and 86 of the Treaty) (OJ English Sp Edn 1959-1962 p 87). The complaint related to the provision by HB, to large numbers of retailers, of freezer cabinets to be used exclusively for HB products. b

10. On 22 July 1992, Valley Ice Cream (Ireland) Ltd also lodged a complaint against HB with the Commission. c

11. On 29 July 1993, the Commission issued a statement of objections to HB in which it concluded that HB's distribution arrangements infringed arts 85 and 86 of the Treaty (hereinafter the 1993 statement of objections).

12. Following negotiations with the Commission, HB, while contesting the Commission's view, proposed changes to its distribution arrangements, with a view to qualifying for an exemption under art 85(3) of the Treaty. Those changes were notified to the Commission on 8 March 1995 and in a press release of 10 March 1995 the Commission stated that, at first sight, the new distribution arrangements might enable HB to obtain an exemption. On 15 August 1995 a notice pursuant to art 19(3) of Regulation 17/62 was published in the Official Journal of the European Communities (OJ 1995 C211 p 4). d

13. On 22 January 1997 the Commission sent HB a new statement of objections in which it expressed the view that the changes had not achieved the expected results of free access to sales outlets (hereinafter the 1997 statement of objections). HB replied to those objections. e

14. On 11 March 1998 the Commission adopted the contested decision. f

THE CONTESTED DECISION

15. In the contested decision the Commission states that HB's distribution agreements containing the exclusivity clause are incompatible with arts 85 and 86 of the Treaty. It defines the relevant product market as the market for single-wrapped items of impulse ice cream and the relevant geographic market as Ireland (recitals (138) and (140)). It states that HB's position on the relevant market is particularly strong, as is shown by its market share over many years (see para 21, below). That strength is further illustrated by the degree of both numeric (79%) and weighted distribution (94%) of the relevant HB products during August and September 1995 and by the strength of the brand and the breadth and popularity of its range of products. HB's position on that market is further reinforced by the strength of Unilever's position, not only on the other ice cream markets in Ireland (take-home and catering), but also in the international ice cream markets and the markets for frozen foods and consumer products generally (recital (141)). g

16. The Commission observes that the network of HB's distribution agreements relating to freezer cabinets installed in outlets has the effect of restricting the ability of retailers who are parties to those agreements to stock and offer for sale in their outlets impulse products from competing suppliers, in circumstances where the only freezer cabinet or cabinets for the storage of impulse ice cream in place in their outlets have been provided by HB, where h

- a* the HB freezer cabinet or cabinets is or are unlikely to be replaced by a cabinet owned by the retailer and/or supplied by a competitor, and where it is not economically viable to allocate space to the installation of an additional cabinet. It considers that the effect of this restriction is that the competing suppliers are precluded from selling their products to those outlets, thereby restricting competition between suppliers in the relevant market (recital (143)).
- b* The Commission did not take into consideration the restrictive effect of each individual agreement, but rather the effect produced by the category of agreements fulfilling the above-mentioned conditions and constituting an identifiable part of the network of HB's freezer cabinet agreements as a whole. According to the Commission, the assessment of the restrictive effect of that part of HB's network then applies equally to each of the agreements comprising that part. The assessment of this restrictive effect was made against the background of the effect of all similar networks of freezer cabinet agreements operated by other ice cream suppliers in the relevant market, as well as in the light of any further relevant market conditions (recitals (144) and (145)).

- d* 17. The Commission then quantified the restrictive effect of HB's distribution agreements in order to show their significance. It observes that the restrictive effect of the networks of agreements for the supply of freezer cabinets reserved exclusively for the supplier's products are the result of the space constraints inevitably experienced by retail outlets. The average number of cabinets in place in outlets is 1.5, according to the survey carried out by
- e* Lansdowne Market Research Ltd in 1996 (hereinafter the Lansdowne survey), while the retailers consider that the optimal number of freezer cabinets to have in place in an outlet at the height of the season would be 1.57 (recital (147)).

18. The Commission states that only a small proportion of retail outlets in Ireland, 17% according to the Lansdowne survey, have freezer cabinets which are not subject to an exclusivity clause. It maintains that those outlets may be referred to as 'open' outlets, in the sense that retailers are free to stock in them the impulse ice cream of any supplier (recital (148)). As regards the other outlets, 83% according to the Lansdowne survey, in which the suppliers have installed freezer cabinets, the Commission considers that other suppliers cannot have direct access to them for sale of their products without first overcoming substantial barriers. It submits that newcomers to the outlet are foreclosed from them and that—
- f*
- g*

'Although this foreclosure is not absolute, in the sense that the retailer is not contractually precluded from selling other suppliers' products, the outlet can be said to be foreclosed in so far as entry thereto by competing suppliers is rendered very difficult.' (Recital (149).)

19. The Commission finds that in some 40% of all outlets in Ireland the only freezer cabinet/s for the storage of impulse ice cream in place in the outlet has or have been provided by HB (recital (156)). It observes that—

- i* 'A supplier who wishes to gain access for the sale of his impulse ice-cream products to a retail outlet (that is, a new entrant to the outlet) in which at least one supplier-exclusive freezer cabinet is in place can only do so if that outlet has a non-exclusive cabinet ... or if he can persuade the retailer either to replace an in situ supplier-exclusive freezer cabinet or to install an additional freezer cabinet alongside the in situ supplier-exclusive cabinet/s.' (Recital (157).)

It considers (recitals (158) to (183)), on the basis of the Lansdowne survey, that it is unlikely that retailers will adopt one or other of those measures if they have one (or more) freezers supplied by HB and concludes that 40% of the outlets in question are de facto tied to HB (recital (184)). Other suppliers are therefore foreclosed from access to those outlets, contrary to art 85(1) of the Treaty. a

20. The contested decision also finds that the agreements containing the exclusivity clause cannot be exempted under art 85(3) of the Treaty, as they do not contribute to an improvement in the distribution of the products (recitals (222) to (238)), do not allow consumers a fair share of the resulting benefit (recitals (239) and (240)), are not indispensable to the attainment of those benefits (recital (241)) and afford HB the possibility of eliminating a substantial part of competition on the relevant market (recitals (242) to (246)). b

21. As regards the application of art 86 of the Treaty, the Commission takes the view that HB has a dominant position on the relevant market, in particular because it has for a long time had a share in volume and value of over 75% of that market (recitals (259) and (261)).

22. The Commission states that— d

‘HB abuses its dominant position in the relevant market ... in that it induces retailers ... who do not have a freezer cabinet for the storage of impulse ice cream either procured by themselves or provided by another ice-cream supplier than HB to enter into freezer-cabinet agreements subject to a condition of exclusivity’— e and that ‘The inducement takes the form of an offer to supply the freezer cabinets to retailers, and to maintain them, at no direct charge to the retailer’ (recital (263)).

23. By the contested decision the Commission: f

—declares that the exclusivity clause in the freezer cabinet agreements concluded between HB and retailers in Ireland, for the placement of cabinets in retail outlets which have only one or more freezer cabinets supplied by HB for the stocking of single-wrapped items of impulse ice cream, and not having a freezer cabinet either procured by themselves or provided by an ice cream manufacturer other than HB, constitutes an infringement of art 85(1) of the EC Treaty (art 1 of the operative part); g

—rejects the request by HB for an exemption of the exclusivity clause described in art 1 pursuant to art 85(3) of the Treaty (art 2 of the operative part);

—declares that HB’s inducement to retailers in Ireland not having a freezer cabinet either procured by themselves or provided by an ice cream manufacturer other than HB, to enter into freezer cabinet agreements subject to a condition of exclusivity by offering to supply to them one or more freezer cabinets for the stocking of single-wrapped items of impulse ice cream, and to maintain the cabinets, free of any direct charge, constitutes an infringement of art 86 of the Treaty (art 3 of the operative part); h

—requires HB immediately to cease the infringements set out in arts 1 and 3, and to refrain from taking any measure having the same object or effect (art 4 of the operative part); i

—requires HB, within three months of notification of the contested decision, to inform retailers with whom it currently has freezer cabinet agreements constituting infringements of art 85(1) of the Treaty, as described

- a in art 1, of the full wording of arts 1 and 3, and to notify them that the exclusivity provisions in question are void (art 5 of the operative part).

PROCEDURE AND FORMS OF ORDER SOUGHT

- b 24. By application lodged at the Registry of the Court on 21 April 1998, HB brought an action under the fourth paragraph of art 173 of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, the fourth paragraph of art 230 EC) for the annulment of the contested decision.

25. By separate document received by the Registry on the same day, HB also applied, under art 185 of the EC Treaty (now art 242 EC), for suspension of the operation of that decision until the court had ruled on the merits.

- c 26. By applications lodged on 29 April and 8 May 1998 respectively, Mars and Treats Frozen Confectionery Ltd, which changed its name in the course of the proceedings to Richmond Frozen Confectionery Ltd (hereinafter Richmond), sought leave to intervene in the present proceedings in support of the form of order sought by the Commission.

- d 27. The applications to intervene were served on the parties in accordance with art 116(1) of the Rules of Procedure of the Court of First Instance.

- e 28. By fax dated 13 May 1998, HB stated that it had no objection to the application by Mars for leave to intervene, but objected to the application by Richmond on the ground that it did not have a sufficient interest in the outcome of the case. HB requested that only a non-confidential version of its application and of the contested decision should be furnished to the applicants for leave to intervene. For that purpose, it listed the information which it considered to be secret or confidential.

- f 29. By separate document lodged at the Registry on 14 May 1998, the Commission stated that it had no objection to the two applications for leave to intervene. With regard to HB's request for confidential treatment, it expressed certain reservations on 18 May 1998.

30. By order of 16 June 1998, received at the Court of Justice on 21 September 1998, the Supreme Court referred for a preliminary ruling under art 177 of the EC Treaty (now art 234 EC) three questions on the interpretation of arts 85, 86 and 222 of the EC Treaty (now art 295 EC). That case was registered as Case C-344/98.

- g 31. By order of 7 July 1998 in Van den Bergh Foods Ltd v European Commission Case T-65/98 R [1998] ECR II-2641, the President of the Court of First Instance suspended the application of the contested decision until delivery of final judgment of the court in the present case and reserved the costs.

- h 32. By order of the President of the Fifth Chamber of the court of 2 March 1999, Mars and Richmond were given leave to intervene in the present case in support of the form of order sought by the Commission. In that same order, he granted, in part, the request for confidential treatment submitted by HB. A non-confidential version of the pleadings was served on the interveners.

33. By order of 28 April 1999, the President of the Fifth Chamber of the court stayed the proceedings in the present case pursuant to art 47(3) of the Statute of the Court of Justice pending delivery of judgment in Case C-344/98.

- i 34. On 14 December 2000 the Court of Justice gave judgment in Masterfoods and HB. By letters of 1 February 2001 the Registrar of the Court of First Instance invited the parties to lodge observations on the implications, if any, to be drawn in the present proceedings from that judgment. The Commission and HB lodged their observations at the Registry on 15 and 27 February 2001 respectively. On 13 March 2001 Mars lodged at the Registry its statement in intervention in the present case and also its observations on the implications to be drawn from the judgment of the Court of Justice. Richmond did not lodge a statement in intervention. a

35. On hearing the report of the Judge-Rapporteur, the Court of First Instance (Fifth Chamber) decided to open the oral procedure.

36. The parties presented oral argument and answered questions put by the court at the hearing on 3 October 2002. b

37. HB claims that the court should: annul the contested decision in its entirety; in the alternative, annul those parts of the contested decision that the court finds erroneous or unsafe; order the Commission to pay the costs.

38. The Commission contends that the court should: dismiss the application as unfounded; order HB to pay the costs. c

39. Mars claims that the court should: dismiss the application as unfounded; order HB to pay Mars' costs.

40. At the hearing Richmond claimed that the court should: dismiss the application; order HB to pay the costs.

LAW d

41. In support of its action for annulment HB raises seven pleas in law: first, manifest errors of assessment of the facts, resulting in errors of law; second, infringement of art 85(1) of the Treaty; third, infringement of art 85(3) of the Treaty; fourth, infringement of art 86 of the Treaty; fifth, infringement of the right to property, by failing to observe general principles of law and art 222 of the EC Treaty; sixth, infringement of art 190 of the EC Treaty (now art 253 EC); and, seventh, failure to observe fundamental principles of Community law and infringement of essential procedural requirements. The court will examine the first and second pleas together. e

THE FIRST AND SECOND PLEAS: MANIFEST ERRORS OF ASSESSMENT OF THE FACTS AND INFRINGEMENT OF ART 85(1) OF THE TREATY f

Arguments of the parties

42. HB maintains that the contested decision is vitiated by manifest errors of assessment of the facts, resulting in errors of law. It considers that the parties disagree not as to the facts themselves but rather as to the conclusions to be drawn from them.

43. HB submits that freezer cabinet exclusivity cannot be regarded as outlet exclusivity (recital (184) of the contested decision) because the retailers are entitled to terminate the contract with HB or to install new freezers not belonging to HB alongside HB's freezer if new and attractive products are offered or if they are no longer satisfied with HB's range of products or level of service. It is clear from the judgment in Langnese-Iglo GmbH v European Commission (supported by Mars GmbH) Case T-7/93 [1995] All ER (EC) 908, [1995] ECR II-1533 that the duration of a contractual tie is significant when assessing the degree of foreclosure of the market. According to HB, its freezer agreements are not of indefinite duration, as the retailers are able to terminate them at any time. The fact that its freezer cabinets are rarely replaced merely proves that retailers with those freezers are satisfied with the arrangement and does not imply that the outlets in question are tied. g

44. According to HB, all the evidence suggests that the overwhelming majority of retailers alleged by the Commission to be foreclosed as a consequence of HB freezer cabinet exclusivity have in fact positively chosen such exclusivity in preference to any of the alternative configurations available h

- a* to them for the storage and sale of impulse ice cream. It follows that the Commission should not have concluded that the freezer exclusivity clause leads to a foreclosure of the relevant market contrary to arts 85 and 86 of the Treaty. The Commission has failed to make out any causal connection between HB freezer cabinet exclusivity and HB's continuing popularity as reflected in the relatively limited market penetration by rival brands on the relevant market.
- b* The retailers are thus willing to stock new products where there is consumer demand for them. However, the facts show that the limited penetration of HB's competitors is not due to any foreclosure of the market resulting from the exclusivity clause but rather to the fact that their products have not proved sufficiently attractive to consumers.
- c* 45. HB claims that the Commission has incorrectly analysed the question of market foreclosure. It ought to have distinguished between sales outlets which are deprived of any freedom of choice because of the provisions of a distribution agreement and sales outlets which enjoy commercial freedom of choice and have exercised it only after assessing the merits of the offers made by the competitors on the market. Only the first group may be regarded as
- d* foreclosed. In fact the Commission assumed that sales outlets which have only HB freezer cabinets, regardless of their number, are foreclosed. HB explains that it is not seeking to justify absolute territorial protection or any other alleged restriction of competition at issue in the present case, but that it is submitting that all the evidence shows that the limited market penetration by its competitors is due to the fact that HB satisfies the needs of retailers and of
- e* consumers. The Commission has not sought to find any other explanation for the failure of HB's competitors.
46. HB considers that another factor shows that the Commission's reasoning in regard to foreclosure of the relevant market is flawed. If a tie resulting from the freezer agreements between HB and the retailers were to be established, HB submits that it would then be necessary to take account of the fact that the
- f* degree of foreclosure of the market is not 40%, as submitted in the Lansdowne survey, but at most 6%. In any event, when the degree of foreclosure of the relevant market is calculated, HB submits, pointing to various data and to the Lansdowne survey, that it is necessary to exclude from the calculation the following three categories of sales outlets:
- g* —outlets where there are two or more HB freezer cabinets in place: these are outlets where by definition there is the necessary space and it is profitable to have a second freezer (namely 6% of sales outlets);
- outlets where there is no interest on the part of the retailer in stocking another brand of ice cream: in such a situation there is an insufficient causal connection between the practice of the provision of HB's freezer cabinets and
- h* the failure of the competing supplier to gain access to the market (27% of sales outlets);
- outlets where the retailer is interested in stocking another ice cream brand and would be prepared to install another cabinet, to replace an HB cabinet with two smaller cabinets or to replace an HB cabinet by his own cabinet for the purpose (2–5% of sales outlets).
- i* 47. HB thus submits that, when the degree of market foreclosure is calculated, account should be taken only of outlets in which the retailer wishes to change brand but is unable to do so. The approach adopted in the contested decision concerning the application of art 85(1) of the Treaty is therefore over-simplistic and at variance with the law as it has developed over recent years. HB also submits that the Commission overestimates the space restrictions encountered by retailers. a

48. HB also observes that its calculation of the true measure of market foreclosure is supported by other evidence of the dynamics of the relevant market. It submits, in particular, that the relevant market is contested by at least five manufacturers and that other manufacturers, including new entrants, have been able to achieve substantial levels of distribution, both numeric and weighted. b

49. HB disputes the finding in the contested decision that the provision of freezers subject to an exclusivity clause is a cost barrier to entry or expansion of suppliers and raises competitors' cost of entry to the relevant market, inasmuch as new entrants too need to provide and maintain freezers. HB submits that this practice is necessary in order to prevent its competitors from using its freezers to store their products without having invested in their own freezers. c

50. According to HB, to supply freezers to the impulse ice cream trade in Ireland subject to a separate rental would involve demands on its logistical and other resources that cannot be quantified in purely monetary terms. In addition, HB would be at a competitive disadvantage since it would be required to carry on its balance sheet a fleet of freezer cabinets for use not only in its business but also in the business of its retail customers and competitors. d

51. HB contests the Commission's assertion in recital (198) of the contested decision that price competition may suffer because competition in the impulse ice cream products sector takes place to a large extent between outlets and that inter-brand competition is therefore reduced in outlets stocking only a single brand. It observes that in any event around 44% of outlets stock two brands of ice cream. e

52. HB submits that the correct application of art 85(1) of the Treaty, in the light of the case law of the Court of Justice, calls for application of the rule of reason. It is necessary to make a distinction between restrictions of conduct and restrictions of competition. Any agreement inevitably involves some form of restriction of conduct, but does not necessarily give rise to a restriction of competition. It is therefore clear that application of art 85(1) inevitably involves a qualitative assessment of any given restriction of conduct. f

53. HB also submits that in the light of an analysis based on the rule of reason, art 85 of the Treaty does not apply to freezer cabinet agreements, as it is clear that the exclusivity clause is necessary to achieve the full benefits of the system. Furthermore, the exclusivity clause is not unreasonably restrictive of competition. The exclusivity relates only to the freezer and the agreement is effectively terminable at will (see para 43, above). It observes that in Pronuptia de Paris GmbH v Pronuptia de Paris Irmgard Schillgalis Case 161/84 [1986] ECR 353 the court stated that it is possible to deal with particular formats for distribution (a system of distribution through franchises in that case) at the stage of deciding whether art 85(1) is applicable. Community law has long recognised that in considering the applicability of art 85(1) in a given case, it is necessary to take account of the nature of the products governed by the agreement (see Société Minière v Maschinenbau Ulm GmbH Case 56/65 [1966] ECR 235 at 250). g

54. The contested decision accepts that the free on-loan freezer system provides benefits to both the supplier and the retailer (recital (224)) and that it is widely employed in Europe (recital (21)). HB also submits that the exclusivity

a clause does not confer geographical exclusivity on the retailer and has not prevented entry by Mars or other competitors to the relevant market. That clause does not therefore fall within the scope of art 85(1) of the Treaty, as it is an ancillary restraint. HB observes that this analysis corresponds to that adopted by the Irish High Court in Masterfoods Ltd (t/a Mars Ireland) v HB Ice Cream [1992] 3 CMLR 830 (paras 141–146, 221–229, and more particularly para 222). Similarly, HB relies on the report of the United Kingdom Monopolies and Mergers Commission of March 1994 on the supply in the United Kingdom of ice cream for immediate consumption and various judgments of United States courts and submits that there the approach to provision of point-of-sale equipment differs from the approach adopted by the Commission in the contested decision.

c 55. Even if a rule of reason were not applied, HB submits that the exclusivity clause would still fall outside the scope of art 85(1) of the Treaty on a ‘quantitative’ basis, notwithstanding the attempt in the contested decision to create an artificially broad category of foreclosed outlets. It submits that the judgment of the Court of Justice in Delimitis v Henninger Bräu AG Case C-234/89 [1991] ECR I-935 and the judgment in the Langnese-Iglo case require a detailed examination of the contestability of a market in deciding whether or not a particular agreement or set of agreements produces such a degree of foreclosure as to fall foul of the art 85(1) prohibition. According to HB, the Delimitis and Langnese-Iglo cases require two conditions to be satisfied for a market to be deemed open, namely, first, that there is access to the minimum number of outlets necessary for the profitable operation of the distribution system and, second, that competitors have some possibility for expansion of their activities, that is to say, to increase their market share. According to HB—

e ‘if the market is contestable so that new entrants are not “denied access” in the sense that there are “real and specific possibilities” for market entry, there is no foreclosure such as to bring art 85(1) into play.’

f Moreover, the importance of the network of similar agreements in the industry should not be exaggerated as it constitutes only ‘one factor amongst others’.

g 56. HB submits that the court must examine the question of foreclosure of the market, and whether such foreclosure is acceptable or not, on the assumption that Mars or any other competitor is willing to make an investment in freezers comparable to that of the other market participants. That is apparent from para 21 of the judgment in Delimitis’ case, according to which it is necessary to take account of other strategies for penetrating the market before concluding that a competitor has been unreasonably denied access to the market.

h 57. According to HB, the relevant market is not foreclosed if the quantitative criterion is applied. First, as regards the duration of the restriction, it was established in the Langnese-Iglo case that the agreements in question had been concluded for five years and had an average duration of two-and-a-half-years; i however, the freezer cabinet agreements are terminable at will (see para 43, above).

58. Second, HB claims that, in the Langnese-Iglo case, the court’s assessment of the foreclosure effect of the agreements at issue was based on the fact that the agreements excluded competing suppliers entirely from the relevant outlets. By contrast, the freezer exclusivity clause has no such effect. A competitor may convince the retailer of the merits of its products and so obtain access to his sales outlet. a

59. Third, HB submits that in para 105 of the Langnese-Iglo judgment the court applied a two-tier test based on a 'tying-in' threshold of 30% in order to determine whether certain agreements had the effect of foreclosing the market. It is therefore necessary to convert the quantitative criteria developed in the Langnese-Iglo case in relation to outlet exclusivity, so as to apply it to freezer exclusivity. According to HB, the most appropriate method to convert those criteria is to focus on that part of the retail sector where the retailer has only an HB freezer and either no room for another freezer or considers that investment in a freezer is not economically viable. In the light of the Lansdowne survey, it is viable for a retailer to invest in his own freezer in 47% of sales outlets, accounting for over 80% of total ice cream turnover. b

60. HB therefore submits that the Commission has not established a causal connection between the freezer exclusivity clause and the difficulties experienced by suppliers or new entrants in penetrating the market. It concludes from this that, as the market is not foreclosed on the criteria laid down in the Langnese-Iglo case, there is no need to go to the second limb of the test, which is to look at the effect of the agreements in question in contributing to the overall degree of foreclosure of the relevant market. The judgment in the Langnese-Iglo case suggests that the Commission ought to have pointed to other features of the economic and legal context which it claims lead to significant foreclosure in the relevant market. c

61. The Commission, supported by the interveners, submits that the exclusivity clause is contrary to art 85 of the Treaty in that it restricts the freedom of retailers and prevents access to the market. It states that the clause operates as a de facto tie for two categories of retailers, namely 'those who might add an additional freezer or those who might replace an existing freezer'. The contested decision demonstrates that retailers are reluctant to install an additional freezer because this requires giving up space which could be used for other products. The contested decision also shows that retailers who have no space but could replace an existing freezer, either by a freezer supplied by another manufacturer or by their own freezer, are reluctant to do so because replacing a freezer involves additional responsibilities like maintenance (for retailers buying their own freezers) or the loss of HB products (for retailers taking a freezer from another ice cream manufacturer). d

62. According to the Commission, the real question to be addressed by the court is whether the contested decision has provided sufficient proof of its conclusion at para 143 that 'this restriction has the consequence that those competing suppliers are precluded from selling their products to those outlets, thereby restricting competition between suppliers in the relevant market'. The Commission contends that the contested decision clearly sets out the difficulties faced by retailers who wish to sell other brands of ice cream. e

63. The Commission observes that the contested decision is simply intended to restore the commercial freedom of retailers and so allow rival producers to compete on the merits of their products. The real question is whether retailers, who are ultimately paying for the freezers in their shops, should be free to stock the ice cream brand of their choice in those freezers. The contested decision has demonstrated the dilemma faced by retailers wishing to stock other brands of ice cream. If, in order to sell non-HB ice cream, the retailer must either install an additional freezer or cease to sell HB products, he will be f

- a reluctant to sell other brands. As a result, that outlet is closed off to any rival brand, regardless of the merits of the product. The Commission considers that this dilemma is exactly the same as that which it had identified in the judgment in the Langnese-Iglo case [1995] All ER (EC) 908 (para 108), and in Schöller Lebensmittel GmbH & Co KG v European Commission Case T-9/93 [1995] ECR II-1611 (para 84)). In those judgments the court found that the Commission was right to regard freezer exclusivity agreements as 'contributing to making access to the market more difficult'.

- b 64. According to the Commission, HB exploits this dilemma for its own purposes by using the exclusivity clause as a barrier to the entry of new competitors. HB's expenditure on freezers enables it to keep other suppliers out of the market. It also contests HB's arguments that retailers are satisfied with their agreement with HB and have no interest in selling other brands of ice cream. The Commission accepts that the exclusivity clause presents advantages for the parties but observes that this fact does not mean that it does not contain any anti-competitive element.

- c 65. With regard to the opportunity for retailers to terminate their agreement with HB, the Commission submits that a key element to be taken into consideration is the economic effect of the agreement. The Lansdowne survey shows that retailers who have an HB freezer rarely exercise their right to replace it with a freezer of another brand or to purchase their own freezer.

- d 66. The Commission also submits that it is possible to separate the supply of ice cream from the supply of the freezer. It is not necessary for ice cream manufacturers to own freezers. HB accepts that distinction, because in 1995 and 1996 it made two separate proposals to the Commission, which separated the ownership of freezers from the supply of ice cream, and were intended to allow it to obtain exemption under art 85(3) of the Treaty.

- e 67. Mars submits that by making success in the marketplace depend on success in gaining access to retail outlets, freezer exclusivity distorts the competitive process by conferring on the existing supplier an unfair advantage over smaller suppliers or newcomers in that market who are unlikely to have a full range of established products.

- f 68. The Commission disputes HB's claim that 6% of the relevant market is foreclosed rather than the 40% referred to in the contested decision.

- g 69. The contested decision shows how difficult it is for a new entrant to gain access to the relevant market owing to the existence of the exclusivity clause (recitals (185) to (200)). In any event, there is a causal connection between the practice of HB freezer cabinet provision and the low market shares achieved by its competitors (recitals (185) to (194)).

- h 70. The Commission disputes HB's argument to the effect that the agreements concluded with retailers fall outside the scope of art 85 of the Treaty because of the application of the rule of reason and the judgment in the Pronuptia case. The provisions of the agreement examined by the Court of Justice in the judgment in the Pronuptia case were different.

- i 71. Similarly, the Commission disputes HB's interpretation of the judgment in Delimitis' case (see para 55, above). It observes that in that judgment the Court of Justice examined whether it was possible for a new competitor to penetrate the bundle of contracts existing on the relevant market. Contrary to HB's assertion, the minimum number of sales outlets necessary for the profitable operation of a distribution system is not a test used by the court as a factor in assessing whether there are concrete possibilities of market penetration.

72. In Delimitis' case the Court of Justice stated that it was first necessary to establish whether there is clearly 'a bundle of similar contracts' in the relevant market. In Ireland the majority of freezers installed in outlets are supplied by HB (recital (152) of the contested decision). It is then necessary to examine whether there are opportunities for penetration of the relevant market. The Commission disputes that there are such possibilities in the present case. Thirdly, the Court of Justice suggested in its judgment in Delimitis' case that it is necessary to take into account the conditions under which competitive forces operate on the relevant market. The contested decision identifies the difficulties caused for new entrants by the fact of the exclusive use of HB freezers, which discourages retailers from stocking other products and creates logistical and cost barriers to market entry. The Commission submits that HB's argument that a new entrant must be assumed to compete 'in the manner which is characteristic of the industry' is not to be found in any of the cases cited by HB and would be unacceptable if the industry as a whole engaged in practices contrary to arts 85 or 86 of the Treaty.

73. The Commission submits that the degree of dependence referred to in the judgment in Delimitis' case is merely one factor amongst others in the economic and legal context in which a network of contracts must be assessed and that this is also apparent from the judgments in the Langnese-Iglo case and the Schöller case.

74. The analysis by the Court of First Instance in the last mentioned cases must, according to the Commission, be applied in the present case. The court's conclusion that exclusivity clauses relating to freezers make access to the market more difficult is applicable to the exclusivity clause at issue, because the court there confirmed that the need for a new entrant to create a network of retailers for itself did constitute a barrier to market entry.

Findings of the court

75. In its first two pleas, HB complains that the Commission committed a number of manifest errors in analysing the existence and extent of foreclosure of the relevant market resulting from the distribution agreements in question. It submits in particular that the Commission, by materially overestimating the degree of market foreclosure, infringed art 85(1) of the Treaty.

76. HB challenges, more specifically, the Commission's principal finding in the contested decision that 40% of sales outlets in Ireland are de facto tied to HB by the exclusivity clause and that access to those outlets is therefore foreclosed to other suppliers (see in particular recitals (143), (156) and (184)). It submits that this conclusion is fundamentally wrong in law and in fact, as the Commission has not correctly applied the legal test for establishing whether the relevant market is foreclosed. HB complains that the Commission made no distinction between, on the one hand, retailers who are contractually precluded from stocking other suppliers' ice creams and, on the other hand, those who are free to act in that way and have available space for that purpose, but who decide, using their own business judgment, not to do so. HB considers that retailers freely choose to stock its ice creams in particular because of the quality of its products. It submits that the fact that other manufacturers find it difficult to establish themselves on the relevant market is not due to the exclusivity clause but to the fact that their ice creams are less attractive to retailers and consumers.

77. It is apparent from the contested decision that the Commission examined not only the provisions of HB's distribution agreements, which do not formally a preclude retailers from stocking other suppliers' ice creams in their sales outlets, but also the application of those agreements in the relevant market and the commercial options actually open to retailers pursuant to those agreements. After analysing the possibilities of persuading a retailer to stock the ice creams of a new entrant on the relevant market, the Commission considered that in respect of 40% of sales outlets—namely those having only freezer cabinets supplied by HB in which to stock ice creams and which do not therefore have either their own freezer or freezers provided by other ice cream manufacturers—it was 'unlikely' that retailers would take the necessary steps to replace HB freezers by their own freezer or by a freezer supplied by a competing manufacturer or that they would provide space in which to install an additional freezer. It concluded from this that the exclusivity clause in the HB distribution agreements in fact operated as an outlet exclusivity in those 40% of sales outlets in the relevant market and that HB had contributed materially to a foreclosure of that market contrary to art 85(1) of the Treaty.

78. The views of the parties differ as to the correctness of the Commission's factual analysis of the particular features of the relevant market in the contested decision and of its finding, based on that analysis, that the exclusivity clause infringes art 85(1) of the Treaty.

79. It must also be pointed out that despite the highly detailed arguments submitted in their written pleadings and at the hearing with regard to the facts of the present case and the conclusions to be drawn from them, the parties do not really disagree on various features of the relevant market (see para 42, above), and particularly the following:

e —impulse ice creams must be stored at a low temperature and therefore in a freezer cabinet in the retailer's premises;

f —in Ireland and throughout Europe, manufacturers and distributors of ice creams generally adopt the practice of supplying freezers to retailers on the basis of an exclusivity clause. Owing to the exclusivity clause, a retailer who has one or more HB freezers only and who wishes to sell another brand of ice cream must either replace the HB freezer or freezers or install an additional freezer;

g —unlike the clauses in the supply agreements at issue in the judgments in the Langnese-Iglo case and the Schöller case, which required retailers in Germany to sell in their outlets only products purchased directly from Langnese-Iglo and Schöller companies, the exclusivity clause in the present case does not preclude retailers from selling brands of ice creams other than HB, provided that the freezers made available by HB are used exclusively for its own products;

h —HB has long held the position of market leader in Ireland for impulse ice creams. Its product range in Ireland is very popular and commercially very successful. It has acquired that position following considerable investment in the development and promotion of a full range of ice creams, which enjoy a high degree of brand recognition in Ireland;

i —in accordance with the provisions of the HB distribution agreements, retailers who have entered into a freezer supply agreement may terminate that agreement at any time on giving two months' notice. It is common ground that in practice HB does not enforce that period of notice on retailers who wish to terminate the agreement more quickly or with immediate effect;

—for the majority of retailers in Ireland, impulse ice creams are a marginal product (in that they represent merely a small percentage of their turnover and profit) which is sold seasonally. Impulse ice creams compete in the outlets for selling space, with a number of other products (whether or not impulse products); a

—HB is part of the Unilever group. The companies in that group are the principal suppliers of ice creams in most of the member states. In the impulse ice cream sector, they are the market leader in several member states.

80. The court observes, as a preliminary point, that the exclusivity clause does not require retailers to sell only HB products in their sales outlets. Consequently, that clause is not, in formal terms, an exclusive purchasing obligation whose object is to restrict competition on the relevant market. The court must therefore first examine whether the Commission has adequately proved, in the specific circumstances of the relevant market, that the exclusivity clause relating to freezer cabinets in reality imposes exclusivity on some sales outlets and whether the Commission correctly quantified the degree of that foreclosure. The court must then ascertain, as appropriate, whether the degree of foreclosure is sufficiently high to constitute an infringement of art 85(1) of the Treaty. Judicial review of Commission measures involving an appraisal of complex economic matters must be limited to verifying whether the relevant rules on procedure and on the statement of reasons have been complied with, whether the facts have been accurately stated and whether there has been any manifest error of assessment or a misuse of powers (see, to that effect, British American Tobacco Co Ltd v EC Commission Joined cases 142/84 and 156/84 [1987] ECR 4487 (para 62), Matra Hachette SA v EC Commission Case T-17/93 [1994] ECR II-595 (paras 23, 25), Asia Motor France SA v EC Commission Case T-7/92 [1993] ECR II-669 (para 33)). b
e

81. The assessment in the contested decision of the degree of foreclosure of the relevant market is principally based on information and statistical data contained in the Lansdowne survey. Moreover, the decision often refers to a survey of the relevant market commissioned by HB and completed in 1996 by Behaviour & Attitudes Ltd, a market research firm (hereinafter the B&A survey), and a survey carried out in 1996 by Rosslyn Research Ltd for Mars (hereinafter the Rosslyn survey). Those surveys contain two types of information: first, purely factual information relating to the number of sales outlets in Ireland, the number of freezer cabinets per sales outlet and the calculation of the number of cabinets belonging to retailers or supplied by ice cream manufacturers and, second, evaluations of statistical data supplied in a survey of a representative sample of retailers in Ireland. The Commission's finding in recital (156) of the contested decision is based on an analysis of the information and relevant data from those surveys, its conclusion being that in 40% of sales outlets in the relevant market the only freezer cabinet/s for the storage of impulse ice cream in place in the outlet had been provided by HB (see recitals (87) to (125) and (146) to (156) of the contested decision). The parties do not contest the overall correctness of that figure and, in its observations on the 1997 statement of objections, HB confirmed that it accepted that figure. f
g

82. When examining the correctness of the Commission's assessment of the existence and degree of market foreclosure, the court cannot confine itself to looking at the effects of the exclusivity clause, considered in isolation, referring only to the contractual restrictions imposed by HB's distribution agreements on individual retailers. i

83. In order to determine whether HB's exclusive distribution agreements fall within the prohibition contained in art 85(1) of the Treaty, it is appropriate, in a accordance with the case law, to consider whether all the similar agreements entered into in the relevant market and the other features of the economic and legal context of the agreements at issue, show that those agreements cumulatively have the effect of denying access to that market to new competitors. If, on examination, that is found not to be the case, the individual agreements making up the bundle of agreements cannot impair competition

b within the meaning of art 85(1) of the Treaty. If, on the other hand, such examination reveals that it is difficult to gain access to the market, it is then necessary to assess the extent to which the agreements at issue contribute to the cumulative effect produced, on the basis that only those agreements which make a significant contribution to any partitioning of the market are prohibited (see Delimitis' case (paras 23, 24), and the Langnese-Iglo case (para 99)).

84. It follows that, contrary to HB's submission, the contractual restrictions on retailers must be examined not just in a purely formal manner from the legal point of view, but also by taking into account the specific economic context in which the agreements in question operate, including the particular

d features of the relevant market, which may, in practice, reinforce those restrictions and thus distort competition on that market contrary to art 85(1) of the Treaty.

85. In that regard, it must be remembered that the exclusivity clause in HB's distribution agreements was part of a set of similar agreements concluded by manufacturers on the relevant market and was an established practice not only

e in Ireland but also in other countries (see para 79, above).

86. Thus, HB does not dispute that in 1996 around 83% of retail shops in Ireland had freezers supplied by a manufacturer and were subject to conditions similar to those of the exclusivity clause. The practical consequence of that network of agreements is that ice cream manufacturers which do not have a freezer cabinet installed in one or other of those 83% of outlets are unable to f gain direct access to them in order to sell their products unless the retailer either replaces an existing cabinet with his own cabinet or a cabinet supplied by the new supplier, or installs another cabinet of his own or one belonging to the new supplier. Without infringing the terms on which the freezer cabinet in question is supplied, a retailer cannot use it to stock ice cream from another manufacturer alongside those of the supplier of the cabinet, even if there is a g demand for those other brands. It follows that only 17% of outlets had freezer cabinets belonging to the retailer and, consequently, had capacity to stock ice cream from any supplier. Furthermore, according to the Lansdowne survey, 61% of freezer cabinets supplied by an ice cream manufacturer on the relevant market come from HB, 11% from Mars, 9% from Valley and 8% from Nestlé

h (see recital (88) of the contested decision). According to the Rosslyn survey, 64% of freezer cabinets supplied by an ice cream manufacturer on the relevant market come from HB, 14% from Mars and 4% from Valley (see recital (107) of the contested decision).

87. It is apparent from the file that the outlets which are the most important for the sale of impulse ice cream are generally small in area and have limited

i space (see recital (43) of the contested decision). The court finds that HB's argument referred to in para 47, above, namely that the Commission overestimated the space constraints faced by retailers, cannot be accepted. Even if, as HB submits in its written pleadings, the number of freezers in Ireland increased by around 16% between 1991 and 1996 that does not mean that when the contested decision was adopted there were no such constraints. The legality of the contested decision must be assessed by reference to the facts existing when it was adopted. The court observes that HB does not dispute the Commission's finding that in 1996 (see recital (147)), that is to say just after the increase in the number of freezers in Ireland on which HB relies and two years before the contested decision was adopted, the optimal number of freezers necessary in an outlet at the height of the season had almost been achieved. Furthermore, according to the Lansdowne survey, 87% of retailers consider that it is not economically viable to allocate space to the installation of an additional freezer (see recital (97) of the contested decision). a

88. Furthermore, it cannot be denied that the relevant product market is characterised by the need for each retailer to have at least one freezer—either owned by him or supplied by an ice cream manufacturer—in order to stock and display ice creams (see para 79, above). Consequently, the decision that a retailer who sells products for immediate consumption, such as confectionery, crisps and carbonated drinks, has to take is different where, on the one hand, an ice cream manufacturer offers to sell him its products, as a replacement or supplement to an existing range, and, on the other hand, where a similar offer is made by a manufacturer of other products, such as cigarettes or chocolates, which do not require a freezer cabinet but normal shelf space. A retailer cannot simply stock a new range of ice creams alongside other existing products for a trial period in order to establish whether there is sufficient demand for that range. He must first of all take a business decision as to whether the investment, risks and other disadvantages associated with the installation of a freezer or an additional freezer, including the displacement and decrease in the sales of other brands of ice cream and other products, will be outweighed by additional profit. It follows that a rational retailer will allocate space to a freezer in order to stock ice cream of a particular brand only if the sale of that brand is more profitable than the sale of impulse ice creams of other brands and of other products for immediate consumption. c

89. The court finds that, in the circumstances set out in particular in paras 85–88, above, the provision of a freezer 'without charge', the evident popularity of HB's ice cream, the breadth of its range of products and the benefits associated with the sale of them are very important considerations in the eyes of retailers when they consider whether to install an additional freezer cabinet in order to sell a second, possibly reduced, range of ice cream or, a fortiori, to terminate their distribution agreement with HB in order to replace HB's freezer cabinet either by their own cabinet or by one belonging to another supplier, which would, in all probability, be subject to a condition of exclusivity. f
g

90. Moreover, HB has held a dominant position on the relevant market for several years. When the contested decision was adopted it had an 89% share of the relevant market, both in volume and in value, the remainder being shared between several small suppliers (see the court's findings in paras 155, 156, below). That dominant position is also illustrated by the high degree of recognition of the HB brand and the size and popularity of its product range in Ireland. The court considers that the Commission, when assessing the effects of the exclusivity clause on the relevant market, could legitimately take into account the fact that HB held a dominant position on it in order to assess the conditions prevailing on that market and that the assessment was not, contrary to HB's submission, 'distorted'. It is settled law that the finding that an undertaking has a dominant position is not in itself a ground of criticism of the undertaking concerned (see Nederlandsche Banden-Industrie Michelin (NV) v h

- a EC Commission Case 322/81 [1983] ECR 3461 (para 57) and Cie Maritime Belge Transports SA v European Commission Joined cases C-395/96 P and C-396/96 P [2000] All ER (EC) 385, [2000] ECR I-1365 (para 37)).

b 91. Consequently, the Commission, in taking into consideration the popularity of HB's ice creams and its position on the relevant market, is not penalising it for its legitimate business success. It has merely identified the effective dependence of retailers which results from the presence in the sales outlets of freezer cabinets supplied by HB, the dominant position of HB on the relevant market, the popularity of its product range, the constraints associated with the lack of space characterising typical sales outlets, the disadvantages and risks associated with stocking a second range of ice cream, as features that all form part of the economic context of the present case.

c 92. The court finds that the effect of the measures taken by HB in order to ensure compliance with the exclusivity clause is to cause retailers to act differently in regard to its products than they do in regard to the ice creams of other brands and in a way which is liable to distort competition in the relevant market. Those effects are clearly shown by the fact that the retailers do stock ice creams of other brands alongside those of HB, in the same freezer, whenever they consider that they are free to do so.

d 93. It is apparent from the file and from the contested decision (see recital (48)) that after its entry onto the relevant market in 1989 Mars gained a share of it, but that the reaction of HB, and its insistence that retailers complied with the exclusivity clause, reversed that development. Following the injunction against Mars granted by the High Court in 1990, which prohibited it from inducing retailers to stock its ice creams in HB freezers, the numeric distribution of its ice creams for immediate consumption in Ireland fell from 42% to less than 20%. This fact in itself indicates that there was a demand on the relevant market for products manufactured by HB's competitors and that the exclusivity clause does have a bearing on the ability of its competitors to penetrate that market and establish themselves on it.

e 94. The B&A survey also shows that a significant proportion [...] %<sup>1</sup> (more than 35%) of retailers would be prepared to stock a wider range of products if the exclusivity clauses no longer existed in the distribution agreements of ice cream manufacturers (see recital (120) of the contested decision), which shows that the effect of those clauses may be, contrary to HB's arguments (see para 51, above), to reduce not only the choice of consumers but also price competition between suppliers. Similarly, contrary to HB's submission, the fact that around 44% of sales outlets sell two brands of ice cream does not show that intra-brand competition is not affected by the exclusivity clause.

f 95. Furthermore, in Irish supermarkets that do not practise freezer cabinet exclusivity, the ice creams of suppliers other than HB are sold alongside HB products. At the hearing, Richmond stated that in Ireland it supplies 65% of supermarkets and only 8% of retailers. Moreover, it must be pointed out that in the United Kingdom, where the distribution system for impulse ice creams is different, Richmond has obtained a market share of 24%, whereas its share of the relevant market is no more than 2%. All those factors confirm that where it is possible to stock a second brand of ice cream in one and the same freezer, a significant number of retailers are prepared to do so. The fact that they do not do so is the result of the prevalence of exclusivity clauses in the relevant market.

1 Confidential data omitted.

96. The court also notes that the Commission's conclusion that entry onto the relevant market by HB's competitors is hindered by the existence of the exclusivity clause is confirmed by HB's own assessment of the advantages of that clause. It is apparent from the contested decision that the Unilever group, upon the entry of Mars into the European market at the end of the 1980s, placed particular importance on the supply of freezer cabinets intended for the exclusive use of its companies (see recitals (64) to (68) of the contested decision) and itself took the view that this practice might have the effect of imposing exclusivity on the sales outlets in question. In a document of the Unilever group of 1989, entitled 'European ice cream marketing strategy', reference is made to the importance of the exclusivity clause and to the maintenance of the scheme of retaining ownership of the freezers, in the following terms:

'We must retain ownership of the cabinet, particularly where distribution is performed by third parties, in order to retain, as far as possible through exclusivity contracts, sole brand supply to the fridge, and de facto, to the outlet.'

97. In the light of the foregoing, the court finds that the Commission has proved to the required legal standard that, notwithstanding the high degree of recognition of HB's products on the relevant market and the fact that it offers a complete range of ice creams, many of which are highly popular with consumers, there is objective and specific evidence demonstrating the existence of demand in Ireland for the ice creams of other manufacturers where they are available, even though those manufacturers have a smaller range of ice creams, namely the ice creams of manufacturers who, like Mars, occupy quite specific niches. The Commission has shown in that regard that a considerable number of retailers are prepared to stock impulse ice creams from various manufacturers, provided that they may stock them in one and the same freezer and that they are not inclined to do so when they have to install an additional freezer of their own or one belonging to another manufacturer. Consequently, the court cannot accept HB's argument that the reluctance of retailers to sell products of other ice cream manufacturers must be attributed not to the exclusivity clause but rather to the fact that there is no demand for those products on the relevant market.

98. The court also finds that the Commission rightly held, having regard to the specific features of the product in question and the economic context of this case, that the network of HB's distribution agreements together with the supply of freezer cabinets 'without charge' subject to the condition of exclusivity, have a considerable dissuasive effect on retailers with regard to the installation of their own cabinet or that of another manufacturer and operate de facto as a tie on sales outlets that have only HB freezer cabinets, that is to say 40% of sales outlets in the relevant market. Despite the fact that it is theoretically possible for retailers who have only an HB freezer cabinet to sell the ice creams of other manufacturers, the effect of the exclusivity clause in practice is to restrict the commercial freedom of retailers to choose the products they wish to sell in their sales outlets.

99. However, HB submits that, if the court were to conclude that the exclusivity clause operates as a de facto tie in regard to the sales outlets, the degree of foreclosure resulting from its distribution agreements is no more than 6% of the entirety of sales outlets on the relevant market and does not lead to an appreciable restriction of competition on that market. It therefore a considers that the Commission's finding that 40% of sales outlets of the relevant market are in fact foreclosed is manifestly erroneous. HB says that this percentage is too high, in particular because it includes three categories of sales outlets which cannot be regarded as foreclosed (see para 46, above). It states in that regard that, in order to calculate the degree of foreclosure of the relevant market, account should be taken only of sales outlets where retailers wish to change their ice cream supplier but are unable to do so.

b 100. Those arguments must be rejected.

101. Contrary to HB's submission (see paras 46, 47, above), in the 6% of sales outlets with more than one HB freezer cabinet (and which therefore have space to install more than one cabinet) the retailers are not likely to replace an HB cabinet unless they take the view that this replacement and the sale of another brand of ice cream will enable them to obtain at least the same turnover as that which they previously achieved with HB ice creams. It is apparent from the file that in reality retailers only very rarely opt to replace one of the freezer cabinets supplied by HB with their own cabinet or with one belonging to another manufacturer, particularly because of the position and popularity of HB on the relevant market.

102. The court considers that the 6% of sales outlets in question together with the 27% of sales outlets which have an HB freezer cabinet, and in which the retailers are allegedly not interested in stocking a brand of ice cream other than HB (according to the analysis made by HB of the Lansdowne survey data), must not be excluded when calculating the degree of foreclosure of the relevant market. Owing to the operation of the exclusivity clause, those retailers are faced with a situation which distorts their business options. In the light particularly of HB's position on the relevant market, the fact that none of its competitors has a range of products as well known or complete as its own, and the space constraints already referred to in para 87, above, the ability of the retailers concerned to sell products of other manufacturers, especially where those manufacturers have a limited range of products, is in general an insufficient inducement to replace HB freezer cabinets or to install another cabinet (see, by analogy, the Langnese-Iglo case (para 108)).

103. With regard to the third category of sales outlets, namely those in which retailers are allegedly interested in stocking other brands of ice cream and are able to do so but have not done so, their number varies between 2% and 5%—according to the figures submitted by HB and based on the analysis of the Lansdowne survey. Even though this category was not clearly defined by HB, it still represents only a tiny part of the 40% total and is not such as to invalidate the Commission's finding in the contested decision that the identified part of HB's network of agreements involved around 40% of all sales outlets on the relevant market.

104. Furthermore, with regard to the two latter categories of sales outlets, the court also observes that the figures presented by HB based on its analysis of the Lansdowne survey are not such as to vitiate the Commission's assessment of the degree of foreclosure of the relevant market. In the absence of any indication on the part of HB of the reasons for which, first, 27% of the sales outlets in question are not interested in stocking a brand of ice cream other than HB and, second, 2–5% of the sales outlets in question which are interested in stocking other brands nevertheless do not take the steps necessary to do so, the court considers that it is entirely possible that the circumstances are attributable to the factors identified by the Commission (see in particular recitals (157) to (184) of the contested decision) which reinforce the restrictions on competition in the relevant market resulting from the exclusivity clause and in fact create commercial dependence of retailers on HB. a

105. As to HB's argument alleging that the freezer cabinet exclusivity imposed by the exclusivity clause cannot be regarded as an outlet exclusivity because the retailers have the option of terminating their distribution agreements with HB at any time, the court considers that this possibility in no way precludes the effective enforcement of the agreements in question during the period in which that option is not used. Consequently, in assessing the effects of the distribution agreements on the relevant market, the court must take their actual duration into consideration (see, by analogy, the Langnese-Iglo case (para 111)). HB rightly submits that, unlike the situation in other member states, where the exclusivity clause is combined with a contractual obligation of several months or even several years, the situation in the present case, as the Commission acknowledges, offers retailers the possibility of terminating the exclusivity clause on very short notice, or even immediately. Such an argument might be convincing if that option were exercised in practice and if outlets were thus to become regularly available to new entrants on the relevant market. However, as the Commission has shown, that is not the case, because HB's distribution agreements are terminated on average every eight years. It follows that the argument to the effect that it is possible to terminate the HB distribution agreements is unsound, since the possibility of so doing does not in fact operate to reduce the degree of foreclosure of the relevant market. b

106. As regards HB's argument relating to application of the rule of reason in the present case, the court would point out that the existence of such a rule in Community competition law is not accepted. An interpretation of art 85(1) of the Treaty, such as suggested by HB, is moreover difficult to reconcile with the structure of the rules prescribed by art 85. e

107. Article 85 of the Treaty expressly provides, in its third paragraph, for the exemption of agreements that restrict competition where they satisfy a number of conditions, in particular where they are indispensable to the attainment of certain objectives and do not afford undertakings the possibility of eliminating competition in respect of a substantial part of the products in question. It is only within the specific framework of that provision that the pro and anti-competitive aspects of a restriction may be weighed (see, to that effect, the Pronuptia case (para 24), Matra SA v EC Commission Case C-225/91 [1993] ECR I-3203 (para 48) and European Night Services Ltd (ENS) v European Commission Joined cases T-374/94, T-375/94, T-384/94 and T-388/94 [1998] ECR II-3141 (para 136)). Article 85(3) of the Treaty would lose much of its effectiveness if such an examination had already to be carried out under art 85(1) of the Treaty (see, to that effect, Montecatini SpA v European Commission Case C-235/92 P [1999] ECR I-4539 (para 133), Montedipe SpA v EC Commission Case T-14/89 [1992] ECR II-1155 (para 265), Tréfilunion SA v European Commission Case T-148/89 [1995] ECR II-1063 (para 109) and also Métropole Télévision (M6) v European Commission Case T-112/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 1, [2001] ECR II-2459 (paras 72–74)). f

108. Furthermore, it cannot be inferred with certainty from the sole fact that the identified part of the HB network of agreements involved around 40% of all sales outlets in the market, that that part is automatically capable of preventing, restricting or distorting competition appreciably. That implies, as HB contended at the hearing, that 60%, therefore a majority, of sales outlets in the relevant market are not foreclosed as a result of the exclusivity clause. i

- a 109. When assessing the effects of such a network of distribution agreements, it is necessary to have regard to the economic and legal context in which it operates and in which it might combine with others so as to have a cumulative effect on competition (see Delimitis’ case (para 14) and the Langnese-Iglo case (para 100)).
- b 110. In the present case, the Commission took into consideration in the contested decision the effects on competition not only of HB’s distribution agreements but also of the various networks of agreements relating to freezer cabinets that were subject to an exclusivity clause, operated by other suppliers on the relevant market. According to the contested decision, 55% of sales outlets possessed only one or two HB freezer cabinets, 14% had one HB cabinet and a Mars cabinet, 7% had an HB cabinet and a cabinet from a manufacturer other than Mars (recital (108)). The Commission also observed that the exclusivity condition applicable to freezer cabinets in 83% of the sales outlets on the relevant market (see paras 18, 86, above) constituted a significant practical and financial obstacle to market entry and to the expansion of other suppliers (see recitals (185) to (194)).
- c 111. The court finds that, given that suppliers other than HB also make freezer cabinets available to retailers under very similar conditions (see in particular para 85, above) and with the same constraints in terms of space, the Commission rightly held in the contested decision that the difficulties encountered in the outlets equipped only with HB freezer cabinets, in persuading retailers to replace the existing HB cabinet or to install additional freezer cabinets for impulse ice creams, apply also to any freezer cabinet subject to a condition of exclusivity, even if the other suppliers do not have the same position and same popularity as HB on the relevant market. Competing suppliers are in effect prevented from gaining access to the relevant market by a series of factors including the burden which the purchase and maintenance of a freezer cabinet represents for retailers, their aversion to risk and their reluctance to sever established relations with their suppliers. It follows that the networks of agreements in place on the relevant market affect 83% of outlets in that market.
- d 112. However, the extent of tying-in brought about by networks of agreements, although of some importance in assessing the partitioning of the market, is only one factor amongst others pertaining to the economic and legal context in which the network of agreements must be assessed (see Delimitis’ case (paras 19, 20) and the Langnese-Iglo case (para 101)). It is also necessary to analyse the market conditions and in particular the real and specific opportunities for new competitors to penetrate that market notwithstanding the existence of those networks.
- e 113. The court also finds that the Commission rightly held in the contested decision that the provision to retailers of freezer cabinets subject to a condition of exclusivity and the running maintenance costs of those freezers represent a financial barrier to the entry of new suppliers on the relevant market and to the expansion of existing suppliers. The court finds that there is no objective link between the supply of freezer cabinets subject to a condition of exclusivity and the sale of ice creams. It is apparent from the contested decision that retailers are not inclined to accept freezer cabinets from suppliers who do not offer terms that are at least as advantageous as those offered by the suppliers of the cabinets already in place in the outlets concerned, or those offered by suppliers to that market in general. In the context of the relevant market, that means that the supplier must be ready to offer a freezer cabinet ‘without
- g
- h
- i

charge' and to service it. It follows that, in accordance with the Commission's findings in the contested decision (see in particular recital (189)), the expense involved in acquiring a stock of freezer cabinets for installation in outlets which will ensure that the supplier's products can achieve viable distribution levels, renders it very difficult to enter the relevant market, particularly for small companies and the suppliers of impulse ice creams which occupy quite specific niches, because it is difficult to justify the investment in freezer cabinets from suppliers who offer a smaller range of products. Moreover, HB's argument, set out in para 59, above, that it is viable for 47% of outlets to have a freezer owned by the retailer, must be rejected because, given the practice not only of HB but also of other suppliers of making freezers available 'without charge' to retailers, the latter have no reason to buy their own freezer. a

114. The court also finds that HB has not proved to the requisite legal standard that it is impractical to impose a separate rental in respect of the supply of freezers (see para 50, above). It is apparent from the contested decision that in Northern Ireland HB charges retailers an annual rent for the loan of its freezer cabinets and applies a price reduction to products which it supplies to retailers with their own cabinets (see recital (127)). It follows that, having regard to the fact that it is possible to charge a separate rent for the supply of freezers in another geographic market, it cannot be regarded as necessary to have an exclusivity clause in order for a given supplier to prevent his competitors from using his freezers to stock their products. For the same reason, it cannot be claimed that HB would be obliged, without remuneration, to carry on its balance sheet freezer cabinets for use not only in its business but also in the business of its retail customers and competitors (see paras 49, 50, above). b

115. Furthermore, although it is not disputed that the provision to retailers of freezer cabinets presents certain economic and practical advantages for suppliers of ice creams and for retailers, the court holds that, when the supply of freezer cabinets to retailers is the subject of an exclusivity clause, the economic advantages of that practice are, in the conditions prevailing in the relevant market, counterbalanced by its negative effects on competition. It follows that the court cannot accept the argument, put forward by HB in its pleadings, to the effect that this practice should be criticised only if there were no objective commercial justification for it. c

116. In addition, it is apparent from the file that the fact that independent wholesale of impulse ice cream is undeveloped in Ireland means that access to distribution via such independent intermediaries is rendered more difficult. Furthermore, the strength of existing brands in the relevant market and customer loyalty towards them amount to a formidable obstacle to new entrants (see recital (195) of the contested decision). d

117. As to HB's argument that the relevant market is disputed by at least five manufacturers, it is apparent from the file that the other suppliers of impulse ice creams hold only very small market shares. During the period June/July 1997, Mars, HB's biggest competitor on the market, had a market share of merely 4-5% in volume and in value. Furthermore, the market share held by Mars, Valley and Leadmore fell during the years preceding the adoption of the contested decision (see recitals (32) to (37)). The court therefore holds that the weak market shares held by HB's competitors are, at least in part, attributable to HB's practice of making freezer cabinets available without charge. e

118. In the light of all the foregoing, the court finds that it is clear from an examination of the entirety of the similar distribution agreements concluded f

a on the relevant market, and other evidence of the economic and legal context of which those agreements form part, that the distribution agreements concluded by HB are liable to have an appreciable effect on competition for the purposes of art 85(1) of the Treaty and contribute significantly to a foreclosure of the market.

b 119. The first and second pleas, alleging manifest errors of assessment of the facts and infringement of art 85(1) of the Treaty are accordingly rejected.

THE THIRD PLEA: ERRORS IN LAW IN APPLYING ART 85(3) OF THE TREATY

Arguments of the parties

c 120. HB claims that the exclusivity clause falls within the scope of art 85(3) of the Treaty and may be the subject of an exemption. It disputes the Commission's assertion in the contested decision that the restrictive effects of such agreements outweigh the advantages flowing from the distribution efficiency produced by them. Likewise it disputes that those advantages accrue solely to it and its retailers and are not, in the light of a broader public interest, of such a character as to compensate for the disadvantages which those d agreements have for competition. Finally, HB disputes the findings in recital (234) of the contested decision that the advantage of total territorial coverage resulting from the exclusivity clause cannot outweigh the disadvantages of the foreclosure of the market caused by HB's network of freezer cabinet agreements.

e 121. HB claims more specifically that the contested decision is vitiated by three fundamental errors of law in relation to art 85(3).

f 122. First, it submits that the contested decision contains a fundamental logical flaw with regard to the relationship between art 85(1) and (3) of the Treaty. It states that according to the contested decision, art 85(3) of the Treaty requires a balancing exercise between restriction of competition and availability of benefits of a type to justify exemption (see recitals (222) to (225)). According to the contested decision, by competing too effectively in providing benefits to retailers and consumers, HB restricts competition contrary to art 85(1) of the Treaty (see recital (226)). Given that the benefits in question allegedly produce a restriction of competition under art 85(1), those benefits cannot be taken into account for the grant of an exemption under g art 85(3) of the Treaty. The Commission's argument is therefore circular.

h 123. Second, according to HB, the various conditions for the application of art 85(3) of the Treaty are cumulative, in the sense that each of the criteria must be satisfied before an exemption can issue. However, the question whether the criteria are satisfied must be the subject of a separate examination in respect of each of them. The Commission cannot contend that the benefits i produced by the HB freezer cabinet agreements are de facto negated by the restrictive effects of those agreements; the question of a substantial elimination of competition must be addressed separately from the question of the benefits arising from the agreements. The court made the need for separate analysis clear in para 122 of its judgment in the Matra Hachette case. HB observes that the Commission considers that improvement of distribution at retail level in terms of reduced costs of transport and regular supply, distribution efficiencies at supply level in planning and logistics terms, and stimulation of demand by maximisation of product availability and visibility can be ignored because of alleged negative implications for competition in the relevant market. Contrary to what is alleged by the Commission (see para 130, below), once objective advantages arising from an agreement have been identified, the question of foreclosure is relevant only to the test of a substantial elimination of competition under art 85(3) of the Treaty. Paragraph 180 of the judgment in the Langnese-Iglo case, cited by the Commission, is not inconsistent with HB's arguments in that regard (see again para 130, below). a

124. Third, HB submits that the Commission erred in its examination under art 85(3) of the Treaty in relying on the fact that the relevant market is foreclosed. The true measure of foreclosure in that market is no more than 6%. b

125. HB also submits that the detailed application by the Commission of some of the criteria in art 85(3) of the Treaty also constitutes an error of law. It observes that the contested decision (see recital (227)) acknowledges that the wider availability of freezer cabinets in retail outlets covering the entire geographic market and brought about largely by HB's freezer cabinet network can be considered an objective advantage, particularly in the distribution of products, and that the exclusivity clause contributes to the attainment of that advantage. The Commission seeks, however, to negate the advantage by asserting that it can be assumed that HB, in the interest of profit maximisation, will continue to supply cabinets even on a non-exclusive basis. The Commission is not, however, entitled to presume that HB will continue to supply cabinets in the absence of an exclusivity clause. Moreover, HB submits that the Commission, contrary to its statements in recitals (232) and (233) of the contested decision, cannot assume that there are competing suppliers who can manufacture a range of products comparable to HB's, and as cost-effectively as HB, so as to be able profitably to distribute those products to sales outlets with a turnover that is too low to interest it and to retailers who, if they should cease to be supplied with ice cream by HB, would be able to provide their own cabinets. Similarly, it submits that there is no evidence that an independent dealer could provide a distribution service more cheaply and cost-effectively than HB or that the emergence of a new entrepreneurial type of independent wholesaler is precluded by reason only of HB's form of freezer cabinet agreement. c

126. HB submits that, in the context of distribution, 'indispensable' does not mean that there is no other way of distributing the products, but only that the restrictions are necessary to achieve the particular marketing strategy adopted by the manufacturer which brings benefits under art 85(3) of the Treaty. It submits that if outlet exclusivity can be regarded as indispensable to realisation of those benefits, as the block exemptions for exclusive distribution and exclusive purchasing agreements clearly recognise, the same must be true of the exclusivity clauses in respect of freezer cabinets. g

127. HB adds that if the exclusivity clause were to be held unlawful, that would clearly adversely affect its situation and its distribution arrangements. First, it would suffer a competitive disadvantage in that a third party competitor would be able to use HB's assets without making its own investment in cabinet provision in the outlets concerned but at the same time exclude HB from any cabinets that it provides. Second, it would not be possible to make the same full product offering of HB products in the cabinet, thereby resulting in lost sales. Inasmuch as costs of cabinet provision and maintenance are recouped through sales of HB ice cream, those costs would be pro tanto unrecovered. Third, there would be an increase in the costs of distribution of ice cream to the outlets concerned by the contested decision and to other outlets. h

128. HB submits that its distribution system has benefits for consumers, in accordance with art 85(3) of the Treaty. Otherwise the Commission would not previously have been satisfied that an exemption was justified at the time when a it issued the notice under art 19(3) of Regulation 17/62 (see para 12, above) stating that an exemption was justified. Indeed, much of the logic of the block exemption under Commission Regulation (EEC) 1984/83 (on the application of art 85(3) of the Treaty to categories of exclusive purchasing agreements) (OJ 1983 L173 p 5) would also be removed.

b 129. HB adds that its distribution agreements do not afford the possibility of eliminating competition in respect of a substantial part of the products in question, since, even on the Commission's view, 60% of the market is not foreclosed. It also observes that the reference in recital (245) of the contested decision to the fact that it is a long time since a substantial change in the competitive structure of the relevant market has occurred is wrong on the facts, inasmuch as it ignores new market entry by large and sophisticated suppliers like Mars, Nestlé and Häagen-Dazs.

c 130. The Commission submits that the contested decision is not vitiated by a fundamental logical flaw. An exemption can be given only after the restrictive effects of an agreement are balanced against the benefits which it produces. Those benefits cannot be identified with all the advantages which the parties obtain from the agreement. It also submits that the contested decision examines separately each of the criteria under art 85(3) of the Treaty. It points out that in the contested decision it found that HB's agreements did not satisfy those criteria because they did not contribute to an improvement in the distribution of goods, did not allow consumers a fair share of the benefit of that system, were not indispensable to attain the benefits claimed and left HB the possibility of eliminating competition in respect of a substantial part of the products in question. The Commission, referring more specifically to para 180 of the judgment in the Langnese-Iglo case, and to para 142 of the judgment in the Schöller case, submits that its analysis of the first of the four criteria set out in art 85(3) of the Treaty is not vitiated by an error of law.

f 131. According to the Commission, HB's application focuses on only one of the four criteria which have to be satisfied in order to obtain an exemption, namely an improvement in the distribution of goods or the promotion of technical or economic progress, and does not deal with the other criteria in detail. Furthermore, HB has not shown how the benefits resulting from its distribution system, if there are any, are the result of the exclusivity clause and not of other factors.

g 132. The Commission submits that all the requirements in art 85(3) must be satisfied simultaneously. It also submits that HB has not disputed, nor even called into question, the findings in recitals (239) and (240) of the contested decision that the exclusivity clause reduces the choices available to consumers and does not guarantee that any savings in efficiency are passed on to them.

h The Commission contests HB's assertion that the exclusivity clause could benefit from an exemption by analogy with the block exemptions for exclusive distribution and exclusive purchasing. It states that the balance between the restrictions and the benefits—of which the notion of indispensability is an important part—is different in the case of impulse ice cream. While, for many products, vertical restraints on the freedom of retailers can be accepted because they stimulate interbrand competition, such interbrand competition is less likely for impulse products, because customers do not in general enter a shop with the intention of buying those products and do not seek to compare the products of one sales outlet with those of another. Moreover, the benefits of the block exemptions in question could be lost if there was insufficient competition in the goods in question. That occurred in the Langnese-Iglo case.

In addition, the fact that HB might suffer detriment if it abandoned a particular business practice does not mean that the practice is indispensable. a

133. With regard to the criterion in art 85(3) of the Treaty relating to the possibility of eliminating competition, the Commission states that HB has not commented on recitals (242) to (246) of the contested decision concerning the lack of competition on the relevant market and the barriers to entry facing any new entrant. The Commission states that HB merely disputes its argument that it is a long time since any substantial change in the competitive structure on the relevant market has occurred (recital (245) of the contested decision). The Commission reaffirms that the relevant market in fact continues to be dominated, at a level of 80%, by HB. b

134. The Commission submits that HB's argument, set out in para 128, above, is incorrect and constitutes a new plea in law which was not raised in the application and is therefore inadmissible under art 48(2) of the Rules of Procedure. c

Findings of the court

135. It is settled case law that the review carried out by the court of the complex economic assessments undertaken by the Commission in the exercise of the discretion conferred on it by art 85(3) of the Treaty in relation to each of the four conditions laid down therein, must be limited to ascertaining whether the procedural rules have been complied with, whether proper reasons have been provided, whether the facts have been accurately stated and whether there has been any manifest error of appraisal or misuse of powers (see, to that effect, Groupement des Cartes Bancaires CB v European Commission Joined cases T-39/92 and T-40/92 [1994] II-49 (para 109), the Matra Hachette case (para 104) and Vereniging van Samenwerkende Prijsregelende Organisaties in de Bouwnijverheid v European Commission Case T-29/92 R [1995] ECR II-289 (para 288)) (the SPO case). It is not for the Court of First Instance to substitute its own assessment for that of the Commission. d

136. It is also settled law that, where an exemption is being applied for under art 85(3) of the Treaty, it is for the undertakings concerned in the first place to present to the Commission the evidence intended to establish that the agreement fulfils the conditions laid down by that provision (see, to that effect, Vereniging ter Bevordering van het Vlaamse Boekwezen (VBVB) v EC Commission Joined cases 43/82 and 63/82 [1984] ECR 19 (para 52), Remia BV v EC Commission Case 42/84 [1985] ECR 2545 (para 45) and the Langnese-Iglo case (para 179)). e

137. The grant by the Commission of an individual exemption decision presupposes that the agreement or the decision of an association of undertakings satisfies all the four conditions laid down by art 85(3) of the Treaty. If one of those four conditions is not satisfied, the exemption must be refused (see, to that effect, the VBVB case (para 61); order of the Court of Justice of 25 March 1996 in Vereniging van Samenwerkende Prijsregelende Organisaties in de Bouwnijverheid v European Commission Case C-137/95 P [1996] ECR I-1611 (para 34), the Matra Hachette case (para 104) and the SPO case (paras 267, 286)). f

138. The court finds that, contrary to HB's submission in para 123, above, it is clear from the contested decision that the Commission carried out a detailed analysis of the HB distribution agreement in the light of each of the four conditions laid down by art 85(3) of the Treaty (see recitals (221) to (254) of the contested decision). g a 139. As regards the first of those conditions, the agreements capable of being exempted are those which contribute 'to improving the production or distribution of goods or to promoting technical or economic progress'. The court would point out in that regard that it is settled law of the Court of Justice and of the Court of First Instance that the improvement cannot be identified with all the advantages which the parties obtain from the agreement in their

b production or distribution activities. The improvement must in particular display appreciable objective advantages of such a character as to compensate for the disadvantages which they cause in the field of competition (see Établissements Consten SARL v EEC Commission Joined cases 56/64 and 58/64 [1966] ECR 299 at 348 and the Langnese-Iglo case (para 180)).

c 140. The first condition is examined in recitals (222) to (238) of the contested decision. The Commission acknowledged in particular that the agreements whereby freezer cabinets are made available might secure some or all of the benefits described in the fifth recital to Regulation 1984/83 for HB itself and for the retailers who are the other parties to the agreements, and that the distribution method currently used by HB might offer it and its retailers certain d advantages in terms of efficiency of planning, organisation and distribution. Therefore, the Commission held that those arrangements did not present appreciable objective advantages of such a character as to compensate for the disadvantages caused to competition. In support of that assertion, it pointed out that the freezer cabinet agreements in question considerably strengthened HB's position in the relevant market, especially vis-à-vis potential competitors.
e It rightly observed in that regard that the strengthening of an undertaking which is as important on the market as HB leads not to more but to less competition because the network of that undertaking's agreements constitutes a major barrier to the entry of others into the market, as well as to expansion within the market by its existing competitors (see in particular recitals (225) and (236) of the contested decision, and, by analogy, the Langnese-Iglo case (para 182)). It must also be pointed out that the level of foreclosure of the relevant market is in the order of 40% (see para 98, above) and not 6% as HB submits (see para 124, above).

141. Consequently, the court finds that, contrary to HB's contention (see para 123, above), the Commission rightly took into consideration the barriers to entry to the relevant market resulting from the exclusivity clause, and the consequent weakening of competition, when it assessed HB's distribution
g agreement in the light of the first condition laid down by art 85(3) of the Treaty (see, by analogy, the Consten case (at 348), and the Langnese-Iglo case (para 180)). It follows that the court cannot accept HB's argument set out in para 122, above to the effect that recitals (222) to (225) of the contested decision
h contain a fundamental logical flaw with regard to the relationship between art 85(1) and (3) of the Treaty, as the Commission was obliged, pursuant to settled case law on the subject, to ascertain whether there were objective advantages of such a character as to compensate for the disadvantages which an agreement creates for competition.

i 142. The court also notes that HB's distribution agreements have two particular aspects, namely, first, they make freezer cabinets available 'without charge' to retailers and, second, the retailers undertake to use those cabinets to stock HB ice creams only. The benefits ensured by the agreements in question are the result of the first aspect and can therefore be achieved even without the exclusivity clause.

143. The court also accepts the Commission's argument in recital (227) of the contested decision that although the wide availability in outlets of freezer cabinets intended for the sale of impulse ice creams, covering the entire geographic market and consisting mainly of HB's cabinets, could be considered an objective advantage in the distribution of those products in the public interest, it is nevertheless unlikely that HB would definitely cease to supply freezer cabinets to retailers, whatever the conditions, except in a small number of cases, if its power to impose an obligation of exclusivity in respect of those freezers were to be restricted. HB has not shown that the Commission committed a manifest error in taking the view that business reality for a company such as HB, which wishes to maintain its position on the relevant market, is to be present in the maximum number of outlets possible (see recital (228) and para 125, above). Contrary to HB's submission, the Commission did not merely assume continuity of provision by HB of freezer cabinets on the relevant market, but carried out a prospective analysis of the operation of the market after the adoption of the contested decision. Furthermore, contrary to HB's argument (see para 125, above), the Commission could validly rely on the argument that manufacturers competing with HB might adopt a policy of supplying freezer cabinets to sales outlets whose turnover in impulse ice creams is too low to be of interest to HB, and do so upon more advantageous conditions than those which the retailers might expect to obtain themselves if HB ceased to supply freezer cabinets to certain sales outlets. Similarly, the Commission could validly point to the possibility that cabinets would be installed by independent resellers who would obtain supplies from various sources and satisfy demand from all the sales outlets from which HB had withdrawn its equipment or to which it decided not to supply equipment. HB cannot claim that the Commission's prospective analysis is vitiated by a manifest error of assessment unless it does so on the basis of concrete evidence, which HB has failed to adduce in the present case.

144. As HB's distribution agreements do not satisfy the first of the conditions laid down by art 85(3) of the Treaty, the third plea must therefore be rejected and it is not necessary to consider whether the Commission committed a manifest error in regard to its assessment of the other conditions laid down by that provision. If any one of the four conditions is not satisfied, the exemption must be refused.

THE FOURTH PLEA: ERRORS OF LAW IN THE APPLICATION OF ART 86 OF THE TREATY

Arguments of the parties

145. In its application HB does not contest the findings in the contested decision as to the existence of a dominant position, but only the finding that there was an abuse of that position (see recital (263)), and in particular the fact that it induces retailers to grant it exclusivity by supplying freezer cabinets to them and maintaining them at no direct charge to the retailer.

146. However, at the hearing and in its observations on the statement in intervention of Mars, HB claimed that it did not hold a dominant position. It argued that if, as the Court of Justice has held, a dominant position is defined by the capacity to retain market shares over a period of time 'without those having much smaller market shares being able to meet rapidly the demand from those who would like to break away from the undertaking which has the largest market share' (see Hoffmann-La Roche & Co AG v EC Commission Case 85/76 [1979] ECR 461 (para 41)), it manifestly does not have such a position. It a observes that several other suppliers, in particular multinational undertakings such as Nestlé and Mars, have capacity which is largely sufficient to supply its retail customers if they wished to break away from HB.

147. HB submits that it is odd to classify as an abuse a practice which is widely employed, which the Commission does not argue has the object of restricting competition, and which is accepted as conferring benefits on the parties to the agreement.

b 148. HB contests the Commission's argument that the exclusivity clause interferes with retailers' freedom to choose suppliers on the basis of the merits of the products which they offer. Furthermore, that finding directly conflicts with recital (259) of the contested decision, which expressly recognises that a large majority of retailers choose to sell HB products and many of them exclusively so. HB adds that many of the retailers concerned would not stock ice cream at all if the freezer were not supplied to them. The supply of ice creams to small retailers and the provision of freezer cabinets improve HB's overall efficiency and increase competition. HB submits that the approach of Advocate General Jacobs in his opinion in Oscar Bronner GmbH & Co KG v Mediaprint Zeitungs- und Zeitschriftenverlag GmbH & Co KG Case C-7/97 [1998] ECR I-7791 (particularly in paras 57, 65), is also applicable to the exclusivity clause. Provision of cabinets on exclusive terms is an aspect of competition in the relevant market. HB observes that its cabinets are not an 'essential facility', since there are no material constraints preventing HB's competitors from installing cabinets in retail outlets wishing to stock alternative brands of impulse ice cream.

e 149. HB also submits that the Commission's position on market foreclosure is unsustainable under art 86 of the Treaty, because in all the cases in which vertical exclusivity has been held to be an abuse the Court of Justice or the Court of First Instance has expressly or implicitly applied a threshold or a de minimis test of market foreclosure (see the Hoffmann-La Roche case, AKZO Chemie BV v EC Commission Case C-62/86 [1991] ECR I-3359 and the Michelin case, BPB Industries plc v EC Commission Case T-65/89 [1993] ECR II-389). HB submits that, as the percentage of outlets with the potential for foreclosure by reason of HB cabinet provision is no more than 6%, the materiality threshold for an abuse alleged to consist of market foreclosure through the use of an exclusivity clause has not been achieved.

g 150. In its reply, HB observes that the Commission's analyses under arts 85(1) and 86 are inextricably linked to such a degree that the Commission is guilty of the 'recycling' of its art 85 case to form an art 86 case, in the manner criticised by the court in Società Italiana Vetro SpA v EC Commission Joined cases T-68/89, T-77/89 and 78/89 [1992] ECR II-1403 (para 360), hereinafter the Flat Glass case.

h 151. The Commission, supported by the interveners, points out that the concept of an abuse is an objective one (see the Hoffmann-La Roche case). Thus, the 'strengthening of the position of a dominant undertaking may be an abuse and prohibited under Article 86 of the Treaty regardless of the means and procedure by which it is achieved' (see Europemballage Corp v EC Commission Case 6/72 [1973] ECR 215 (para 27)). As to HB's argument alleging that the exclusivity clause cannot constitute an abuse as it is a common practice, the Commission submits that even a common practice in the industry may be an abuse of a dominant position. It adds that HB cannot rely on the fact that the situation arises because of the free choice of retailers. HB has induced them to enter into agreements containing an exclusivity clause, and this constitutes the abuse. a

152. The exclusivity clause constitutes a barrier to market entry and to the expansion of the relevant market and strengthens the power of the incumbent supplier on the market. Any competition by existing or potential suppliers is thereby minimised. Retailers are prevented from exercising their freedom of choice with regard to the products that they wish to stock and to the optimisation of space at the sales outlets. Moreover, consumer choice is reduced. The Commission submits that HB's practice of tying the cost of the freezer cabinet to an exclusivity clause when there is no objective link between them is at variance with conditions of normal competition for consumable items. Furthermore, the sales outlets in question represent 40% of all sales outlets on the market and not 6% as HB submits. Lastly, the Commission contends that HB has not defined the status or source of its 'materiality threshold' or explained why an abuse on such a scale cannot fall under art 86. b

153. The Commission also submits that the analysis which it carried out under art 85 of the Treaty is separate from its analysis under art 86 of the Treaty, so that HB cannot find support in the Flat Glass case. It states that in that judgment the court held that the Commission had 'recycled' the facts constituting an infringement of art 85 and had deduced from them, without carrying out any market survey, that the parties jointly held a substantial share of the market, that by virtue of that fact alone they held a collective dominant position, and that their unlawful behaviour constituted an abuse of that position. d

Findings of the court

154. It is settled case law that very large market shares are in themselves, and save in exceptional circumstances, evidence of the existence of a dominant position. An undertaking which has a very large market share and holds it for some time, by means of the volume of production and the scale of the supply which it stands for—without holders of much smaller market shares being able to meet rapidly the demand from those who would like to break away from the undertaking which has the largest market share—is by virtue of that share in a position of strength which makes it an unavoidable trading partner and which, because of this alone, secures for it, at the very least during relatively long periods, that freedom of action which is the special feature of a dominant position (see the Hoffman-La Roche case (para 41) and Amministrazione Autonoma dei Monopoli di Stato (AAMS) v European Commission Case T-139/98 [2001] ECR II-3413 (para 51)). Moreover, a dominant position is a position of economic strength enjoyed by an undertaking which enables it to prevent effective competition being maintained on the relevant market by giving it the power to behave to an appreciable extent independently of its competitors, customers and ultimately of its consumers (see United Brands Co v EC Commission Case 27/76 [1978] ECR 207 (para 65) and the AAMS case (para 51)). f
g

155. The court notes, first, that the contested decision defines the relevant market as the market for single wrapped items of impulse ice cream in Ireland (recitals (138) and (140) of the contested decision) and that HB does not dispute that definition. HB, whilst not challenging the Commission's assertion in recitals (28) and (259) of the contested decision that its share, in volume and in value, of the relevant market exceeds 75% and that it has retained that share over several years, submits that it does not hold a dominant position on that i a market. When the contested decision was adopted, HB's share of the relevant market was 89% (see para 90, above). It must also be pointed out that the other suppliers of impulse ice cream present on that market, such as Mars and Nestlé, have very small market shares (see recitals (32) and (34) of the contested decision), despite the fact that they are major players on the neighbouring markets for confectionery and chocolate and sell those products in the same outlets as those in question in the present case. Furthermore, Mars and Nestlé have well-known brands for their products and the experience and financial capacity to enter new markets. HB therefore not only has an extremely large share of the relevant market but there is a considerable gap between its market share and those of its immediate competitors.

c 156. Moreover, it is clear from the documents before the court that HB has the most extensive and most popular range of products on the relevant market, that it is the sole supplier of impulse ice creams in approximately 40% of outlets in the relevant market, that it is part of the multinational Unilever group which has been producing and marketing ice creams for many years in all the member states and many other countries, in which undertakings in the group are very often the major supplier in their respective market, and that the HB brand is very well-known. The court therefore finds that the Commission correctly held that HB is an unavoidable partner for many retailers on the relevant market and that it has a dominant position on that market.

e 157. It is necessary, next, to ascertain whether the Commission was correct to conclude in the contested decision that HB had abused its dominant position on the relevant market. It is settled case law that the concept of abuse is an objective concept relating to the behaviour of an undertaking in a dominant position which is such as to influence the structure of the market where, as a result of the very presence of the undertaking in question, the degree of competition is weakened and which, through recourse to methods different from those which condition normal competition in products or services on the basis of the transactions of commercial operators, has the effect of hindering the maintenance of the degree of competition still existing in the market or the growth of that competition (see the Hoffman-La Roche case (para 91) and the AKZO case (para 69)). It follows that art 86 of the Treaty prohibits a dominant undertaking from eliminating a competitor and from strengthening its position by recourse to means other than those based on competition on the merits. The prohibition laid down in that provision is also justified by the concern not to cause harm to consumers (see, to that effect, the Europemballage case (para 26) and Coöperatieve vereniging Suiker Unie UA v EC Commission Joined cases 40–48/73, 50/73, 54–56/73, 111/73 and 113–114/73 [1975] ECR 1663
f
h (paras 526, 527)).

i 158. Consequently, although a finding that an undertaking has a dominant position is not in itself a recrimination, it means that, irrespective of the reasons for which it has such a dominant position, the undertaking concerned has a special responsibility not to allow its conduct to impair genuine undistorted competition on the common market (see the Michelin case (para 57)).

159. The court finds, as a preliminary point, that HB rightly submits that the provision of freezer cabinets on a condition of exclusivity constitutes a standard practice on the relevant market (see para 85, above). In the normal situation of a competitive market, those agreements are concluded in the interests of the two parties and cannot be prohibited as a matter of principle.

However, those considerations, which are applicable in the normal situation of a competitive market, cannot be accepted without reservation in the case of a market on which, precisely because of the dominant position held by one of the traders, competition is already restricted. Business conduct which contributes to an improvement in production or distribution of goods and which has a beneficial effect on competition in a balanced market may restrict such competition where it is engaged in by an undertaking which has a dominant position on the relevant market. With regard to the nature of the exclusivity clause, the court finds that the Commission rightly held in the contested decision that HB was abusing its dominant position on the relevant market by inducing retailers who, for the purpose of stocking impulse ice cream, did not have their own freezer cabinet, or a cabinet made available by an ice cream supplier other than HB, to accept agreements for the provision of cabinets subject to a condition of exclusivity. That infringement of art 86 takes the form, in this case, of an offer to supply freezer cabinets to the retailers and to maintain the cabinets free of any direct charge to the retailers.

160. The fact that an undertaking in a dominant position on a market ties de facto—even at their own request—40% of outlets in the relevant market by an exclusivity clause which in reality creates outlet exclusivity constitutes an abuse of a dominant position within the meaning of art 86 of the Treaty. The exclusivity clause has the effect of preventing the retailers concerned from selling other brands of ice cream (or of reducing the opportunity for them to do so), even though there is a demand for such brands, and of preventing competing manufacturers from gaining access to the relevant market. It follows that HB's contention, set out in para 149, above, that the percentage of outlets potentially likely to be inaccessible owing to the provision of freezer cabinets does not exceed 6%, is incorrect and must be rejected.

161. Furthermore, HB's reference to the opinion of Advocate General Jacobs in the judgment in the Bronner case, is irrelevant in the present case because, as the Commission correctly submits in its pleadings, it did not claim in the contested decision that HB's freezer cabinets were an 'essential facility', which is the issue examined in his opinion, and it is not necessary for HB to transfer an asset or to conclude contracts with persons which it has not selected in complying with the contested decision.

162. In addition, the court must reject HB's argument relating to the recycling of the file (see para 150, above). Unlike the conduct criticised in the Flat Glass case, the Commission did not merely 'recycle' facts constituting an infringement of art 85(1) of the Treaty in order to find that the conduct in question also infringed art 86 of the Treaty. In the present case, the Commission analysed the relevant market at length in the contested decision and concluded that HB had a dominant position on that market. The Commission then correctly concluded that by inducing retailers to obtain supplies exclusively from HB under the conditions referred to in paras 159 and 160, above, HB had recourse to methods different from those which condition normal competition in consumer products.

163. The fourth plea must therefore be rejected.

THE FIFTH PLEA: ERRORS OF LAW RELATING TO RESPECT FOR RIGHTS TO PROPERTY AND INFRINGEMENT OF ART 222 OF THE TREATY

Arguments of the parties

164. HB submits that the application of the competition rules in the contested decision constitutes an unjustified and disproportionate infringement

a of its rights to property, as recognised in art 222 of the Treaty. It accepts that the right to property is not absolute but says that any restriction on that right must not constitute a disproportionate and intolerable interference with the rights of the owner (see Hauer v Land Rheinland-Pfalz Case 44/79 [1979] ECR 3727). The result of the prohibition of the exclusivity clause is to permit freezer cabinets paid for and maintained by HB to be used for the stocking of ice
b creams supplied by third parties and that seriously affects its property rights in the cabinets and more generally its economic interests. HB submits that, contrary to the Commission's statement in recital (219) of the contested decision, its property rights could not be appropriately protected by the levying of a separate rental fee for the freezer cabinet. It observes that the management c and levying of a rental fee would involve substantial operating costs and that rental would not compensate for the economic dysfunctions which would be caused to its distribution system by the stocking of third-party ice creams in its cabinets. Moreover, it would be placed at a manifest disadvantage in comparison with its competitors, who could continue to make freezer cabinets available without charge.

d 165. HB also contests the Commission's claim (see recital (213) of the contested decision) that, as HB has placed the cabinets in retail outlets, any contractual restriction that HB imposes on the use of the cabinet can be subject to the competition rules. It submits that, in the intellectual property field, it is recognised that matters going to the essence of a property owner's rights include not only the rights to licence (see Allen & Hanburys Ltd v Generics
e (UK) Ltd Case 434/85 [1988] 2 All ER 454, [1988] ECR 1245 (para 11)), to refuse third parties the grant of licences (see AB Volvo v Erik Veng (UK) Ltd Case 238/87 [1988] ECR 6211 (para 8)), to prevent infringements of rights (see Collins v Imtrat Handelsgesellschaft mbH Case C-92/92, Patricia Im- und Export Verwaltungsgesellschaft mbH v EMI Electrola GmbH Case C-326/92 [1993] ECR I-1545), but also particular provisions of a licence agreement (see paras 75, 79, f 85, 86, 90 and 100 of Commission Decision (EEC) 83/400 (relating to a proceeding under art 85 of the EEC Treaty (IV/29.395—Windsurfing International)), OJ 1983 L229 p 1). The exclusivity clause is qualitatively comparable to the types of clauses authorised in licences of intellectual property rights.

g 166. HB observes that the economic value of its network of freezer cabinets lies in its having a necessary facility available at the outlets for storage and sale of its ice creams, in particular in outlets which, without the provision of a freezer cabinet, could not sell ice creams, as they would be unable to invest in their own cabinets. Therefore, HB's rights to control the freezer cabinets, and the fact that it insists on the exclusivity attached to them, goes to the substance h or essence of its rights (see Société Alsacienne et Lorraine de telecommunications et d'électronique (Alsatel) v SA Novasam Case 247/86 [1988] ECR 5987).

i 167. The Commission, supported by the interveners, contends that there has been no impairment of HB's property rights. It states that HB has already given up some of its rights over the freezer cabinets to the retailers in return for payment. HB thus remains owner but has conferred certain rights on those retailers. Consequently, HB's claim that its property rights have been 'confiscated' is purely rhetorical. It is the retailers who pay for the cabinet provision, the cost of which is included in the cost of the ice cream.

168. Furthermore, the Commission submits that if the retailers are authorised to use HB freezer cabinets to sell other brands of ice cream, they would not be free-riding in that respect, because HB could recover the cost of its investment in several ways, and in particular by requiring payment of a separate fee for the rental of the freezer. It disputes HB's claim that it would be difficult to collect such a fee, as HB already invoices retailers for supplies of ice cream. It states that HB has not proved that a separate system of rental would introduce economic dysfunctions into its distribution network. Moreover, the Commission submits that HB is not placed at a disadvantage in comparison with its competitors if they continue to make freezer cabinets available to retailers without charge, because if the cost of ice cream and the cost of the freezer cabinet are separated, the result should be financially neutral for retailers who continue to buy HB ice cream and stock it in freezers supplied by HB.

169. The Commission states that the analogy drawn by HB between its property rights and the field of intellectual property is erroneous, as the owners of intellectual property rights obtain certain protection to enable them to recoup the investment they have made in the products in question. According to the Commission, the public interest in competition must be balanced against the public interest in the development of new medicines or other useful results which benefit society as a whole, as well as manufacturers. The public interest in ice cream is different. In any event, even if HB's situation were covered by the intellectual property rules, the cases cited by it in para 165, above demonstrate that the owner of an intellectual property right is not entirely immune from the competition rules in the way he sells his products.

Findings of the court

170. It is settled case law that, although the right to property forms part of the general principles of Community law, it is not an absolute right but must be viewed in relation to its social function. Consequently, its exercise may be restricted, provided that those restrictions in fact correspond to objectives of general interest pursued by the Community and do not constitute a disproportionate and intolerable interference, impairing the very substance of the rights guaranteed (see Hauer's case (para 23), Hermann Schröder HS Kraftfutter GmbH & Co KG v Hauptzollamt Gronau Case 265/87 [1989] ECR 2237 (para 15), Germany v EU Council Case C-280/93 [1994] ECR I-4973 (para 78)). Article 3(g) of the EC Treaty (now, after amendment, art 3(1)(g) EC) provides that in order to achieve the aims of the Community, its activities are to include 'a system ensuring that competition in the internal market is not distorted'. It follows that the application of arts 85 and 86 of the Treaty constitutes one of the aspects of public interest in the Community (see, to that effect, the opinion of Advocate General Cosmas in Masterfoods Ltd v HB Ice Cream Ltd Case C-344/98 [2001] All ER (EC) 130 at 133, [2000] ECR I-11369 at 11371). Consequently, pursuant to those articles, restrictions may be applied on the exercise of the right to property, provided that they are not disproportionate and do not affect the substance of that right.

171. The property right at issue in the present case concerns HB's network of freezer cabinets and its right to exploit them commercially. The contested decision in no way affects HB's ownership of its assets, but merely regulates, in the public interest, one particular manner of exploiting them, in the same way as, for example, the legislature in many member states intervenes in order to protect a tenant. The contested decision does not deprive HB of its rights of property in its stock of freezer cabinets or prevent it from exploiting those assets by renting them out on commercial terms. It provides merely that if HB decides to exploit them by making them available 'without charge' to retailers,

- a it may not do so on the basis of an exclusivity clause so long as it holds a dominant position on the relevant market. It follows that the Commission correctly held in the contested decision that the exclusivity clause infringes arts 85(1) and 86 of the Treaty in outlets which have only freezer cabinets supplied by HB for the stocking of impulse ice creams and do not have a freezer cabinet of their own or one provided by another manufacturer.
- b It rightly rejected the request for an exemption, pursuant to art 85(3) of the Treaty, which HB had submitted in respect of the exclusivity clause. It then simply gave HB formal notice to cease those infringements immediately and to refrain from taking any measure having the same object or effect. The contested decision does not, therefore, contain any undue limitation on the exercise of HB's right to property in its freezer cabinets.

- c 172. Moreover, in the light of its findings in para 114, above, the court must reject HB's argument, set out in para 164, above, based on the disadvantages linked to the imposition of a separate fee for the freezer cabinets. As regards HB's argument, set out in para 164, above, that it is disadvantaged in comparison with its competitors, who would be able to continue to make
- d freezer cabinets available to retailers without charge, the court points out that the HB distribution agreements, unlike those of its competitors, contribute significantly to the foreclosure of the relevant market. In addition, as HB has a dominant position on that market, it has, irrespective of the reasons for such a position, a special responsibility not to allow its conduct to impair genuine undistorted competition on the common market (see the Michelin case
- e (para 57) and para 158, above).

173. Consequently, the fifth plea must also be rejected.

THE SIXTH PLEA: INFRINGEMENT OF ART 190 OF THE TREATY

f Arguments of the parties

174. HB submits that the contested decision infringes art 190 of the Treaty in at least four respects. First, the definition of 'foreclosure' of the market used by the Commission evolved between the 1993 statement of objections and that issued in 1997. HB adds that the Commission altered its view in regard to HB during that same period. Second, the fact that the Commission did not apply
- g the reasoning followed in the Langnese-Iglo case relating to the application of art 85(1) of the Treaty to the exclusivity clause means that the contested decision is inadequately reasoned. Third, HB submits that the inferences which the Commission draws from the facts of the present case are not well founded as a matter of logic and thus the decision is vitiated by an inadequate statement
- h of reasons. Fourth, the fact that the Commission failed to explain why HB freezer cabinet exclusivity is not indispensable to attainment of the benefits arising from the HB agreements making those cabinets available, for the purposes of art 85(3) of the Treaty, when it had recognised both in the 1993 statement of objections and in its 1995 notice (see para 12, above) that such exclusivity could merit an exemption, is a defect of reasoning which vitiates the
- i contested decision.

175. The Commission, supported by the interveners, observes, first, that under art 190 of the Treaty it is required to state the reasons which led to the decision actually adopted, not the reasons which at an earlier stage might or might not have led it to adopt a different decision. Second, it submits that it has not significantly altered its analysis since 1993. In any event, it is entitled to alter its position in the light of new facts. It took into account the judgments in the Langnese-Iglo case and the Schöller case, which were delivered after the 1993 statement of objections. a

Findings of the court

176. According to settled case law, the extent of the obligation to state reasons depends on the nature of the measure in question and on the context in which it was adopted. The statement of reasons must disclose in a clear and unequivocal fashion the reasoning of the institution, in such a way as to give the persons concerned sufficient information to enable them to ascertain whether the decision is well founded or vitiated by a defect which may permit its legality to be contested, and to enable the Community judicature to carry out its review of the legality of the measure (see Stichting Certificatie Kraanverhuurbedrijf (SCK) v European Commission Joined cases T-213/95 and T-18/96 [1997] ECR II-1739 (para 226) and Stork Amsterdam BV v European Commission Case T-241/97 [2000] ECR II-309 (para 73)). It is not necessary for the reasoning to go into all the relevant facts and points of law, since the question whether the statement of reasons meets the requirements of art 190 of the Treaty must be assessed with regard not only to its wording but also to its context and to all the legal rules governing the matter in question (see, in particular, Netherlands v EC Commission Joined cases 296/82 and 318/82 [1985] ECR 809 (para 19), Société française de Biscuits Delacre v EC Commission Case C-350/88 [1990] ECR I-395 (paras 15, 16) and Belgium v European Commission Case C-56/93 [1996] ECR I-723 (para 86)). b
d

177. The court finds, first, that in its second and third arguments set out in para 174, above, HB fails to draw the necessary distinction between the requirement for a statement of reasons and the substantive legality of the contested decision. Under cover of its allegation that the statement of reasons is inadequate, it complains that the Commission erred in law and made a manifest error in its assessment of the facts. HB is not criticising a failure to state reasons but rather the correctness of the decision. It follows that those arguments must be rejected in the context of this plea. e
f

178. With regard to HB's first and fourth arguments, the court finds that the Commission explained, in particular in recitals (7) and (247) of the contested decision, that it revised its initial favourable view, contained in its statement of 15 August 1995, because the amendments proposed by HB to its distribution system had not brought about the expected results in terms of free access to sales outlets. In so doing, the Commission gave sufficient reasons in law for its decision to depart from its initial position. Moreover, it is clear from recital (241) of the contested decision that the Commission considered that HB had not shown that the alleged advantages brought about by the distribution agreements, leading to a general improvement of production and distribution for the benefit, inter alia, of consumers, could not be secured equally effectively by removing the exclusivity in favour of HB's products and thus the tie between the provision of freezer cabinets and the supply of ice creams. As recital (247) makes clear, it is for this reason in particular, that the agreements in question could not benefit from an exemption under art 85(3) of the Treaty. g

179. It follows that the plea alleging infringement of the obligation to state reasons under art 190 of the Treaty is unfounded.

a THE SEVENTH PLEA: FAILURE TO RESPECT FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES OF COMMUNITY LAW

180. HB submits that the Commission, in departing from the terms of its 1995 notice (see para 12, above), infringed the principle of the protection of legitimate expectations, there being no 'overriding public interest'. The circumstances surrounding the 'settlement' concluded in 1995 between HB and the Commission concerning changes to its distribution system and its implementation by HB were of such a nature as to create the legitimate expectation that the Commission, first, would adopt a favourable view in regard to its revised agreements concerning freezer cabinet exclusivity and, second, would not alter its previous position or reformulate its case with regard to the facts and law. HB adds that if business cannot trust the Commission to behave as agreed, the system of comfort letters and informal settlements of disputes will fall into disrepute.

181. HB submits that the Commission also infringed the principle of subsidiarity and its obligation of sincere co-operation with the national courts. It points out that identical proceedings were pending before the Irish courts and submits that there was no Community interest to justify the Commission's intervention, since the case concerned the supply by an Irish company to Irish consumers, through Irish retailers, of products specific to the Irish market.

182. HB also submits that the Commission infringed the principle of legal certainty in adopting the contested decision at a time when appeal proceedings, for which a hearing date had been fixed before the decision was taken, were pending before the Irish courts. Moreover, HB observes that the decision of the High Court was the complete opposite of the Commission's. Even though the Commission has a duty to take into account the interests of complainants, the Commission's notice on co-operation between national courts and the Commission in applying arts 85 and 86 of the Treaty (OJ 1993 C39 p 6) clearly indicates that—'there is not normally a sufficient Community interest in examining a case when the plaintiff is able to secure adequate protection of his rights before the national courts. In these circumstances the complaint will normally be filed.'

183. Furthermore, the contested decision infringes the principle of proportionality in that it deprives HB of the economic value of its freezer cabinets in such a way that it disproportionately affects its property rights. Similarly, it is disproportionate in that it invalidates all HB's agreements concerning the provision of freezer cabinets in the allegedly foreclosed part of the market, which is contrary to the judgment in the Langnese-Iglo case and Delimitis' case, which recognise that it is not necessary for all impediments to market access to be removed, provided that real possibilities for market penetration and expansion exist. Moreover, the contested decision infringes the principle of proportionality and is discriminatory in that it prohibits, not only for the past but also for the future, HB freezer cabinet exclusivity in relations with the relevant category of retailers. In the Langnese-Iglo case the court annulled the part of the Commission's decision prohibiting Langnese-Iglo from concluding exclusive purchasing agreements until after 31 December 1997, holding that it would be contrary to the principle of equal treatment to exclude for certain undertakings the benefits of a block exemption regulation as regards the future whilst other undertakings could continue to conclude exclusive purchasing agreements such as those prohibited by the decision. a

184. HB also argues that the contested decision is discriminatory in that it constitutes an arbitrary attack on HB's ability to compete on the basis adopted by all other companies carrying on business on the relevant market.

185. Lastly, HB submits that the arguments relied on in support of the pleas alleging infringement of art 190 of the Treaty equally support the plea of infringement of an essential procedural requirement. Furthermore, it asserts that the Commission, by refusing any dialogue in order to find a solution to the breakdown in the '1995 deal', fell short of accepted standards of proper administration and thereby infringed essential procedural requirements. b

186. The Commission, supported by the interveners, contends that it cannot have violated a legitimate expectation of HB by virtue of HB's failure to obtain an exemption under art 85(3) of the Treaty. HB did not receive 'precise assurances' to that effect and, in any event, legitimate expectations cannot be invoked where there has been a breach of Community law. c

187. The Commission submits that the notion of subsidiarity does not concern the question whether Community law is to be applied by national courts or by the Commission; that question has long since been settled. According to the Commission, HB's argument is based on the mistaken premiss that the Commission cannot sanction an infringement of arts 85 and 86 of the Treaty which has been brought to its attention if that infringement (which, by definition, requires an effect on trade between member states) produces effects only on the market of a member state. d

188. The Commission also contends that it did not infringe the principle of legal certainty by adopting the contested decision at a time when proceedings were pending before the Irish courts. It submits that it was entitled to adopt that decision for a number of reasons. First, HB had notified an agreement, seeking a negative clearance or an exemption. Only the Commission has the power to take a decision to grant an exemption under art 85(3) of the Treaty. Second, when the Commission adopted the contested decision, a number of actions were pending before national courts and competition authorities. It submits that it had a duty to take account of the interests of complainants and, therefore, was required to take a rapid decision once it had reached the conclusion that there had been a breach of arts 85(1) and 86 of the Treaty. According to HB, the Commission ought to have awaited the outcome of the appeal lodged before the Irish courts before adopting the contested decision. That would not have resolved the problem of legal certainty, but merely deferred the adoption of the contested decision. e

189. The Commission submits that the contested decision does not infringe the principle of proportionality. That decision does not abolish HB's rights of ownership over the freezers. The decision gives a specific example of how HB could recoup its investment in the freezers by lawful means. HB has not put forward any valid reason why it cannot administer a separate billing system for ice creams and freezers. HB claims that the contested decision invalidates all the agreements in question, but interprets the judgments in the Langnese-Iglo case and Delimitis' case as meaning that not all impediments to market access need be removed. However, the Commission submits that in its judgment in Delimitis' case the Court of Justice held that the agreements have to be taken as a whole and not subdivided. Furthermore, with regard to HB's argument that the contested decision prohibits the exclusivity clause not only for the past but f a also for the future, the Commission submits that the decision merely prevents HB from concluding new agreements with the same effect or the same object as the existing ones.

b 190. The Commission disputes HB's claim that it was treated unfairly and discriminated against. In the decision (recital (204)) the Commission took into account the effects produced by the other networks of agreements, but established that none of those other networks had contributed significantly to the foreclosure of the relevant market. The principle of equal treatment does not require those agreements to be forbidden where they have no significant restrictive effect.

c 191. Lastly, the Commission denies that it has infringed any essential procedural requirement.

Findings of the court

d 192. With regard to infringement of legitimate expectations, it is settled case law that the right to rely on the principle of the protection of legitimate expectations, which is one of the fundamental principles of the Community, extends to any individual who is in a situation in which it is apparent that the Community administration has led him to entertain reasonable expectations by giving him precise assurances (see, to that effect, Vlaamse Televisie Maatschappij NV v European Commission Case T-266/97 [1999] ECR II-2329 (para 71) and SA Louis Dreyfus & Cie v European Commission Joined cases T-485/93, T-491/93, T-494/93 and T-61/98 [2000] ECR II-3659 (para 85)).

e 193. The court finds, first, that the Commission did not give HB specific assurances as to the consequences of the commitments notified by the letter of 8 March 1995 (see para 12, above). Furthermore, it did not adopt a decision applying art 85(3) of the Treaty, a decision which it could in any event have revoked or amended pursuant to art 8(3) of Regulation 17/62 if there were a change in the facts that were basic to the making of the decision.

f 194. The notice of 15 August 1995 was issued expressly under art 19(3) of Regulation 17/62. In that notice, the Commission proposed—on a preliminary basis—to adopt a favourable attitude to HB's distribution agreements, as revised by HB, and invited all the interested third parties to submit their observations to it within a specified time. It follows that the notice in question merely indicated a preliminary position of the Commission, which was subject to change, in the light particularly of the observations of third parties. Consequently, HB could not have had a legitimate expectation that the Commission would grant it an exemption under art 85(3) of the Treaty in accordance with that notice, solely on the basis of publication of the notice.

g 195. As regards HB's argument that it acted irreversibly to its detriment in adopting changes to its distribution system on the basis of the Commission's 'proposal' to adopt a favourable position in regard to its distribution agreements, the court considers that, if HB could have had a legitimate expectation in regard to the notice in question, that expectation would have been confined to the procedure initiated by the Commission by its 1993 statement of objections and the objections raised in it relating to the HB distribution agreements at that date. However, in the present case, the Commission did not act on the basis of its 1993 statement of objections but, having found that the changes made by HB to its distribution system had not had the expected results in terms of freedom of access to sales outlets, it initiated a new procedure and raised new objections to that system in its 1997 statement of objections. Given that, even if the Commission had granted an exemption to HB, it would have had the power, and even the obligation, under art 8(3) of Regulation 17/62, to revoke or amend that exemption if it had found that the exempted agreements nevertheless had certain effects that were incompatible with the conditions laid down in art 85(3) of the Treaty, and particularly if experience had shown that the changes made by HB to its distribution system had not brought about the expected results, the court finds that the Commission, in adopting the 1997 statement of objections, did not infringe the principle of protection of legitimate expectations in the present case. a

196. It follows that this objection must be rejected.

197. As regards HB's claims that the principles of subsidiarity, sincere co-operation and legal certainty have been infringed, the court points out that, although arts 85(1) and 86 of the Treaty produce direct effects in relations between individuals and create direct rights in respect of the individuals concerned which the national courts must safeguard, that does not mean that the Commission has no right to adopt a position in a case, even though an identical or similar case is pending before one or more national courts, provided in particular that trade between member states is capable of being affected. Such an effect has not been called into question in the present case. c
d

198. In pointing to the fact that the present case concerns the supply by an Irish company to Irish consumers, through Irish retailers, of products that are specific to the Irish market and to the fact that when the contested decision was adopted parallel proceedings had been decided by the High Court or were pending before the Supreme Court, HB has not proved to the requisite legal standard that the Commission infringed those principles or its notice on co-operation between itself and national courts in the application of arts 85 and 86 of the Treaty. It is clear from the contested decision and the Commission's written pleadings that the application of a condition of exclusivity for freezer cabinets supplied to retailers is a contractual practice adopted by the majority of ice cream manufacturers in the Community. Furthermore, companies in the Unilever group play a significant role in the impulse ice cream market in several member states. It follows that the issues dealt with in the contested decision had a wider Community importance, in particular in light of the fact that various national courts and competition authorities were dealing with parallel cases raising similar issues to those in the present case (see, in particular, recitals (275) to (280) of the contested decision). In those circumstances, the adoption of the contested decision by the Commission was appropriate in order to ensure that the Community competition rules would be applied coherently to the various forms of exclusivity practised by ice cream manufacturers throughout the Community. e
g

199. Furthermore, as the Court of Justice held in its judgment in the Masterfoods case, the Commission has exclusive competence to adopt decisions in implementation of art 85(3) of the Treaty, pursuant to art 9(1) of Regulation 17/62. The Commission is also entitled to adopt, at any time, individual decisions applying arts 85 and 86 of the Treaty, even though it shares competence to apply arts 85(1) and 86 of the Treaty with the national courts, and even where an agreement or practice has already been the subject of a decision by a national court and the decision contemplated by the Commission conflicts with the national court's decision (see, to that effect, the Masterfoods case (paras 47, 48) and Delimitis' case (paras 44, 45)). Given that during the h a negotiations the Commission had received HB's application for an exemption as well as third-party complaints, HB's arguments relating to subsidiarity are unfounded.

200. The present objections must therefore be rejected.

b 201. As regards HB's assertions that the contested decision infringes the principle of proportionality and is discriminatory, the court finds that those allegations are unfounded. The principle of proportionality requires that the acts of the Community institutions do not exceed the limits that are appropriate and necessary in order to achieve the aim pursued (see Denkavit Nederland BV v Hoofdproduktschap voor Akkerbouwprodukten Case 15/83 [1984] ECR 2171 (para 25)). Moreover, discrimination is the different treatment of identical situations or the treatment of different situations identically.

c 202. First, in light of the court's assessment set out in paras 170–173, above, the court finds that the contested decision does not contain any undue or disproportionate limitation of HB's property rights in its freezer cabinets. Nor does it constitute an arbitrary or discriminatory impairment of HB's ability to compete with other suppliers on the basis adopted by all the other companies
d active on the relevant market, in the light especially of the overwhelming position which HB holds on that market and the significant contribution by HB, unlike the other suppliers, to the foreclosure of that market (see para 172, above).

e 203. Second, the fact that the contested decision invalidates the exclusivity clause in the agreements for the supply of freezer cabinets concluded between HB and retailers in Ireland that are applicable to cabinets installed in outlets equipped only with cabinets supplied by HB for the storage of single-wrapped impulse ice creams and which have neither their own freezer cabinet nor a cabinet from another ice cream manufacturer, does not mean that the decision is disproportionate.

f 204. A network of distribution agreements set up by a single supplier may escape the prohibition laid down in the competition rules provided that it does not significantly contribute, in conjunction with all the similar contracts found on the relevant market, including those of other suppliers, to denying access to the market to new national and foreign competitors (see, by analogy, Delimitis' case (paras 23, 24) and the Langnese-Iglo case (para 129)). That means that g where a network of similar agreements concluded by a single manufacturer exists, the assessment of the effects of that network on competition applies to the entire set of individual contracts constituting the network. The court finds, therefore, that the Commission correctly assessed the bundle of HB's distribution agreements as a whole and, in consequence, did not split the agreements, as HB alleges. It is clear from the judgment in Neste Markkinointi Oy v Yötuuli Ky Case C-214/99 [2001] All ER (EC) 76, [2000] ECR I-11121: see, in h particular, paras 36, 37) that it is only exceptionally, and in specific circumstances which are not present in this case, that the network of the same supplier may be subdivided.

i 205. Third, it is apparent from art 4 of the contested decision that the Commission required HB immediately to cease the infringements of arts 85(1) and 86 of the Treaty constituted by its network of distribution agreements and to refrain from taking any measure having the same object or effect. The court finds that this provision is not disproportionate or discriminatory, as it merely prohibits HB from reintroducing the exclusivity clause in the same circumstances as those referred to in arts 1 and 3 of the contested decision, and thereby guarantees the effectiveness of the contested decision, by preventing a return in the future to the anti-competitive practice found to exist (see, by analogy, the opinion of Advocate General Ruiz-Jarabo Colomer in Langnese-Iglo GmbH v European Commission (supported by Mars GmbH) Case C-279/95 P [1999] All ER (EC) 616, [1998] ECR I-5609 (para 39)).

206. It follows that this objection must be rejected.

207. Inasmuch as HB's objection relating to infringement of essential procedural requirements and an inadequate statement of reasons consists of a mere reference by it to its arguments set out in the context of the fifth plea, alleging infringement of art 190 of the Treaty, the court finds that that objection cannot be upheld in view of the assessment made by the court in paras 176–179, above. As to HB's argument relating to the need to extend the negotiations in order to find a solution to the breakdown in the '1995 settlement', the court also considers that the Commission has not infringed any essential procedural requirements. As the Commission found that the changes made by HB to its distribution system had not brought about the expected results in terms of freedom of access to sales outlets, it was not obliged to pursue the negotiations indefinitely, particularly when the case had extended over a lengthy period. The Commission was therefore entitled to initiate a new procedure and to raise new objections to that system in its 1997 statement of objections, leaving HB an opportunity to respond to it.

208. This objection must therefore be rejected.

209. Consequently, the seventh plea is unfounded.

210. It follows that the entire application must be dismissed.

COSTS

211. Under art 87(2) of the Rules of Procedure, the unsuccessful party is to be ordered to pay the costs if they have been applied for in the successful party's pleadings. As HB has been unsuccessful in its submissions and the Commission has asked for costs, HB must be ordered to bear its own costs and to pay the Commission's costs, including those relating to the interim proceedings.

212. Under the third subparagraph of art 87(4) of the Rules of Procedure, the court may order an intervener other than those mentioned in the preceding subparagraph of art 87(4) to bear its own costs. In the present case, Mars and Richmond, which intervened in support of the Commission, must bear their own costs.

On those grounds, the Court of First Instance (Fifth Chamber), hereby:

(1) Dismisses the application as unfounded;

(2) Orders Van den Bergh Foods Ltd to bear its own costs and to pay those of the Commission, including the costs of the interim proceedings;

(3) Orders Masterfoods Ltd and Richmond Frozen Confectionery Ltd to bear their own costs.

d By Finnish law, persons who were fully taxable in Finland were subject to income tax at the rate of 29% on dividends received from Finnish or foreign companies. Companies established in Finland were liable to corporation tax on their profits, also at the rate of 29%, and where such profits were distributed as dividends, a shareholder received, as well as the net amount of the dividend, a tax credit equal to 29/71ths of that amount which was set off against the income tax, in the same sum, to which he was subject. Adjustments were made if there was ultimately a difference between the amounts of the corporation tax and the tax credits, and the result of the process was that the total tax paid on distributed profits was 29%. There was no such tax credit in the case of dividends paid by companies established elsewhere. Consequently, when the claimant, who was fully taxable in Finland, received dividends from a Swedish company on which, by a tax agreement between the Nordic states, withholding tax at a maximum rate of 15% was levied, which in Finland was deducted from the 29% of the value of the dividends to which he was subject, the full amount of the corporation tax paid in Sweden was not taken into account. The claimant maintained that in those circumstances, and regard being had to arts 56 EC<sup>a</sup> and 58 EC<sup>b</sup> of the EC Treaty, he was not liable to Finnish tax on the Swedish dividends, and questions arising were referred by the Korkein hallinto-oikeus to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling. Article 56(1) EC provided that ‘all restrictions on the movement of capital between Member States ... shall be prohibited’. Article 58 EC provided that: ‘1. The provisions of Article 56 shall be without prejudice to the right of Member States: (a) to apply the relevant provisions of their tax law which distinguish between taxpayers who are not in the same situation with regard to ... the place where their capital is invested ... 3. The measures and procedures referred to in [para 1] shall not constitute a means of arbitrary discrimination or a disguised restriction on the free movement of capital ...’

shareholder), and the end result, in the case of Finnish companies, was that dividends were not taxed in the hands of the shareholder, but in the case of dividends received from companies outside Finland, the shareholders did have to pay income tax. While the Nordic states convention attenuated the effects of that double taxation in some degree, it did not eliminate it as it did not provide for the setting-off of corporation tax against the income tax. The result was both that Finnish taxpayers were deterred from investing their capital in companies in other member states, and that an obstacle was placed in the way of such companies raising capital in Finland: there was therefore a restriction on the free movement of capital that in principle was prohibited by art 56 EC. The question then was whether the restriction was justified (see judgment paras 20–24, below).

(2) Article 58(1)(a) EC, as a provision derogating from a fundamental freedom, was to be interpreted restrictively, and a distinction was to be made between unequal treatment which was permitted under art 58(1)(a) EC, and arbitrary discrimination prohibited by art 58(3) EC. To be permitted, the unequal treatment had either (1) to concern situations which were not objectively comparable or (2) to be justified by overriding reasons in the general interest such as the need to safeguard the cohesion of the tax system. With regard to (1), the Finnish shareholders were in a comparable situation with regard to Finnish dividends on the one hand and foreign ones on the other, as in both cases the dividends were—apart from the tax credit in the case of Finnish dividends—capable of being subject to double taxation, and in both cases distributed company profits were subject to corporation tax and then in principle to income tax in the hands of shareholders. The cohesion of the tax system argument could only succeed if a direct link was established between the tax advantage in question and the offsetting of that advantage by a particular tax deduction. Even if, arguably, there was such a direct link in the present case, it had further to be shown that the legislation was necessary in order to preserve the cohesion of the tax system, but that was not established in the present case, as the simple granting to a Finnish taxpayer who held shares in a Swedish company of a tax credit calculated by reference to the corporation tax owed by that company in Sweden both would not threaten the cohesion of the system and would be a measure less restrictive of the free movement of capital. Counter arguments based on practical difficulties and other considerations were not acceptable (see judgment paras 28, 29, 35, 42, 45, 46, 51–55, below); Staatssecretaris van Financiën v Verkooijen Case C-35/98 [2002] STC 654 (para 43) applied.

Accordingly, arts 56 and 58 EC precluded legislation whereby the entitlement of a person fully taxable in one member state to a tax credit in relation to dividends paid to him by limited companies was excluded where those companies were not established in that state.

Reference

The Korkein hallinto-oikeus (Supreme Administrative Court) referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities two questions relating to proceedings brought before the Supreme Administrative Court by Petri Manninen, who was challenging the compatibility of Finnish legislation on the taxation of dividends with arts 56 and 58 EC (formerly arts 73b and 73d of the EC Treaty). Observations were submitted on behalf of: Mr Manninen, by himself; the Finnish government, by E Bygglin and T Pynnä, acting as agents; the French government, by G de Bergues and D Petrausch, acting as agents; the United Kingdom government, by K Manji, acting as agent, assisted by M Hoskins, Barrister; and the Commission of the European Communities, by R Lyal and I Koskinen, acting as agents. The language of the case was Finnish. The facts are set out in the judgment. b

I—INTRODUCTION

1. This reference for a preliminary ruling from the Korkein Hallinto-Oikeus (Supreme Administrative Court) (Finland) relates to the Finnish regulations on the taxation of dividends. They provide that a shareholder of a domestic company receives, in addition to the dividend, a tax credit in proportion to the corporation tax paid by the undertaking. The tax credit is offset against tax on the dividend, so that in practice the shareholder has no further tax to pay on this capital-derived income. By contrast, a recipient of dividends from foreign companies cannot offset the corporation tax paid in the country where the company is established against his tax liability. e

2. Mr Manninen lives in Finland and is liable for income tax in Finland on dividends he received from a Swedish company. He considers that the Finnish legislation preventing him from offsetting the corporation tax paid in Sweden is incompatible with the free movement of capital. g

3. The idea underlying the Finnish legislation is to avoid the double taxation of corporate profits by the Finnish tax authorities (economic double taxation), which would occur if tax were charged on profits first in the form of corporation tax levied on the undertaking and then again in the form of income tax on the dividends. h

4. Many member states have or had comparable set-off or exemption schemes to prevent or attenuate such double taxation<sup>2</sup>. As in the present case, however, these schemes often apply only to purely domestic situations, as the

<sup>2</sup> In Communication COM(2003) 810 final of 19 December 2003 on the dividend taxation of individuals in the internal market, the Commission of the European Communities gives an up-to-date survey of the systems in the member states. See also the regime in the Netherlands, which was the subject of the judgment in Staatssecretaris van Financiën v Verkooijen Case C-35/98 [2002] STC 654, [2000] ECR I-4071, and the Austrian scheme, which was examined by Advocate General Tizzano in his opinion in Proceedings brought by Schmid Case C-516/99 [2002] ECR I-4573 (see also Lenz v Finanzlandesdirektion für Tirol Case C-315/02 (2004) Transcript (opinion), 25 March, (2004) Transcript (judgment), 15 July). i a member states consider it appropriate to offset corporation tax when taxing dividends only if the corporation tax has also been received by the national tax authorities<sup>3</sup>.

5. The court has already found, in particular in Verkooijen's judgment<sup>4</sup>, that an exemption from the income tax payable on dividends may not be made subject to the condition that the company paying those dividends has its seat in that member state. However, in none of the cases decided hitherto has the economic and legal link between corporation tax on the one hand and income tax on dividends on the other been as close as in the present case. For that reason, the question of justification on grounds of tax cohesion, which the court has recognised so far only in the judgments in Bachmann v Belgian State<sup>5</sup> and EC Commission v Belgium<sup>6</sup>, is again raised.

II—THE NATIONAL LEGISLATION ON CORPORATION TAX CREDITS

6. In Finland dividends received by fully taxable individuals are taxed at a rate of 29%. The rate of corporation tax that companies must pay on their profits is also 29%. In order to prevent the double taxation of profits distributed in the form of dividends, art 4 of the Law on Corporation Tax Credits grants the recipient of dividends a credit equal to 29/71 of the dividend. The tax credit and the cash dividend are added together and subjected to the tax on capital-derived income.

7. The effect of the tax credit is illustrated by the following hypothetical calculation. Assuming that a company's pre-tax profit is 100 cents per share, the undertaking deducts 29 cents from this as corporation tax. The remaining 71 cents are distributed in the form of a dividend. The corporation tax credit amounts to 29/71 of the dividend (71 cents), in other words 29 cents. The recipient of the dividend receives 71 cents per share in cash and 29 cents in the form of a corporation tax credit, in other words 100 cents in total. As the income tax on capital-derived income is 29% of these 100 cents, the tax amounts to 29 cents, which is offset against the credit for the same amount. After tax, the recipient of the dividend is therefore left with precisely the amount of the cash dividend of 71 cents. The taking into account of the corporation tax paid by the company therefore leads in practice to full settlement of the income tax liability on the capital-derived income.

8. There is a reciprocal effect between the corporation tax payable by the company and the corporation tax credit. If the corporation tax actually paid is less than 29/71 of the dividend, in other words less than the corporation tax credit, the company must make up the difference in the form of additional tax. This occurs if the distributed dividends exceed the company's after-tax profits.

9. If on the other hand the company has paid more corporation tax than the corporation tax credits granted to shareholders, the company retains the difference as a credit balance, which it can offset against corporation tax liabilities over the ensuing ten years.

10. However, under art 1(1) of the Law on Corporation Tax Credits, that Law applies only to the central and local taxation of dividends distributed by

i 3 The problems that this taxation practice causes for the internal market have been examined by the Commission since the 1960s (see Lupo 'Reliefs from Economic Double Taxation on EU Dividends: Impact of the Baars and Verkooijen Cases', in European Taxation (2000) p 270, 271). domestic share companies and of the fully taxable recipients of dividends from such companies. Under para 4, the provisions of this Law also apply to companies established in a member state of the European Economic Area whose shares giving rise to dividends are in fact linked to a fixed place of business which the company in question has in Finland. a

11. In Sweden dividends paid to domestic taxpayers are fully subject to income tax. A withholding tax is levied on recipients who are not resident in Sweden. Under a double taxation agreement concluded by the Nordic states, the state of payment may deduct a maximum of 15% withholding tax on dividends, which is set against the income tax payable in the recipient's country of residence. b

12. Continuing with the example given above, the tax works out as follows if a Swedish undertaking pays a dividend of 71 cents per share to a taxpayer resident in Finland. The Swedish tax authorities retain a withholding tax of (at most) 15%, in other words 10.65 cents. In Finland the recipient must deduct 29% income tax on 71 cents (20.59 cents), against which is set the 10.65 cents deducted at source. As a result, the dividend remaining after tax amounts to 50.41 cents. The corporation tax already paid in Sweden by the company is not taken into account. c

III—FACTS OF THE DISPUTE IN THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND THE QUESTIONS REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

13. In his application to the keskusverolautakunta (Central Tax Commission), Mr Manninen sought a preliminary ruling on the question whether he, as a person fully taxable in Finland, could be charged tax in Finland on dividends paid by the Swedish listed company Telia Ab (publ), having regard to arts 56 and 58 EC (formerly arts 73b and 73d of the EC Treaty). The keskusverolautakunta stated in its preliminary ruling that the dividends paid by Telia Ab (publ) were fully liable to income tax in Finland in the 2001 tax year and that there was no entitlement to a corporation tax credit. e

14. Mr Manninen appealed against the preliminary ruling to the Korkein Hallinto-Oikeus, which by order of 10 February 2002 submitted the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty):

'(1) Is Article 56 EC to be interpreted as precluding a corporation tax credit system like the Finnish one described above, in which the recipient of a dividend who is generally liable to tax in Finland is granted a corporation tax credit in respect of a dividend paid by a domestic share company, but not in respect of dividends he receives from a share company registered in Sweden? g

(2) If the answer to the first question is in the affirmative, may Article 58 EC be interpreted as meaning that the provisions of Article 56 EC are without prejudice to Finland's right to apply the relevant provisions of the Law on Corporation Tax Credits, since it is a condition for obtaining a corporation tax credit in Finland that the company distributing the dividend has paid the corresponding tax or supplementary tax in Finland, which does not take place with respect to a dividend paid from abroad, in which case taxation is not even carried out once?' h

IV—ARGUMENTS OF THE PARTIES

15. In the proceedings before the court Mr Manninen, the Finnish, French and United Kingdom governments and the Commission of the European a Communities submitted observations. Whereas Mr Manninen and the Commission consider the Finnish system of corporation tax credits to be incompatible with arts 56 and 58 EC, the governments unanimously take the opposite view.

b 16. According to Mr Manninen and the Commission, the free movement of capital is impeded because the way in which the regulations on corporation tax credits are couched is liable to deter investors from investing in another member state. As no corporation tax credit can be set against tax on dividends from abroad, such income is taxed more heavily than dividends from domestic companies. At the same time, they contend that the scheme makes it more difficult for companies with their seat in another member state to raise capital in Finland.

c 17. In their opinion, the regulations cannot be justified by reference to art 58 EC and the cohesion of the tax system. As the court has ruled in Verkooijen's judgment (paras 57, 58)<sup>7</sup>, it is not possible to plead the cohesion of the tax system where different taxpayers and different taxes are involved. The contested regulations relate on the one hand to the corporation tax payable by d the company and on the other to taxation of the income of the recipient of dividends.

18. The Commission considers that a system of corporation tax credits to prevent double taxation is permissible only if it is not discriminatory and is actually coherent. In its view, the Finnish regulations do not meet those criteria, as no corporation tax credit is granted in respect of investments
e abroad. Furthermore, taxpayers resident in another state receive no tax credit in respect of dividends from Finnish companies. It contends that the real purpose of the disputed regulations is to safeguard the revenues of the tax authorities.

f 19. Mr Manninen also maintains that the system would be coherent only if a corporation tax credit were also granted in respect of dividends from abroad. In his view, that this is possible is proved by a corresponding provision in the Irish-Finnish double taxation agreement, under which taxpayers resident in Ireland receiving dividends from Finnish companies are also granted a corporation tax credit up to certain limits.

g 20. The Finnish, French and United Kingdom governments cite the case law of the court, which permits differences in the treatment of taxpayers, provided that their situation is not the same<sup>8</sup>. In their view, the situation differs primarily in that in the case of undertakings in Finland complete identity between the tax credit granted to the recipient of dividends and the corporation tax actually paid by the company can be achieved by means of the additional tax. This is not possible in the case of foreign companies that are not subject to the h additional tax. For the French government the scheme is an expression of the principle of territoriality recognised by the court<sup>9</sup>.

21. In the opinion of the United Kingdom, French and Finnish governments it is also a coherent system. They contend that the regulations ensure that the same income is taxed only once in Finland. As the income of foreign companies is not taxed in Finland, the taxation of dividends paid by those companies to taxpayers in Finland does not lead to double taxation by the Finnish tax authorities. a

22. They assert that there is a direct link between taxation of the recipient of dividends and that of the company, as the granting of a corporation tax credit depends on the corresponding corporation tax having actually been paid. In that respect they consider that the contested scheme differs from the exemption scheme that was the subject of the dispute in Verkooijen's case. b

23. The offsetting of corporation tax paid abroad that Mr Manninen seeks would, in their view, run counter to the system, which rests precisely on the link between the tax credit and the corporation tax. In the case of companies with their seat abroad this link does not exist. c

24. The United Kingdom and French governments question whether art 58(1)(a) EC and the principle of tax coherence would be left with any scope at all if the Finnish system were deemed not to meet the requirements of these provisions. They concede that coherence is not achieved in the taxation of a single taxpayer, but contend that the regulations pursue the legitimate objective of avoiding double taxation. In the absence of Community-wide harmonisation, the court should not, in their opinion, interfere too deeply in the configuration of national tax systems by permitting only one particular form of corporation tax set-off or exemption. d

V—LEGAL ASSESSMENT

25. In its two questions, which must be examined together, the referring court essentially seeks to ascertain whether arrangements such as the contested Finnish regulations on corporation tax credits are compatible with the provisions on the free movement of capital, and especially with art 56 EC and paras (1)(a) and (3) of art 58 EC. e

26. As regards the applicability of the free movement of capital to national provisions on direct taxation, note has to be taken of consistent case law, according to which— f

[a]lthough, as Community law stands at present, direct taxation does not as such fall within the purview of the Community, the powers retained by the member states must nevertheless be exercised consistently with Community law.<sup>10</sup> g

Consequently, the Finnish legislature is obliged to respect the fundamental freedoms and especially the provisions on the free movement of capital.

A—Restriction of the free movement of capital

27. Article 56(1) EC prohibits all restrictions on the movement of capital between member states. Under Section III-A-2 of the Nomenclature in Annex I to Council Directive (EEC) 88/361 (for the implementation of art 67 of the Treaty)<sup>11</sup>, the acquisition by residents of foreign securities traded on a stock exchange is a process that falls within the scope of the free movement of capital, as the Commission has aptly stated. The Nomenclature can continue to h a be relied upon even after the introduction of arts 73b to 73d of the EC Treaty (now arts 56 to 58 EC) by the Maastricht Treaty<sup>12</sup>.

28. Any measure that makes the cross-border transfer of capital more difficult or less attractive and is thus liable to deter the investor constitutes a restriction on the free movement of capital<sup>13</sup>. In this respect the concept of a restriction of capital movements corresponds to the concept of a restriction b that the court has developed with regard to the other fundamental freedoms, especially the freedom of movement of goods<sup>14</sup>.

29. The contested national provisions do not, it is true, relate directly to the acquisition of shares but to the tax treatment of the income deriving from the investment. However, as the objective of the investment is mostly to earn c net income, regulations relating to the tax treatment of the income also affect the attractiveness of the capital investment itself.

30. The Finnish legislation treats dividends from foreign and domestic companies differently. A shareholder receiving a dividend from a domestic company is granted a corporation tax credit, which, when set against tax, effectively reduces the income tax to zero. Tax must be paid at a rate of 29% on d dividends from abroad, without it being possible to offset the corporation tax paid by the foreign company. Consequently, in the case of an investment abroad the undertaking's profits are subject to double taxation—albeit not by the same tax authorities—whereas this outcome is avoided by the granting of a corporation tax credit in the case of purely domestic investments.

31. It is true that the withholding tax already levied abroad is offset. This does e not, however, reduce the tax burden on the recipient of the dividend, who must continue to pay a total of 29% tax, partly in the form of a deduction at source in the country in which the company paying the dividend is established and the remaining part in the form of income tax in Finland.

32. The worse tax treatment of an investment in the shares of companies f established abroad makes such investment less attractive for the investor than the acquisition of the shares of domestic companies and thus impedes the movement of capital.

33. As it is disadvantageous from the tax point of view for individuals to acquire the shares of foreign companies, the raising of capital on the Finnish market is also hampered for foreign companies. This constitutes a further g restriction on the free movement of capital to the detriment of foreign share companies.

B—Justification for the restriction

1—Interpretation of art 58 EC

h 34. Article 58(1)(a) EC<sup>15</sup> permits the member states—

12 The Commission cites the opinion of Advocate General Tesouro in Criminal proceedings against Sanz de Lera Joined cases C-163/94, C-165/94 and C-250/94 [1995] ECR I-4821 (paras 9, 10).

13 To this effect, see the judgment in Proceedings brought by Trummer Case C-222/97 [1999] ECR I-1661 (para 26).

14 See the ground-laying judgments in Procureur du Roi v Dassonville Case 8/74 [1974] ECR 837 (para 5), Säger v Dennemeyer & Co Ltd Case C-76/90 [1991] ECR I-4221 (para 12) and Gebhard v Consiglio dell'Ordine degli Avvocati e Procuratori di Milano Case C-55/94 [1996] All ER (EC) 189, [1995] ECR I-4165 (para 37).

i 15 Pursuant to Declaration No 7 to the Maastricht Treaty, this provision applies only to national tax regulations in existence at the end of 1993. In the case of Finland the relevant date is therefore the date of accession. The applicable version of the Law on Corporation Tax Credits appears to date from 1998. From the observations submitted by the Finnish government at the proceedings, however, it transpires that the system of corporation tax credits was introduced as early as 1990.

‘to apply the relevant provisions of their tax law which distinguish between taxpayers who are not in the same situation with regard to their place of residence or with regard to the place where their capital is invested.’ a

35. The contested tax provisions treat taxpayers who have invested in domestic undertakings differently from taxpayers with equivalent investments in another member state. There is therefore differentiation according to the place where their capital is invested, which member states are in principle entitled to apply under art 58(1)(a) EC within the framework of their tax law. b

36. It may be true that the member states introduced art 73d(1)(a) of the EC Treaty (now art 58 EC) by means of the Maastricht Treaty in order to permit some member states to maintain their set-off schemes that differentiated according to the place of investment, as the United Kingdom government submitted in the oral procedure<sup>16</sup>. Since Verkooijen’s judgment, however, it has been firmly established that this provision does not give the member states carte blanche to apply every form of different treatment of taxpayers according to the place of investment under their national tax law. c

37. Rather, art 58(1)(a) EC must, as a derogation from the fundamental principle of free movement of capital, be interpreted strictly<sup>17</sup>. In addition, this provision must be read in conjunction with art 58(3) EC, which lays down that the measures and procedures referred to in para 1 may not constitute a means of arbitrary discrimination or a disguised restriction on the free movement of capital<sup>18</sup>. d

38. In Verkooijen’s judgment<sup>19</sup> the court also pointed out that the derogations from the free movement of capital provided for in art 58 EC had previously already been recognised in case law. The court has therefore treated art 58 EC as almost a codification of its previous case law<sup>20</sup>. Hence, the provision must also be interpreted in the light of the case law preceding its introduction<sup>21</sup>. e

39. Consequently, it must be held that restrictions on the free movement of capital in accordance with art 58(1)(a) EC are in turn limited by the principles laid down in art 58(3) EC and developed in case law. f

2—Comparability between the situation of domestic investment and that of investment abroad (Schumacker case law)

40. For different tax treatment of dividends according to the place of investment to be permissible, pursuant to art 58(3) EC, it must not constitute arbitrary discrimination or a disguised restriction. g

41. Arbitrary discrimination can be ruled out, because the different treatments relate to different situations. In the Schumacker judgment the court recognised that differences in treatment according to whether the taxpayer is h a resident in the state in question or in another member state do not constitute prohibited discrimination to the extent that residents and non-residents are not in a comparable situation<sup>22</sup>.

42. The principle of territoriality cited by the French government is ultimately linked with this finding. As expounded by the court in the Futura Participations judgment<sup>23</sup>, this principle states that where the taxation of non-residents is concerned only income and expenses arising in the taxing state are to be taken into account, whereas in the case of domestic taxpayers their worldwide income and expenses constitute the basis of assessment to tax. As the present case relates to an individual fully liable to tax, it cannot be deduced from the principle of territoriality that the offsetting of corporation tax paid abroad is precluded.

43. By analogy with the Schumacker case law, the governments involved contend that the situation differs according to whether a dividend is paid by a domestic company or by a foreign company.

44. It must be stated in this regard that there is no difference between the two situations at the outset. There is a risk of double taxation of an undertaking's profits, irrespective of whether the undertaking distributing the dividend has its seat in a different member state to that of the recipient of the dividend or in the same member state. In both cases the earnings are subject first to corporation tax and then, if distributed as a dividend, to income tax.

45. The only difference is that in one case the double taxation stems from taxation by one and the same state, whereas in the case of the cross-border payment of dividends tax is levied by two states. This difference is of no consequence, however, from the point of view of the investor or the undertaking.

46. The fact that taxpayers are resident in different states and that tax jurisdiction is therefore divided between two states only acquires particular significance if there is a wish to introduce schemes to avoid double taxation. The objective of such systems is to ensure that corporate profits are taxed once and only once. To achieve that end, the taxation of the two taxpayers must be co-ordinated. Since no Community harmonisation has taken place in the field of direct taxation and there is no double taxation agreement between Finland and Sweden to cater for this situation, such co-ordination is possible only if both taxpayers live in the same member state.

47. At this interim stage, it can be stated that as regards the avoidance of the double taxation of corporate earnings the situation differs according to whether a company liable to corporation tax and an individual liable to income tax because he receives dividends from that company reside in the same state or in different states.

48. It does not follow, however, that differences in treatment of all kinds would be permissible, for different situations may be treated differently only to the extent that is unavoidable because of the differences<sup>24</sup>.

<sup>24</sup> See the judgment in Gerritse v Finanzamt Neukölln-Nord Case C-234/01 [2004] STC 1307, [2003] ECR I-5933. In this ruling the court recognised that in the case of a partially taxable person, taxation at a uniform rate that takes no account of the person's level of income is permissible, because the situation of a non-resident (partially taxable) person differs from that of a resident taxpayer. However, it regarded the different treatment of business expenses as an infringement of Community law.

3—Cohesion of the tax system and the principle of proportionality

49. Moreover, for differences in tax treatment between purely domestic situations and cross-border situations that impede capital movements not to constitute arbitrary discrimination or a disguised restriction within the meaning of art 58(3) EC, they must be necessary on overriding grounds of the public interest. The scheme must comply with the principle of proportionality; in other words it must be appropriate for attaining an objective compatible with the EC Treaty, and be necessary and proportionate in the narrow sense of the term<sup>25</sup>.

(a) The concept of cohesion of the tax system

50. The Finnish and other governments consider that the regulations on corporation tax credits are justified by the need to ensure cohesion of the tax system.

51. This rather diffuse concept has become firmly established in case law and in the literature since the judgments in Bachmann's case<sup>26</sup> and EC Commission v Belgium<sup>27</sup>. In those decisions the court recognised in principle that maintenance of the cohesion of the tax system is an objective approved by Community law, on which the member states can rely to justify restrictions on the fundamental freedoms<sup>28</sup>. The concept generally means no more than avoiding double taxation<sup>29</sup> or ensuring that income is actually taxed, but only once<sup>30</sup> (the principle of only-once taxation). The aim of the Belgian scheme at issue at that time was to ensure that the income invested by a taxpayer in a pension policy was not subject to income tax first as earned income and later again upon payment of the pension.

52. An essential aspect is that the avoidance of double taxation also contributes to the neutrality of the tax system from the point of view of competition. One of the Finnish legislature's motives for introducing the law on corporation tax credits was to put the raising of own funds on an equal tax footing with financing by means of bank loans. Loan interest is also taxed only once, as revenue of the bank. The borrower, on the other hand, can offset the cost of taking out the loan against tax as a business expense.

53. In the wake of Bachmann's judgment, the cohesion of the tax system has been cited repeatedly as justification for restrictions on various fundamental freedoms. In an attempt to take account of the exceptional nature of this 25 See the judgments in European Commission v Belgium Case C-478/98 [2000] STC 830, [2000] ECR I-7587 (para 41) and in Sanz de Lera's case (para 23), cited in footnote 12, above. See also the opinion of Advocate General Mischo in X v Riksskatteverket Case C-436/00 [2004] STC 1271, [2002] ECR I-10829 (para 80) and the opinion of Advocate General Tizzano in Schmid's case (para 44), cited in footnote 2, above.

26 Cited in footnote 5, above.

27 Cited in footnote 6, above.

28 The Community legislature itself also pursues this objective (see the second recital of Council Directive (EC) 2003/123 (amending Council Directive (EEC) 90/435 on the common system of taxation applicable in the case of parent companies and subsidiaries of different member states) (OJ L7 2004 p 41): '... to exempt dividends and other profit distributions paid by subsidiary companies to their parent companies from withholding taxes and to eliminate double taxation of such income at the level of the parent company').

29 This consideration is also likely to have been the basis of the national regulations that were the subject of the judgments in Proceedings brought by Danner Case C-136/00 [2002] STC 1283, [2002] ECR I-8147 and Försäkringsaktiebolaget Skandia (publ) v Riksskatteverket Case C-422/01 [2003] All ER (EC) 831, [2003] ECR I-6817.

30 See the judgment in X's case, cited in footnote 25, above; the purpose of the Swedish scheme under examination in that case was to ensure that capital gains were actually taxed once.

a justification, the court narrowly limited the concept of tax cohesion in subsequent judgments. In consistent case law it has required that there be a direct link between the grant of a tax advantage and the offsetting of that advantage by a fiscal levy, both of which relate to the same tax<sup>31</sup>.

54. In the Bosal judgment the court then continues:

b 'Where there is no such direct link, because, for example, one is dealing with different taxes or the tax treatment of different taxpayers, the argument based on the coherence of the tax system cannot be relied upon.'<sup>32</sup>

55. It is unclear whether the criteria 'one and the same taxpayer' and 'the same tax' are binding and must both be met, or whether they are only indicators—albeit strong ones—of the existence of a direct link between a tax advantage and disadvantage.

56. If the first interpretation were preferred, it would not be possible for Finland to argue from start to finish on the basis of the cohesion of the tax system. It is true that corporation tax and income tax could be seen as essentially similar taxes, as they are both levied on current income, in contrast to wealth tax, for example<sup>33</sup>. The criterion of the same taxpayer is not met, however. As the court has already made clear in Verkooijen's judgment, the levying of corporation tax on the company on the one hand and income tax on the recipient of dividends on the other are separate taxation exercises involving different taxpayers<sup>34</sup>.

e 57. The merit of this narrow understanding of the concept of tax cohesion is that it is particularly suited to the objective of a restrictive authorisation of exceptions to the free movement of capital. On the other hand, strict adherence to the criterion of the same taxpayer may have arbitrary consequences in some circumstances, as is evident in a situation such as the present.

f 58. In principle, the double taxation of corporate profits can be avoided in a number of ways. The corporation tax can be fully offset when taxing the dividend (as with the Finnish model for domestic dividends) or the dividend can be exempted from income tax. In that case the one and only taxation occurs entirely at company level. However, the opposite is also conceivable, namely that only the undertaking's retained profits are subjected to corporation tax. Then the shareholder receives his dividend from untaxed income; it is taxed for the first time when he is assessed for income tax<sup>35</sup>.

59. Finally, taxes can be levied partly on the undertaking and partly on the recipient of the dividend, as under the half income tax method or what the

h

31 See Verkooijen's judgment (para 57), cited in footnote 2, above, and the judgment in Bosal Holding BV v Staatssecretaris van Financiën Case C-168/01 [2003] All ER (EC) 959, [2003] ECR I-9409 (para 29).

32 The Bosal judgment (para 30), which refers to the judgment in Baars v Inspecteur der Belastingdienst Particulieren/Ondernemingen Gorinchem Case C-251/98 (2000) 2 ITLR 660, [2000] ECR I-2787 (para 40).

i 33 In the Baars judgment one of the reasons for rejecting justification on the grounds of tax cohesion was that two different types of tax were involved, namely wealth tax and corporation tax.

34 See Verkooijen's judgment (para 58), cited in footnote 2, above.

35 With this model, however, the state will levy a withholding tax to ensure that dividends going abroad do not escape taxation. A system of this kind exists (or existed) in Greece (see Terra and Wattel, cited in footnote 16, above, 4.2.3.2, p 166 et seq).

Commission terms schedular systems<sup>36</sup>. In the dispute in the main proceedings, in fact, only part of Mr Manninen's dividend is taxed in Finland; the other part consists of withholding tax retained by the undertaking in Sweden at the time of distribution. a

60. These examples show that it is relatively unimportant who is ultimately credited with the once-only tax payment—the undertaking or the shareholder—at least as long as the same tax rates are applied at both levels. In the case of the Finnish set-off model, one could also take the view, as does the referring court, that the undertaking ultimately pays a kind of advance dividend tax on behalf of the shareholder, in so far as it deducts corporation tax on corporate earnings that are subsequently distributed as dividends. b

61. These considerations suggest that, exceptionally, a link justifying the tax cohesion argument may exist if a charge on one taxpayer is offset by a relief for another. The preconditions for this are that: c

—the tax is levied, if not on the same taxpayer then at least on the same income or the same economic process, and —the legal configuration of the system ensures that the advantage accrues to the one taxpayer only if the disadvantage to the other is real and in the same amount. d

62. The application of these criteria is just as effective as the criterion of the same taxpayer in ensuring that justification on the grounds of cohesion of the tax system does not run out of control. For example, it would also have been impossible to regard the national schemes at issue in Verkooijen's case<sup>37</sup> and Svensson's case<sup>38</sup> as coherent systems on the basis of the above-mentioned conditions. e

63. In Verkooijen's case there was no guarantee that the dividend would be exempt from income tax only if the undertaking distributing it actually paid corporation tax in the same amount. Under the Luxembourg scheme, to which the Svensson judgment related, the criterion of the same economic relationship or the same income would not have been met. Under these schemes taxpayers in Luxembourg received an interest rate subsidy for home loans obtained from domestic banks. The limitation to domestic banks was explained by the fact that only such banks were liable to taxation in Luxembourg. f

64. The contested Finnish legislation meets the conditions set out in para 61, above. They relate to the same income—namely the income of the company, which in essence is passed to the person liable to income tax in the form of a dividend—and ensure that the advantage (the setting-off of corporation tax against the tax liability) is granted only if the disadvantage (the payment of corporation tax) has actually occurred. The provisions regarding the additional tax also ensure that the amount of the corporation tax credit matches that of the tax deducted by the company. g

65. Hence, the argument based on cohesion of the tax system does not fail by reason of the fact that the present case relates to two taxpayers: the company and the recipient of the dividend. h

- a (b) The cohesion of the tax system as a legitimate objective in the context of justification for the unequal treatment of domestic and foreign situations

66. It is debatable how far the cohesion of the tax system can be relied upon in real terms as an objective compatible with the EC Treaty if the system treats domestic and cross-border situations differently. If the EC Treaty required that cohesion may not be established solely at national level and that cross-border situations must also be catered for as far as possible, the objective of the Finnish regulations would not comply with Community law.

- b 67. The disputed Finnish provisions on corporation tax credits are not applied if the company distributing the dividend is established abroad. Hence the scheme merely precludes the double taxation of purely domestic income but accepts the same effects on investments abroad.

- c 68. In addition, the Commission objects that a foreign recipient of dividends from a Finnish company also receives no corporation tax credit. In the oral procedure, however, the Finnish government rightly stated that it does not lie in the power of the Finnish tax authorities to ensure the offsetting of corporation tax when a recipient of dividends is taxed abroad.

- d 69. It is true that Community law does not prescribe how the member states should design their systems to avoid economic double taxation, but, as stated at the outset, when adopting tax legislation the national legislature must in any event ensure that the fundamental freedoms, in this case the free movement of capital, are respected in the internal market, even though at present the Community has no jurisdiction of its own in the field of direct taxes<sup>39</sup>.

- e Moreover, the member states may in principle treat purely domestic and cross-border situations differently. However, if different treatment also entails the restriction of a fundamental freedom, the differentiation may not go beyond what is unavoidable on account of the differences in situation<sup>40</sup>.

- f 70. This is the starting point for the line of argument of the governments involved. They essentially advance two arguments. First, they point out that the corporation tax paid abroad—in this case in Sweden—does not benefit the Finnish tax authorities and can therefore not be offset against tax on the dividend in Finland. Secondly, they maintain that the Finnish tax authorities would not be able to guarantee a complete match between the corporation tax paid in Sweden and the corresponding tax credit to be recognised in Finland because they cannot levy additional tax on the Swedish company.

- g 71. With regard to the first argument, it is settled case law that a loss of tax revenue cannot be relied upon to justify a measure that is in principle contrary to a fundamental freedom<sup>41</sup>. Consequently, Finland must accept that when taxing domestic recipients of dividends it loses tax revenue as a result of the offsetting of the corporation tax received by the Swedish tax authorities. Hence the tax revenues ultimately remain in the state in which entrepreneurial activity is undertaken to generate profits.

- h 72. As to the governments' second argument, the fact that it is far easier to carry out offsetting if both of the taxpayers involved are subject to the same tax jurisdiction cannot be dismissed out of hand. This cannot, however, justify taking no account of corporation tax deducted abroad in any circumstance and thereby impeding the free movement of capital. a

73. Instead, a recipient of dividends who is taxable in Finland must at least be afforded the opportunity to furnish proof of the actual amount of corporation tax paid, for example by presenting certificates to that effect from the company. However, the requirements as to proof may not be excessively onerous, so as to render virtually impossible or excessively difficult the exercise of rights conferred by Community law.<sup>42</sup> b

74. Moreover, offsetting need not lead to dividends received from Sweden being completely exempt from income tax in Finland. Rather, the prohibition on discrimination in applying once-only taxation requires only that the amount of corporation tax actually paid be taken fully into account. As the Finnish tax authorities cannot call upon the foreign undertaking to make up any difference between the corporation tax paid and the income tax due, it would be permissible for the adjustment to be made by levying correspondingly higher income tax on the domestic taxpayer. c

75. Under this arrangement a recipient of dividends from an investment abroad would, it is true, be treated worse than a recipient of dividends from a domestic company. First, in individual cases he may have to accept somewhat higher taxation, and secondly he would have to complete additional formalities in order to obtain a corporation tax credit, whereas offsetting would be automatic in the case of domestic investments. These inequalities of treatment are unavoidable, however, in view of the differences in situation.<sup>43</sup> d

76. In the wake of these arguments, the court asked the parties what practical difficulties would prevent the corporation tax paid abroad from being offset when taxing dividends in Finland. e

77. During the oral procedure the Finnish and United Kingdom governments pointed out in particular that in the context of the taxation of dividends it was difficult for the taxpayer or the tax administration, as the case may be, to obtain the necessary information on the corporation tax paid by the company in another member state. The Finnish government added that it was not only the rate of corporation tax applicable abroad that had to be taken into account for the purposes of offsetting, as the basis of assessment could differ from one state to another. The United Kingdom government pointed to the particular difficulties that could result from the fact that the free movement of capital also applied in relation to third states. f
g

78. These difficulties cannot, however, justify the complete exclusion of the offsetting of corporation tax paid abroad. In order to take account of differences in tax rates and in the basis of assessment, the amount of corporation tax actually paid per share could be offset. The company involved should be able to state this figure, for example on the basis of its accounts for the financial year for which the dividend was distributed. If it were not in a position to do so, the cost of this failure would ultimately fall on the shareholder, who would not be able to produce adequate proof of the tax to be offset against the tax on his dividend. In that case he might choose another investment. h

42 With regard to the principle of effectiveness, see in particular the judgments in Rewe-Zentralfinanz eG v Landwirtschaftskammer für das Saarland Case 33/76 [1976] ECR 1989 (para 5), and Grundig Italiana SpA v Ministero delle Finanze Case C-255/00 [2003] All ER (EC) 176, [2002] ECR I-8003 (para 33).

43 See para 48, above.

a 79. Particular problems may arise where third countries are involved. The principle of the free movement of capital between member states and third countries set out in art 56(1) EC does not, however, lay down a binding requirement that corporation tax paid in third countries be offset in the same way as in situations involving two member states. Here too, the rule is that equal treatment is required only if the situations are comparable. In view of the facts in the dispute in the main proceedings, however, it is not necessary to decide to what extent the principles developed here can be transposed to cases involving third countries.

b 80. In conclusion, it must be held that a scheme providing for corporation tax to be offset against the tax on dividends cannot be justified by arguments based on the coherence of the tax system if the scheme prohibits offsetting in the case of investments abroad even though such offsetting would in principle be possible.

VI—CONCLUSION

d 81. In the light of the foregoing considerations, I propose that the reply to the questions from the Korkein Hallinto-Oikeus be as follows:

e Article 56(1) EC and paras (1)(a) and (3) of art 58 EC preclude provisions of a member state under which the tax on a dividend received by an individual who is fully taxable in his country of residence from a share company established in the same country is calculated to take account of the corporation tax paid by the company, whereas corporation tax is not offset in the same manner if the dividend is distributed by a company established abroad.

7 September 2004. The COURT OF JUSTICE (Grand Chamber) delivered the following judgment.

f 1. The reference for a preliminary ruling concerns arts 56 and 58 EC (formerly arts 73b and 73d of the EC Treaty).

2. The reference has been submitted in the context of proceedings brought before the Korkein hallinto-oikeus (Supreme Administrative Court) by Mr Manninen, who is challenging the compatibility with Community law of Finnish legislation on the taxation of dividends (the Finnish tax legislation).

g LEGAL BACKGROUND

Community law

3. Article 56(1) EC provides:

h ‘Within the framework of the provisions set out in this Chapter, all restrictions on the movement of capital between Member States and between Member States and third countries shall be prohibited.’

4. Article 58(1) EC provides:

i ‘The provisions of Article 56 shall be without prejudice to the right of Member States—

(a) to apply the relevant provisions of their tax law which distinguish between taxpayers who are not in the same situation with regard to their place of residence or with regard to the place where their capital is invested;

(b) to take all requisite measures to prevent infringements of national law and regulations, in particular in the field of taxation ...’

5. Article 58(3) EC provides:

'The measures and procedures referred to in paragraphs 1 and 2 shall not constitute a means of arbitrary discrimination or a disguised restriction on the free movement of capital and payments as defined in Article 56.'

Finnish law

6. In accordance with art 32 of tuloverolaki (Income Tax Law) (1535/1992), dividends received by a person fully taxable in Finland from a Finnish or foreign quoted company are taxable as revenue from capital.

7. Under art 124 of the tuloverolaki (as amended by Law No 1459/2001), revenue from capital is taxed at the rate of 29%.

8. Companies established in Finland pay a tax on their profits which is also at the rate of 29%. In order to avoid double taxation of such revenue on the distribution of dividends, art 4(1) of the laki yhtiöveron hyvityksestä (Law on Corporation Tax Credits) (1232/1988), as amended by Law No 1224/1999, allows shareholders a tax credit equal to 29/71ths of the amount of the dividends they received during the relevant tax year.

9. In accordance with art 4(2) of the Law on Corporation Tax Credits, as amended by Law No 1224/1999, the dividend and the tax credit constitute taxable revenue in the hands of the shareholder. The effect of granting the tax credit is that the total tax on profits distributed by a quoted company amounts to 29%.

10. Under art 1 of the Law on Corporation Tax Credits, the tax credit applies only to dividends distributed by Finnish companies to persons fully taxable in Finland.

11. Should the tax paid by a Finnish company by way of corporation tax turn out to be less than 29/71ths of the amount of dividends which it has been decided to distribute during the tax year in question, then, in accordance with art 9 of the Law on Corporation Tax Credits, as amended by Law No 1542/1992, the difference is charged to that company by means of an additional tax.

THE DISPUTE IN THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND THE QUESTIONS REFERRED

12. Mr Manninen is fully taxable in Finland. He holds shares in a Swedish company quoted on the Stockholm (Sweden) Stock Exchange.

13. The profits distributed by that Swedish company in the form of dividends to Mr Manninen have already borne corporation tax in Sweden. The dividends also bear a tax in Sweden on revenue from capital by means of deduction at source. Since dividends distributed by foreign companies to Finnish taxpayers confer no entitlement to a tax credit in Finland, they are subject in that member state to income tax on revenue from capital at the rate of 29%. However, in accordance with Convention 26/1997 concluded between member states of the Nordic Council for the avoidance of double taxation in the matter of income tax and wealth tax, the tax deducted at source in Sweden, the rate of which cannot exceed 15% by virtue of art 10 of that convention, is deductible from the tax due by way of income tax on revenue from capital from the fully taxable shareholder in Finland.

14. On 23 November 2000, Mr Manninen applied to the keskusverolautakunta (Central Tax Commission) for a determination whether, having regard to arts 56 and 58 EC, dividends which he received from a Swedish company were taxable in Finland.

a 15. In its preliminary decision of 7 February 2001, the keskusverolautakunta held that Mr Manninen was not entitled to the tax credit in respect of dividends paid to him by a Swedish company.

16. Mr Manninen appealed against that decision to the Korkein hallinto-oikeus.

b 17. It is in those circumstances that the Korkein hallinto-oikeus decided to stay the proceedings and refer the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

c '(1) Is Article 56 of the Treaty establishing the European Community to be interpreted as precluding a corporation tax credit system like the Finnish one described [in paras 6 to 11 of this judgment], in which the recipient of a dividend who is generally liable to tax in Finland is granted a corporation tax credit in respect of a dividend paid by a domestic share company, but not in respect of dividend income he receives from a share company registered in Sweden?

d (2) If the answer to the above question is in the affirmative, may Article 58 EC be interpreted as meaning that the provisions of Article 56 are without prejudice to Finland's right to apply the relevant provisions of the Law on Corporation Tax Credits, since it is a condition for obtaining a corporation tax credit in Finland that the company distributing the dividend has paid the corresponding tax or supplementary tax in Finland, which does not take place with respect to a dividend paid from abroad, in

THE QUESTIONS REFERRED

f 18. In its questions, which may be examined together, the national court is asking in essence whether arts 56 and 58 EC preclude legislation, such as that at issue in the main proceedings, whereby the right of a fully taxable person in a member state to the benefit of a tax credit on dividends paid to him by limited companies is excluded where those companies are not established in that state.

g 19. The first point to be made is that, although direct taxation falls within their competence, the member states must none the less exercise that competence consistently with Community law (see Wielockx v Inspecteur der Directe Belastingen Case C-80/94 [1995] All ER (EC) 769, [1995] ECR I-2493 (para 16), Imperial Chemical Industries plc v Colmer (Inspector of Taxes) Case C-264/96 [1998] All ER (EC) 585, [1998] ECR I-4695 (para 19) and Royal Bank of Scotland plc v Greek State Case C-311/97 [2000] STC 733, [1999] ECR I-2651 (para 19)).

h 20. As for whether tax legislation such as that at issue in the main proceedings involves a restriction on the free movement of capital within the meaning of art 56 EC, it should be noted that the tax credit under Finnish tax legislation is designed to prevent the double taxation of company profits distributed to shareholders by setting off the corporation tax due from the company distributing dividends against the tax due from the shareholder by way of income tax on revenue from capital. The end result of such a system is i that dividends are no longer taxed in the hands of the shareholder. Since the tax credit applies solely in favour of dividends paid by companies established in Finland, that legislation disadvantages fully taxable persons in Finland who receive dividends from companies established in other member states, who, for their part, are taxed at the rate of 29% by way of income tax on revenue from capital.

21. It is undisputed that the tax convention concluded between the states of the Nordic Council for the prevention of double taxation is not capable of eliminating that unfavourable treatment. That convention does not provide for any system for setting off corporation tax against income tax due on revenue from capital. It merely seeks to attenuate the effects of double taxation in the hands of the shareholder in relation to that latter tax. a

22. It follows that the Finnish tax legislation has the effect of deterring fully taxable persons in Finland from investing their capital in companies established in another member state. b

23. Such a provision also has a restrictive effect as regards companies established in other member states, in that it constitutes an obstacle to their raising capital in Finland. Since revenue from capital of non-Finnish origin receives less favourable tax treatment than dividends distributed by companies established in Finland, the shares of companies established in other member states are less attractive to investors residing in Finland than shares in companies which have their seat in that member state (see Staatssecretaris van Financiën v Verkooijen Case C-35/98 [2002] STC 654, [2000] ECR I-4071 (para 35), European Commission v France Case C-334/02 (2004) 6 ITLR 642 (para 24)). c

24. It follows from the above that legislation such as that at issue in the main proceedings constitutes a restriction on the free movement of capital which is, in principle, prohibited by art 56 EC. d

25. It must, however, be examined whether that restriction on the free movement of capital is capable of being justified having regard to the provisions of the EC Treaty. e

26. It should be recalled in that respect that, in accordance with art 58(1)(a) EC—

‘Article 56 shall be without prejudice to the right of Member States ... to apply the relevant provisions of their tax law which distinguish between taxpayers who are not in the same situation with regard to ... the place where their capital is invested.’ f

27. According to the Finnish, French and United Kingdom governments, that provision clearly shows that member states are entitled to reserve the benefit of the tax credit for dividends paid by companies established in their territory. g

28. In that respect, it should be noted that art 58(1)(a) EC of the Treaty, which, as a derogation from the fundamental principle of the free movement of capital, must be interpreted strictly, cannot be interpreted as meaning that any tax legislation making a distinction between taxpayers by reference to the place where they invest their capital is automatically compatible with the Treaty. The derogation in art 58(1)(a) EC is itself limited by art 58(3) EC, which provides that the national provisions referred to in art 58(1) EC ‘shall not constitute a means of arbitrary discrimination or a disguised restriction on the free movement of capital and payments as defined in Article 56’. h

29. A distinction must therefore be made between unequal treatment which is permitted under art 58(1)(a) EC and arbitrary discrimination which is prohibited by art 58(3) EC. In that respect, the case law shows that, for national tax legislation like that at issue, which, in relation to a fully taxable person in the member state concerned makes a distinction between revenue from national dividends and that from foreign dividends, to be capable of being regarded as compatible with the Treaty provisions on the free movement of capital, the difference in treatment must concern situations which are not i a objectively comparable or be justified by overriding reasons in the general interest, such as the need to safeguard the cohesion of the tax system (see Verkooijen's case (para 43)). In order to be justified, moreover, the difference in treatment between different categories of dividends must not go beyond what is necessary in order to attain the objective of the legislation.

b 30. The Finnish, French and United Kingdom governments begin by arguing that the dividends paid are fundamentally different in character according to whether they come from Finnish or non-Finnish companies. Unlike profits distributed by non-Finnish companies, those paid in the form of dividends by companies established in Finland are subject to corporation tax in that member state, conferring entitlement on the part of a shareholder who is fully taxable in Finland to the tax credit. The difference in treatment between dividends paid c by companies established in that state and those paid by companies which do not satisfy that condition is therefore justified, they argue, in the light of art 58(1)(a) EC.

d 31. The French government further argues that the Finnish tax legislation conforms to the principle of territoriality and cannot therefore be regarded as contrary to the Treaty provisions on the free movement of capital (see Futura Participations SA v Administrations des Contributions Case C-250/95 [1997] STC 1301, [1997] ECR I-2471 (paras 18–22)).

e 32. In that regard, it needs to be examined whether, in accordance with art 58(1)(a) EC, the difference in treatment of a shareholder fully taxable in Finland according to whether he receives dividends from companies established in that member state or from companies established in other member states relates to situations which are not objectively comparable.

f 33. It should be noted that the Finnish tax legislation is designed to prevent double taxation of company profits by granting to a shareholder who receives dividends a tax advantage linked to the taking into account of the corporation tax due from the company distributing the dividends.

g 34. It is true that, in relation to such legislation, the situation of persons fully taxable in Finland might differ according to the place where they invested their capital. That would be the case in particular where the tax legislation of the member state in which the investments were made already eliminated the risk of double taxation of company profits distributed in the form of dividends, by, for example, subjecting to corporation tax only such profits by the company h concerned as were not distributed.

35. That is not the case here, however. As the order for reference shows, both dividends distributed by a company established in Finland and those paid by a company established in Sweden are, apart from the tax credit, capable of being subjected to double taxation. In both cases, the revenue is first subject to corporation tax and then—in so far as it is distributed in the form of dividends—to income tax in the hands of the beneficiaries.

i 36. Where a person fully taxable in Finland invests capital in a company established in Sweden, there is thus no way of escaping double taxation of the profits distributed by the company in which the investment is made. In the face of a tax rule which takes account of the corporation tax owed by a company in order to prevent double taxation of the profits distributed, shareholders who are fully taxable in Finland find themselves in a comparable situation, whether they receive dividends from a company established in that member state or from a company established in Sweden.

37. It follows that the Finnish tax legislation makes the grant of the tax credit subject to the condition that the dividends be distributed by companies established in Finland, while shareholders fully taxable in Finland find themselves in a comparable situation, whether they receive dividends from companies established in that member state or from companies established in other member states (see, to that effect, Asscher v Staatssecretaris van Financiën Case C-107/94 [1996] All ER (EC) 757, [1996] ECR I-3089 (paras 41–49) and Gerritse v Finanzamt Neukölln-Nord Case C-234/01 [2004] STC 1307, [2003] ECR I-5933 (paras 47–54)).

38. Moreover, unlike the legislation at issue in the Futura Participations case, the Finnish tax legislation cannot be regarded as an emanation of the principle of territoriality. As Advocate General Kokott has pointed out in para 42 of her opinion, that principle does not preclude the granting of a tax credit to a person fully taxable in Finland in respect of dividends paid by companies established in other member states (see the Futura Participations case (paras 18–22)).

39. In any event, having regard to art 58(1)(a) EC, the principle of territoriality cannot justify different treatment of dividends distributed by companies established in Finland and those paid by companies established in other member states, if the categories of dividends concerned by that difference in treatment share the same objective situation.

40. Secondly, the Finnish, French and United Kingdom governments maintain that the Finnish tax legislation is objectively justified by the need to ensure the cohesion of the national tax system (see Bachmann v Belgian State Case C-204/90 [1994] STC 855, [1992] ECR I-249, EC Commission v Belgium Case C-300/90 [1992] ECR I-305). In particular, they argue that, unlike in the case of the tax system examined in Verkooijen's case, there is in this case a direct link between the taxation of the company's profits and the tax credit granted to the shareholder receiving the dividends. They point out that the tax credit is granted to the latter only on condition that that company has actually paid the tax on its profits. If that tax does not cover the minimum tax on the dividends to be distributed, that company is required to pay an additional tax.

41. The Finnish government adds that, if a tax credit were to be granted to the recipients of dividends paid by a Swedish company to shareholders who were fully taxable in Finland, the authorities of that member state would be obliged to grant a tax advantage in relation to corporation tax that was not levied by that state, thereby threatening the cohesion of the national tax system.

42. In that respect, it should be noted that, in paras 28 and 21 respectively of the judgments in Bachmann's case and EC Commission v Belgium, the Court of Justice acknowledged that the need to preserve the cohesion of a tax system might justify a restriction on the exercise of the fundamental freedoms guaranteed by the Treaty. However, for an argument based on such justification to succeed, a direct link had to be established between the tax advantage concerned and the offsetting of that advantage by a particular tax deduction (see, to that effect, Svensson v Ministre du Logement et de l'Urbanisme Case C-484/93 [1995] ECR I-3955 (para 18), Asscher's case (para 58), the ICI case (para 29), Skatteministeriet v Vestergaard Case C-55/98 [1999] ECR I-7641 (para 24), X v Riksskatteverket Case C-436/00 [2004] STC 1271, [2002] ECR I-10829 (para 52)). As is shown by paras 21–23 of the judgment in Bachmann's case and paras 14–16 of the judgment in EC Commission v Belgium, those judgments are based on the finding that, in Belgian law, there was a direct link, in relation to the same taxpayer liable to income tax, between the a ability to deduct insurance contributions from taxable income and the subsequent taxation of sums paid by the insurers.

43. The case law further shows that an argument based on the need to safeguard the cohesion of a tax system must be examined in the light of the objective pursued by the tax legislation in question (see de Lasteyrie du Saillant v Ministère de l'Économie, des Finances et de l'Industrie Case C-9/02 (2004) 6 ITLR 666 (para 67)).

b 44. As has already been noted in para 33 of this judgment, the Finnish tax legislation is designed to prevent double taxation of company profits distributed to shareholders. The objective pursued is achieved by granting the taxpayer a tax credit calculated by reference to the rate of taxation of company profits by way of corporation tax (see para 8 of this judgment). Having regard
c to the identical rate of tax on company profits and on revenue from capital, namely 29%, that tax system finally results in taxing, solely in the hands of companies established in Finland, the profits distributed by them to taxpayers who are fully taxable in Finland, the latter being simply exonerated from tax on the dividends received. Should the tax paid by a Finnish company which pays d dividends turn out to be less than the amount of the tax credit, the difference is charged to that company by means of an additional tax.

45. Even if that tax legislation is thus based on a link between the tax advantage and the offsetting tax deduction, in providing that the tax credit granted to the shareholder fully taxable in Finland is to be calculated by reference to the corporation tax due from the company established in that
e member state on the profits which it distributes, such legislation does not appear to be necessary in order to preserve the cohesion of the Finnish tax system.

46. Having regard to the objective pursued by the Finnish tax legislation, the cohesion of that tax system is assured as long as the correlation between the tax advantage granted in favour of the shareholder and the tax due by way
f of corporation tax is maintained. Therefore, in a case such as that at issue in the main proceedings, the granting to a shareholder who is fully taxable in Finland and who holds shares in a company established in Sweden of a tax credit calculated by reference to the corporation tax owed by that company in Sweden would not threaten the cohesion of the Finnish tax system and would constitute a measure less restrictive of the free movement of capital than that g laid down by the Finnish tax legislation.

47. It should be noted furthermore that, in Bachmann's case and EC Commission v Belgium, the purpose of the tax provisions in question was also to avoid double taxation. The possibility which Belgian legislation gave to physical persons to deduct payments made under life assurance contracts from their h taxable income—with the end result of not taxing the income used to pay those contributions—was based on the justification that the capital constituted by means of those contributions would subsequently be taxed in the hands of its holders. In such a system, double taxation was avoided by postponing the sole taxation due until the time when the capital constituted by means of the exonerated contributions was paid. Cohesion of the tax system necessarily i required that, if the Belgian tax authorities were to allow the deductibility of life assurance contributions from taxable income, they had to be certain that the capital paid by the assurance company at the expiry of the contract would in fact subsequently be taxed. It is in that precise context that the Court of Justice then took the view that there were no less restrictive measures than those forming the subject matter of Bachmann's case and EC Commission v Belgium, which were capable of safeguarding the cohesion of the tax system in question. a

48. In the case at issue in the main proceedings here, however, the factual context is different. At the time when the shareholder fully taxable in Finland receives dividends, the profits thus distributed have already been subject to taxation by way of corporation tax, irrespective of whether those dividends come from Finnish or from Swedish companies. The objective pursued by the Finnish tax legislation, which is to eliminate the double taxation of profits distributed in the form of dividends, may be achieved by also granting the tax credit in favour of profits distributed in that way by Swedish companies to persons fully taxable in Finland. b

49. Whilst, for the Republic of Finland, granting a tax credit in relation to corporation tax due in another member state would entail a reduction in its tax receipts in relation to dividends paid by companies in other member states, it has been consistently held in the case law that reduction in tax revenue cannot be regarded as an overriding reason in the public interest which may be relied on to justify a measure which is in principle contrary to a fundamental freedom (see Verkooijen's case (para 59), Proceedings brought by Danner Case C-136/00 [2002] STC 1283, [2002] ECR I-8147 and X's case (para 50)). c

50. At the hearing, the Finnish and United Kingdom governments referred to various practical obstacles which, in their submission, preclude a shareholder fully taxable in Finland from being granted a tax credit corresponding to the corporation tax due from a company established in another member state. They argued that the Treaty rules on the free movement of capital apply not only to movements of capital between member states but also to movements of capital between member states and non-member countries. According to those governments, bearing in mind the diversity of the tax systems in force, it is impossible in practice to determine exactly the amount of tax, by way of corporation tax, which has affected dividends paid by a company established in another member state or in a non-member country. They argue that such impossibility is due in particular to the fact that the basis of assessment for corporation tax varies from one country to another and that rates of tax may vary from one year to the next. They further argue that dividends paid by a company do not necessarily arise from the profits of a given accounting year. d

51. In that respect, it should first be noted that the case in the main proceedings does not in any way concern the free movement of capital between member states and non-member countries. This case concerns the refusal by the tax authorities of a member state to grant a tax advantage to a person fully taxable in that state where that person has received dividends from a company established in another member state. e

52. Moreover, the order for reference shows that, in Finland, the tax credit allowed to the shareholder is equal to 29/71ths of the dividends paid by the company established in that member state. For the purposes of calculating the tax credit, the numerator of the fraction to be applied is thus equal to the rate of taxation of company profits by way of corporation tax, and the denominator is equal to the result obtained by deducting that same rate of taxation from the base of 100. f

53. Finally, it should also be noted that in Finnish law the tax credit always corresponds to the amount of the tax actually paid by way of corporation tax by the company which distributes the dividends. Should the tax paid by way of g a corporation tax turn out to be less than the amount of the tax credit, the difference is charged to the company making the distribution by means of an additional tax.

b 54. In those circumstances, the calculation of a tax credit granted to a shareholder fully taxable in Finland, who has received dividends from a company established in Sweden, must take account of the tax actually paid by the company established in that other member state, as such tax arises from the general rules on calculating the basis of assessment and from the rate of corporation tax in that latter member state. Possible difficulties in determining the tax actually paid cannot, in any event, justify an obstacle to the free movement of capital such as that which arises from the legislation at issue in the main proceedings (see EC Commission v France (para 29)).

c 55. In the light of the above considerations, the answer to the questions referred must be that arts 56 and 58 EC preclude legislation whereby the entitlement of a person fully taxable in one member state to a tax credit in relation to dividends paid to him by limited companies is excluded where those companies are not established in that state.

d COSTS

56. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the proceedings pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. The costs incurred in submitting observations to the court, other than those of the said parties, are not recoverable.

e On those grounds, the Court of Justice (Grand Chamber) hereby rules:

Articles 56 and 58 EC preclude legislation whereby the entitlement of a person fully taxable in one member state to a tax credit in relation to dividends paid to him by limited companies is excluded where those companies are not established in that state.

(Case C-147/02)

COURT OF JUSTICE OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES

JUDGES SKOURIS (PRESIDENT), JANN, TIMMERMANS, GULMANN, CUNHA RODRIGUES, ROSAS (PRESIDENTS OF CHAMBERS), LA PERGOLA, PUISOCHET, SCHINTGEN (RAPPORTEUR), MACKEN AND COLNERIC
ADVOCATE GENERAL LÉGER

24 JUNE, 30 SEPTEMBER 2003, 30 MARCH 2004

European Community – Equality of treatment of men and women – Equal pay for equal work – Maternity leave benefit – Award of pay rise after conclusion of reference period for the calculation of maternity pay but before commencement of maternity leave – Pay rise not included in statutory maternity pay – Whether pay rise should be taken into account for purpose of calculating maternity pay – EC Treaty, art 119 (now art 141 EC) – Council Directive (EEC) 92/85.

The claimant had been an employee of the defendant company for a number of years prior to the commencement of her maternity leave. A few weeks before she was to begin her maternity leave she received a pay increase. However, that increase was not included in her maternity pay as it had been awarded after the conclusion of the reference period from which her maternity pay had been calculated. Council Directive (EEC) 92/85 (on the introduction of measures to encourage improvements in the safety and health at work of pregnant workers and workers who have recently given birth or are breastfeeding) (tenth individual directive within the meaning of art 16(1)<sup>a</sup> of Council Directive (EEC) 89/391) provided, inter alia, for the entitlement to maternity leave and maternity pay and/or allowances. The claimant brought a complaint against the defendant before the employment tribunal, contending that the failure to reflect the salary increase in the calculation of the statutory maternity pay constituted discrimination against her on the grounds of sex. The tribunal held, applying the judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities in Gillespie v Northern Health and Social Services Board Case C-342/93 [1996] All ER (EC) 284, that the failure to take account of the claimant's pay increase in determining her statutory maternity pay amounted to a breach of art 119<sup>b</sup> of the EC Treaty (now arts 136–143 EC). The Employment Appeal Tribunal upheld the tribunal's decision. The defendant appealed to the Court of Appeal which stayed the proceedings and referred three questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling which related to the interpretation of art 119 and the judgment in Gillespie's case.

Held — (1) Article 119 had to be interpreted as requiring that, in so far as the pay received by the worker during her maternity leave was determined at least in part on the basis of the pay she earned before her maternity leave began, any

<sup>b</sup> Article 119, so far as material, is set out at judgment para 3, below

- a pay rise awarded between the beginning of the period covered by the reference pay and the end of the maternity leave had to be included in the elements of pay taken into account in calculating the amount of such pay. That requirement was not limited to cases where the pay rise was backdated to the period covered by the reference pay. The principle of non-discrimination required that a woman who was still linked to her employer by a contract of
- b employment or by an employment relationship during maternity leave should, like any other worker, benefit from any pay rise, even if backdated, which was awarded between the beginning of the period covered by reference pay and the end of maternity leave. To deny such an increase to a woman on maternity leave would discriminate against her since, had she not been pregnant, she would have received the pay rise (see judgment paras 47, 50, below); Gillespie v Northern Health and Social Services Board Case C-342/93 [1996] All ER (EC) 284 considered.
- c (2) Absent any Community legislation in the sphere, it was for the competent national authorities to determine how, in compliance with all the provisions of Community law, and in particular Directive 92/85, any pay rise awarded before
- d or during maternity leave should be included in the elements of pay used to calculate the pay due to a worker during maternity leave. As the manner in which the requirement to include any pay rise in the elements of pay taken into account in calculating the amount of pay for the purposes of maternity leave was not the subject of Community legislation, it was within the discretion of the competent authorities of the member state concerned;
- e provided that they complied with that requirement and with all provisions of Community law, in particular those stemming from Directive 92/85 (see judgment paras 53, 56, below).

Reference

By order of 27 March 2002, the Court of Appeal (Civil Division) (England and Wales) referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) three questions (as set out in judgment para 32, below) on the interpretation of

- a* art 119 of the EC Treaty (now art 141 EC) and the judgment in Gillespie v Northern Health and Social Services Board Case C-342/93 [1996] All ER (EC) 284. Those questions were raised in proceedings between Michelle K Alabaster and Woolwich plc and the Secretary of State for Social Security relating to a request to have a pay rise taken into account in calculating statutory maternity pay. Written observations were submitted on behalf of: Mrs Alabaster, by L Cox QC and K Monaghan, Barristers; Woolwich plc, by M Griffiths, Barrister, instructed by C McIntyre, Solicitor; the United Kingdom government, by P Ormond, acting as agent, C Vajda QC and R Haynes, Barristers; the Commission of the European Communities, by M-J Jarczy and N Yerrell, acting as agents. Oral observations were made on behalf of: Mrs Alabaster, represented by K Monaghan and by A Reindorf, Barristers; the United Kingdom government, represented by C Jackson, acting as agent, and C Vajda; and the Commission, represented by J Jarczy and N Yerrell. The language of the case was English. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General.

- d* 1. This case provides an opportunity for the Court of Justice of the European Communities to clarify, or indeed reconsider, the case of Gillespie v Northern Health and Social Services Board<sup>2</sup>. That case related to the principle of equal pay for men and women and, more particularly, women's pay during their maternity leave.
- e* 2. In this case the Court of Appeal (Civil Division) (England and Wales)<sup>3</sup>, is asking whether art 119 of the EC Treaty (arts 117 to 120 of the EC Treaty have been replaced by arts 136 to 143 EC) must be interpreted as meaning that, where statutory maternity pay is calculated on the basis of the woman's average earnings during a specified period, such pay must include any pay rises awarded before or during the period of maternity leave but outside the reference period laid down by national law (see [2002] EWCA Civ 211, [2002] IRLR 420).

I—LEGAL BACKGROUND

A—Community law

- g* 3. Article 119 of the EC Treaty (now art 141 EC) establishes the principle of equal pay for men and women<sup>4</sup>. It provides as follows:

'Each Member State shall during the first stage ensure and subsequently maintain the application of the principle that men and women should receive equal pay for equal work.'

- h* For the purpose of this Article, "pay" means the ordinary basic or minimum wage or salary and any other consideration, whether in cash or in kind, which the worker receives, directly or indirectly, in respect of his employment from his employer.'

4. According to art 1 of Council Directive (EEC) 75/117<sup>5</sup>, the principle of equal pay is intended to eliminate, for the same work or for work to which equal value is attributed, all discrimination on grounds of sex with regard to all aspects and conditions of remuneration. a

5. Council Directive (EEC) 76/207<sup>6</sup> establishes the principle of equal treatment of men and women for the purposes of access to employment and working conditions<sup>7</sup>. That principle is intended to remove any discrimination on grounds of sex, either directly or indirectly, by reference in particular to marital or family status<sup>8</sup>. b

6. Article 2(3) of Directive 76/207 provides that the directive is without prejudice to provisions concerning the protection of women, particularly as regards pregnancy and maternity.

7. On 19 October 1992, the Council of the European Union adopted Council Directive (EEC) 92/85 (on the introduction of measures to encourage improvements in the safety and health at work of pregnant workers and workers who have recently given birth or are breastfeeding) (tenth individual directive within the meaning of art 16(1) of Council Directive (EEC) 89/391<sup>9</sup>). That directive is based on art 118a of the EC Treaty (arts 117 to 120 of the EC Treaty have been replaced by arts 136 to 143 EC) and was to be transposed by 19 October 1994<sup>10</sup>. c

8. Article 8 of Directive 92/85 relates to maternity leave. It provides as follows: d

‘1. Member States shall take the necessary measures to ensure that workers within the meaning of Article 2 are entitled to a continuous period of maternity leave of at least 14 weeks allocated before and/or after confinement in accordance with national legislation and/or practice. e

2. The maternity leave stipulated in paragraph 1 must include compulsory maternity leave of at least two weeks allocated before and/or after confinement in accordance with national legislation and/or practice.’

9. Article 11 of Directive 92/85 concerns employment rights. It provides as follows: f

‘In order to guarantee workers within the meaning of Article 2 the exercise of their health and safety protection rights as recognized in this Article, it shall be provided that ...

2. in the case referred to in Article 8 [maternity leave], the following must be ensured: g

(a) the rights connected with the employment contract of workers within the meaning of Article 2, other than those referred to in point (b) below;

(b) maintenance of a payment to, and/or entitlement to an adequate allowance for, workers within the meaning of Article 2;

3. The allowance referred to in point 2(b) shall be deemed adequate if it guarantees income at least equivalent to that which the worker concerned would receive in the event of a break in her activities on grounds connected with her state of health, subject to any ceiling laid down under national legislation ...’ h

a B—National law

10. The national provisions on statutory maternity pay are found in Pt XII of the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992.

b 11. Under s 164 of the Act, an employee is entitled to statutory maternity pay if she has been employed for a continuous period of at least 26 weeks with the same employer by the fifteenth week before the expected week of confinement, her normal weekly earnings are over a certain level, she has given the employer the appropriate notice and the baby is due within 11 weeks.

12. Under s 165(1) of the Act, statutory maternity pay is payable for a maximum of 18 weeks.

c 13. Section 166(1) of the Act provides that there are two rates of pay, the 'higher rate' and the 'lower rate'.

14. Section 166(2) of the Act prescribes that the higher rate is a rate equivalent to 90% of the woman's normal weekly earnings for a period of eight weeks immediately preceding the fourteenth week before the expected week of confinement or the lower rate, whichever is the higher. The lower rate is a flat-rate weekly payment.

d 15. Under s 166(1) and (4) of the Act, where an employee is entitled to higher rate statutory maternity pay, she is entitled to the higher rate for six weeks and to the lower rate for 12 weeks.

16. Section 171(4) of the Act provides that a woman's normal weekly earnings are to be taken to be the average weekly earnings which in the relevant period have been paid to her.

e 17. The Statutory Maternity Pay (General) Regulations 1986, SI 1986/1960, as amended with effect from 12 June 1996 by SI 1996/1335 (the regulations), lay down certain conditions for applying the Act with regard to statutory maternity pay.

f 18. Regulation 21(2) of the regulations defines the appropriate date as the first date of the fourteenth week before the expected week of confinement, or the first day in the week in which the woman is confined, whichever is earlier.

19. Regulation 21(3) of the regulations provides that the relevant period for the purposes of s 171(4) of the Act is the period between:

'(a) the last normal pay day before the appropriate date; and

(b) the last normal pay day to fall at least 8 weeks earlier than the normal

g pay day mentioned in sub-paragraph (a),

including the normal pay day mentioned in sub-paragraph (a) but excluding that first mentioned in sub-paragraph (b).'

20. Regulation 21(7) of the regulations was inserted by SI 1996/1335 to take account of the Gillespie judgment. It provides as follows:

h 'In any case where a woman receives a back-dated pay increase which includes a sum in respect of a relevant period, normal weekly earnings shall be calculated as if such a sum was paid in that relevant period even though received after that period.'

II—THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS

i 21. Mrs Michelle K Alabaster was an employee of Woolwich plc (the Woolwich) in the United Kingdom from 7 December 1987 to 23 August 1996. 22. In May 1995 she became pregnant.

23. She commenced maternity leave on 8 January 1996. Her expected week of confinement was 11 February 1996 although she gave birth on 2 February 1996.

24. Mrs Alabaster received statutory maternity pay from the week of 8 January 1996. She was paid statutory maternity pay at the higher rate not just for the statutory six-week period but for an additional four weeks under her contract of employment. She then received statutory maternity pay at the lower rate for eight weeks. a

25. On 12 December 1995 Mrs Alabaster received a salary increase with effect from 1 December. However, this salary increase was not reflected in her statutory maternity pay calculation because it came after the relevant period for calculating normal earnings. b

26. Pursuant to reg 21(3) of the regulations, the relevant period in Mrs Alabaster's case began on 1 September 1995 and ended on 31 October 1995.

27. Regulation 21(7) of the regulations was not applicable in Mrs Alabaster's case since it only entered into force on 12 June 1996. In any event, the provision would not have applied because her pay increase was not backdated in respect of the relevant period. c

28. On 21 January 1997 Mrs Alabaster brought a complaint against the Woolwich in the employment tribunal in the United Kingdom. She contended that the failure to reflect the salary increase in her statutory maternity pay calculation constituted discrimination against her on grounds of sex contrary to art 119 of the Treaty. d

29. The Secretary of State for Social Security was joined in the proceedings by an order of the employment tribunal dated 30 May 1997.

30. By a decision of 10 March 1999 the employment tribunal held, applying the Gillespie judgment, that the failure to take account of Mrs Alabaster's pay increase in determining her statutory maternity pay amounted to a breach of art 119 of the Treaty. e

31. The Woolwich and the Secretary of State for Social Security appealed on this issue to the Employment Appeal Tribunal, which dismissed the appeal by a decision of 7 April 2000, also applying Gillespie's case (see [2000] IRLR 754, [2000] ICR 1037). f

III—THE QUESTIONS REFERRED FOR A PRELIMINARY RULING

32. The respondents in the main proceedings appealed to the Court of Appeal, which decided to stay proceedings and to refer the following three questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling: g

'[25] ... In a situation where:

(a) the earnings-related element of a woman's statutory maternity pay (SMP) is calculated by reference to her normal weekly earnings for an eight-week period ending in the 15th week before the expected week of confinement (the relevant period), and h

(b) the employer grants a pay rise, which is not back-dated to the relevant period, at any time after the end of the relevant period used for calculating that woman's earnings-related element of SMP and before the end of her maternity leave:

[26] Question 1 i

Are [art 119 of the Treaty] and the judgment in [Gillespie's case] to be interpreted as meaning that the woman is entitled to have that pay rise taken into consideration in calculating or recalculating the earnings-related element of her SMP?

[27] Question 2

- a Is the answer to Question 1 affected by whether the effective date of the pay rise commences:
- (i) prior to the beginning of the woman's maternity leave;
  - (ii) prior to the ending of the earnings-related period of her SMP; or
  - (iii) on some other date and, if so, on what date?
- b [28] Question 3
- If the answer to Question 1 is in the affirmative:
- (i) How should the calculation or recalculation of the normal weekly earnings in the relevant period take into account the pay rise?
  - (ii) Should the relevant period be changed?
  - (iii) What allowance, if any, should be made for other factors occurring within the period to which the pay rise relates, such as the numbers of hours worked and the reason for the pay increase?
- c (iv) Does it follow that, if there is a reduction in pay after the end of the relevant period but before the end of the woman's period of maternity leave, her SMP should be calculated or recalculated to take account of the reduction in pay, and, if so, how should this be done?

d IV—FIRST QUESTION

33. The first question relates to the interpretation of art 119 of the Treaty and the Gillespie judgment.

e 34. The Court of Appeal is asking whether, in the light of that law, a statutory maternity benefit calculated on the basis of the woman's average earnings during a specified period should include pay rises awarded before or during her maternity leave, but outside the relevant period prescribed by national law.

f 35. The answer to that question depends on the scope to be given to the Gillespie judgment. I shall therefore begin by considering the scope of that judgment (section A below). But I shall also set out the difficulties which the Gillespie judgment raises (in section B) and look at how the court's case law on the subject has evolved in this area (section C). Those two matters will lead to a consideration of whether a woman's right to have a pay rise taken account of in her maternity pay ought not to be based on Directive 92/85 rather than on the principle of equal treatment (section D).

g A—The scope of the Gillespie judgment

36. The facts giving rise to the dispute in Gillespie's case were analogous to those in this case.

h 37. Ms Gillespie and 16 other workers took maternity leave during 1988. In November 1988 they had obtained backdated pay increases which took effect on 1 April 1988. However those pay increases had not been included in their maternity benefit as a result of the calculation method provided for by the relevant national rules.

i 38. The Court of Appeal in Northern Ireland ([1997] NI 190, [1997] IRLR 410), which was seised of the dispute, referred four questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling. It asked, in essence, whether the principle of equal pay required that the plaintiffs continue to receive full pay while on maternity leave or, if applicable, that they receive a pay rise awarded before or during their maternity leave.

39. The court replied to those questions as follows:

'12. The definition in the second paragraph of art 119 provides that the concept of pay used in the above-mentioned provisions includes all consideration which workers receive directly or indirectly from their employers in respect of their employment. The legal nature of such consideration is not important for the purpose of the application of art 119 provided that it is granted in respect of employment ... a

13. Consideration classified as pay includes, inter alia, consideration paid by the employer by virtue of legislative provisions and under a contract of employment whose purpose is to ensure that workers receive income even where, in certain cases specified by the legislature, they are not performing any work provided for in their contracts of employment ... b

14. It follows that, since the benefit paid by an employer under legislation or collective agreements to a woman on maternity leave is based on the employment relationship, it constitutes pay within the meaning of art 119 of the Treaty and Directive 75/117. c

15. Article 119 of the Treaty and art 1 of Directive 75/117 therefore preclude regulations which permit men and women to be paid at different rates for the same work or for work of equal value.

16. It is well settled that discrimination involves the application of different rules to comparable situations or the application of the same rule to different situations (see, in particular, Finanzamt Köln-Altstadt v Schumacker Case C-279/93 [1995] All ER (EC) 319 at 339, [1995] ECR I-225 at 259 (para 30)). d

17. The present case is concerned with women taking maternity leave provided for by national legislation. They are in a special position which requires them to be afforded special protection, but which is not comparable either with that of a man or with that of a woman actually at work. e

18. As to whether Community law requires women on maternity leave to continue to receive full pay or lays down specific criteria determining the amount of benefit payable during maternity leave, (Council Directive 92/85) ... provides for various measures to protect inter alia the safety and health of female workers, especially before and after giving birth. Those measures include ... rights connected with contracts of employment ... and maintenance of a payment ... and/or entitlement to an adequate allowance ... f

19. However, that directive does not apply ratione temporis to the facts of the present case. It was therefore for the national legislature to set the amount of the benefit to be paid during maternity leave ... g

20. That being so, it follows that at the material time neither art 119 of the Treaty nor art 1 of Directive 75/117 required that women should continue to receive full pay during maternity leave. Nor did those provisions lay down any specific criteria for determining the amount of benefit to be paid to them during that period ... h

21. As to the question whether a woman on maternity leave should receive a pay rise awarded before or during that period, the answer must be Yes.

22. The benefit paid during maternity leave is equivalent to a weekly payment calculated on the basis of the average pay received by the worker at the time when she was actually working and which was paid to her week by week, just like any other worker. The principle of non-discrimination therefore requires that a woman who is still linked to her employer by a contract of employment or by an employment relationship during maternity leave must, like any other worker, benefit i

- a from any pay rise, even if backdated, which is awarded between the beginning of the period covered by reference pay and the end of maternity leave. To deny such an increase to a woman on maternity leave would discriminate against her purely in her capacity as a worker since, had she not been pregnant, she would have received the pay rise.'
- b 40. The court therefore held that the principle of equal pay laid down in art 119 of the Treaty did not require that women should continue to receive full pay during maternity leave nor did it lay down specific criteria for determining the amount of maternity benefit payable to them. On the other hand, it found that the principle of non-discrimination does require that the maternity benefit must include pay rises awarded between the beginning of
- c the relevant period and the end of maternity leave.
41. The parties in this case hold differing views on the scope of the Gillespie judgment.
42. The United Kingdom says the judgment must be limited to the circumstances of that case, in other words to situations where a pay increase is backdated to the relevant period.
- d 43. The United Kingdom submits that although the pay increases in Gillespie's case were decided on before or during the plaintiffs' maternity leave, they were backdated to the relevant period. In its judgment therefore the court simply found that a pay increase of that kind must be reflected in the amount of maternity benefit. The court did not, however, establish a principle that any
- e pay rise awarded before or during the period of maternity leave but outside the relevant period must be reflected in the maternity benefit. In the United Kingdom's view, such an interpretation of Gillespie's case would create considerable legal uncertainty as well as a whole host of practical difficulties.
44. Mrs Alabaster challenges that reading of Gillespie's case. She submits that there is nothing in the judgment to support the claim that the pay rises were
- f backdated to the relevant period. In any event she considers that the wording of the Gillespie judgment is clear: the principle of non-discrimination requires that any pay rise awarded before or during maternity leave must be taken into account, even if it was awarded outside the relevant period. Mrs Alabaster adds that the practical difficulties raised by the United Kingdom cannot call that conclusion in question.
- g 45. The Commission of the European Communities agrees with Mrs Alabaster's analysis. It contends that if a member state opts for a system of maternity pay based on a woman's earnings, that system must comply with art 119 of the Treaty. This means, following Gillespie's case, that maternity pay must reflect any pay rises awarded before or during the woman's maternity leave.
- h 46. I believe that the scope of the Gillespie judgment is clear. In my view the court established a principle under which maternity pay calculated on the basis of a woman's earnings during a specified period must reflect any pay rise awarded between the beginning of the relevant period and the end of maternity leave.
- i 47. As Mrs Alabaster said, there is nothing to support the contention that the pay rises in issue in Gillespie's case were backdated to the relevant period.
48. The Gillespie judgment merely states that '[d]uring 1988 the plaintiffs took maternity leave'<sup>11</sup>; that 'in November 1988, negotiations ... resulted in pay

11 See para 3.

increases backdated to 1 April 1988'<sup>12</sup>; and that 'the plaintiffs in the main proceedings were unable to receive that increase'<sup>13</sup>. a

49. Indeed, certain aspects of the Gillespie judgment even suggest that the contested pay rises were backdated to a point in time outside the relevant period.

50. In para 6 of the judgment the court stated the reasons why the plaintiffs' pay rises had not been reflected in their maternity benefit to be as follows: b

'According to the decision of the industrial tribunal, referred to in the order for reference, the cash benefit payable during maternity leave is determined on the basis of average weekly pay calculated ... from the last two pay cheques received by the women concerned for the two months preceding the reference week (reference pay). The reference week is defined as the 15th week before the beginning of the expected week of confinement. No provision was made for an increase in reference pay in the event of a subsequent pay rise.'<sup>14</sup> c

51. That last sentence therefore appears to suggest that the reason why the plaintiffs did not receive their pay rise was that it was awarded outside the reference period laid down by the relevant national rules. d

52. I therefore do not think it has been established that the plaintiffs' pay rises in Gillespie's case were backdated to the relevant period.

53. In any event, the wording of the Gillespie judgment does not to my mind support the view that the court's findings are confined to situations where that is the case. e

54. Paragraphs 21 and 22 of the judgment are expressed in terms that are clear and general. Paragraph 21 states: 'As to the question whether a woman on maternity leave should receive a pay rise awarded before or during that period, the answer must be Yes.' Similarly, para 22 states that 'a woman ... must ... benefit from any pay rise ... which is awarded between the beginning of the period covered by reference pay and the end of maternity leave'. Finally the operative part of the Gillespie judgment states in clear and general terms as follows: f

'... to the extent that it is calculated on the basis of pay received by a woman before ... maternity leave, the amount of benefit must include pay rises awarded between the beginning of the period covered by reference pay and the end of maternity leave, as from the date on which they take effect.' g

55. It follows that there is nothing to suggest that the principle established in Gillespie's case is confined to situations where the pay rise is backdated to the relevant period only. h

56. On the basis of those considerations, the answer to the first question referred for a preliminary ruling must be Yes. The court may therefore decide that, under the Gillespie judgment, statutory maternity benefit calculated on the basis of a woman's average earnings during a specified period must include pay rises which are awarded before or during her maternity leave, but outside the relevant period laid down by national law. i a 57. However, like the United Kingdom, I think that Gillespie's case raises a number of difficulties. In view of those difficulties, and the way in which the case law has developed, I propose to invite the court not to uphold the judgment in Gillespie's case. As we shall see, as Community law currently stands, it is on Directive 92/85, rather than on the principle of equal pay, that a woman's right to have her pay rise taken into account ought to be founded.

<sup>13</sup> As above. Nor, it may be added, does my opinion in Gillespie's case contain any indication as to the dates of the relevant periods pertaining to the plaintiffs in the main proceedings.

b B—The difficulties raised by the Gillespie judgment

c 58. It is well settled that the principle of non-discrimination requires that a woman should not be the subject of unfavourable treatment by reason of her pregnancy or because she is on maternity leave<sup>15</sup>. This means that a woman who continues to be bound to her employer during her maternity leave must be able to continue to benefit from all working conditions which apply to both men and women<sup>16</sup>.

d 59. In Gillespie's case<sup>17</sup>, the court inferred from that principle that a woman who is on maternity leave must, like any other worker who is actually working, benefit at once from any pay rise, even if it is awarded outside the relevant period or during her maternity leave. This requirement means that the pay rise must be reflected in the amount of salary or benefit paid to the woman during her maternity leave.

e 60. However, the particular feature of the Gillespie judgment is the fact that, in so doing, the court applied the principle of non-discrimination to a woman on maternity leave and, more particularly, to the pay she receives during that time.

61. It seems to me that this particular application of the principle of equal treatment raises two sets of difficulties.

62. First, there is to my mind something of a contradiction between the principle established in Gillespie's case<sup>18</sup> and paras 16–20 of the judgment.

f 63. The court held in paras 16–20 of the Gillespie judgment that art 119 of the Treaty does not apply to women on maternity leave. The reason for that exclusion is that the prohibition laid down by art 119 of the Treaty only applies in cases involving discrimination between men and women, whereas the court takes the view that a woman on maternity leave is in a special situation requiring that she be afforded special protection, but which is not comparable with any other situation. The court thus concluded that art 119 of the Treaty does not require that women continue to receive full pay while on maternity leave, nor does it lay down any criterion for determining the amount of maternity benefit.

g 64. Yet at the same time the court held in paras 21 and 22 that the principle of non-discrimination requires that maternity benefit calculated on the basis of the pay received by the woman must take account of any pay rise awarded before or during her maternity leave. The reason for that requirement is that to do otherwise would be to discriminate against the woman because she is pregnant or on maternity leave.

i 15 See, inter alia, Caisse Nationale d'Assurance Vieillesse des Travailleurs Salariés v Thibault Case C-136/95 [1998] All ER (EC) 385, [1998] ECR I-2011 (para 26).

16 See footnote above (para 29).

17 Paragraphs 21, 22.

18 It is perhaps useful to point out that by 'the principle established in Gillespie's case' I mean the court's finding that the principle of non-discrimination requires that statutory maternity pay based on the woman's earnings during a specified period must include pay rises awarded before or during her maternity leave (see para 22 of the Gillespie judgment).

65. It has to be said that those two principles would seem to be somewhat contradictory. It is difficult to see how the principle of non-discrimination, which does not apply during maternity leave and therefore does not posit any criterion for calculating maternity benefit, can at the same time impose an obligation to take account of certain pay rises when calculating maternity benefit. In other words, it is difficult to comprehend how the principle of non-discrimination, which is not applicable during maternity leave, can affect the amount of benefit paid to a woman when she is on maternity leave. a

66. Ultimately, the Gillespie judgment seems to fall part way between two approaches, which should have been taken to their logical conclusion. The first is to exclude application of the principle of non-discrimination during maternity leave. However in that case the principle cannot entail an obligation to take account of a pay rise when calculating maternity benefit. The second is to apply the principle of non-discrimination to a woman on maternity leave. However in that case art 119 of the Treaty requires that the woman receive her full salary during the whole period of her maternity leave. b

67. Secondly, I believe that the principle laid down in Gillespie's case could have a detrimental effect on women. c

68. As the Court of Appeal<sup>19</sup> and the United Kingdom<sup>20</sup> pointed out, to apply the principle of non-discrimination to a woman on maternity leave could affect the protection which she enjoys during that period. d

69. Under Gillespie's case, a worker on maternity leave must not be treated any differently from a worker who is actually working<sup>21</sup>. As we have seen, the effect of this is that if the woman is awarded a pay increase before or during her maternity leave, that increase must be reflected in the amount of her maternity benefit immediately. e

70. But if the principle of non-discrimination is to be applied correctly, account must also be taken of any adverse matters arising before or during maternity leave. Therefore, if the woman were to suffer a reduction in or loss of earnings before or during her maternity leave, the principle of non-discrimination would demand that such reduction or loss too be reflected in the amount of her maternity benefit. To do otherwise would be to apply the principle of non-discrimination inconsistently, which would be incompatible with the requirements of the principle of legal certainty. f

71. It follows that application of the principle established in Gillespie's case could have the effect of reducing the amount of benefit paid to women during their maternity leave. g

72. That would be all the more regrettable given that the purpose of the relevant period in the United Kingdom appears to be to protect women against any adverse events that occur before or during their maternity leave. The United Kingdom explained that this period was chosen so that the woman's average earnings would be calculated during a period in her pregnancy (between the fourth and sixth months) in which as a rule she is subject to few pregnancy-related health problems. h

73. However, as the United Kingdom emphasised, by requiring that all matters that arise prior to maternity leave be taken into account, the Gillespie i

19 See order of the national court of 26 February 2002 ([2002] IRLR 420 at [16], [17]) and question 3(iii) and (iv) referred for a preliminary ruling.

20 See, inter alia, the written observations of the United Kingdom (paras 26, 27).

21 See the Gillespie judgment (para 22).

a judgment in effect moves the relevant period to the end of the pregnancy, which is the time when women are statistically less able to work normally.

74. Consequently, it is not impossible that the effect of the Gillespie judgment might be to reduce the amount of benefit paid to women during maternity leave<sup>22</sup>.

b C—Evolution of the court's case law

75. Furthermore the principle established in Gillespie's case appears no longer to be in step with the case law as it now stands on the protection of rights associated with pregnancy and maternity.

c 76. Under the current case law, the court applies the principles of equal pay and equal treatment outside the period of maternity leave only.

d 77. Thus the court has held that the principle of non-discrimination precludes refusing to enter into a contract of employment with a female worker on account of her pregnancy<sup>23</sup>; dismissal of a female worker for the same reason<sup>24</sup>; dismissal of a female worker for absences due to incapacity for work caused by illness resulting from her pregnancy<sup>25</sup>; an employer's refusal to allow a woman to return to work on the ground that she failed to inform her employer that she was pregnant before signing the contract of employment<sup>26</sup>;

e 22 The United Kingdom noted a further negative consequence of the Gillespie judgment. It pointed out that under Directive 92/85, the member states are free, with regard to women's earnings during their maternity leave, to choose between paying a proportion of the woman's earnings and paying a flat-rate benefit (such as €50 per week). It also explained that in the United Kingdom it is the employer who has the responsibility for calculating the amount of maternity benefit and that more than 70% of employers are small- or medium-sized enterprises, so that it is unlikely that they have the necessary resources to make frequent, complex calculations. In view of those factors, the United Kingdom indicated that the principle established in Gillespie's case created an 'administrative nightmare for employers' since it requires them to take account of all increases in pay awarded before or during maternity leave regardless of the amount. The United Kingdom therefore explained that the Gillespie judgment could cause certain member states to abandon an earnings-related regime in favour of a flat-rate benefit one. I believe that the risk of provoking such change is real given the pressure which employers are one way or another able to exert on the competent authorities. Furthermore, a change of this order would be detrimental to women because the flat-rate regime is in most cases more unjust than the earnings-related one. However to my mind, it is not certain that member states are entitled to make such a change. Article 1(3) of Directive 92/85 states expressly:

f 'This Directive may not have the effect of reducing the level of protection afforded to pregnant workers, workers who have recently given birth or who are breastfeeding as compared with the situation which exists in each Member State on the date on which this Directive is adopted.' The provision could therefore preclude the member states invoking the freedom accorded by Directive 92/85 to justify a change of regime entailing a reduction in the protection which women enjoy during their maternity leave in the member state concerned.

and a rule that deprives a woman of the right to an assessment of her performance because she was absent from the undertaking on account of maternity leave<sup>27</sup>. a

78. Similarly, the court has found that the principle of equal pay precludes an employer, when granting a Christmas bonus, from taking a woman's absence on maternity leave into account so as to reduce the amount thereof<sup>28</sup>. The court also takes the view that the principle of equal pay demands that a woman continue to receive full pay where she is unfit for work before her maternity leave by reason of her pregnancy, if men who are unfit for work have that right<sup>29</sup>. b

79. It is clear that these various different events—recruitment, dismissal, return to work, assessment, bonus payments, sick leave—occur outside the period covered by maternity leave. c

80. However where the woman is on maternity leave the court no longer applies either the principle of equal pay or the principle of equal treatment. It seems on the contrary that it considers the position in the light of the provisions of Directive 92/85 alone.

81. Thus the case of Boyle v Equal Opportunities Commission<sup>30</sup> related to a clause in an employment contract which made the payment during the period of maternity leave of pay higher than the statutory payment conditional on the worker's undertaking to return to work after the birth of her child for at least one month, failing which she was required to repay the difference between the amount of the pay she received and the amount of the statutory payments. The court (at para 40) took the view that art 119 of the Treaty did not preclude the application of such a clause on the ground that— d

‘pregnant workers and workers who have recently given birth or who are breastfeeding are in an especially vulnerable situation which makes it necessary for the right to maternity leave to be granted to them but which, particularly during that leave, cannot be compared to that of a man or a woman on sick leave.’<sup>31</sup> f

82. The court therefore considered (at paras 29–36) the clause in issue purely in the light of the provisions of Directive 92/85<sup>32</sup>.

83. Similarly, the case of Høj Pedersen concerned a national rule which provided that a pregnant woman who was unfit for work by reason of a pathological condition connected with her pregnancy was not entitled to receive full pay from her employer during the time that she was unfit. It was however established that a man who was unfit for work was entitled to receive full pay. The defendants in the main proceedings contended by way of justification for that difference that art 11 of Directive 92/85 authorises the member states to establish a ceiling for the allowances which women may claim in the event of pregnancy<sup>33</sup>. g

84. The court rejected that argument on the ground that art 11 of Directive 92/85 only applies to pay or benefits received by workers in the context of a maternity leave<sup>34</sup>. Since the dispute in that case concerned incapacity for work before maternity leave, the court held that art 119 of the Treaty required that a woman too continue to receive full pay if she is unfit for work<sup>35</sup>.

b 85. Finally, in Lewen's case<sup>36</sup> the court held that a Christmas bonus paid voluntarily by the employer as an incentive for future work cannot constitute pay within the meaning of art 11(2)(b) of Directive 92/85 in so far as it is not intended to ensure that, during her maternity leave, the worker receives an adequate level of income.

c 86. It follows from those judgments that, since the entry into force of Directive 92/85, the court has drawn a distinction between two separate periods. The first covers pregnancy up to the beginning of maternity leave, and the second covers the period of maternity leave. The court applies art 119 of the Treaty and the principle of equal treatment during the first period only. When the woman is on maternity leave, however, her position is considered in the light of the provisions of Directive 92/85 alone. That means that if the woman suffers unfavourable treatment during her maternity leave, such treatment is only prohibited if it is contrary to the provisions of Directive d 92/85<sup>37</sup>.

87. On that basis, it seems to me that the principle established in Gillespie's case no longer accords with current case law. As I have said, in that case the court applied the principle of non-discrimination to the second period referred to above and, more particularly, to the woman's pay during maternity leave.

e 88. Having regard to the difficulties set out above and the way in which the case law has evolved, I would suggest that the court ought not to uphold the principle established in Gillespie's case. A woman's entitlement to benefit from a pay rise ought to my mind now to be founded on Directive 92/85.

D—The basis of the woman's right

f 89. As we have seen, Directive 92/85 was adopted on the basis of art 118a of the Treaty to confer special protection on workers during pregnancy and maternity leave. The Community legislature took the view that pregnant workers, workers who have recently given birth and workers who are breastfeeding are in many respects a specific risk group and that measures ought to be taken to ensure their safety and health<sup>38</sup>. It thus adopted a range of g protective measures, such as the prohibition on dismissing women during pregnancy and maternity leave, and time off for antenatal appointments.

90. As part of those measures, Directive 92/85 provides that women must be entitled to a continuous period of maternity leave of at least 14 weeks, including compulsory maternity leave of at least two weeks. In addition h art 11(2) of Directive 92/85 provides that during maternity leave the following must be ensured:

(a) the rights connected with the employment contract of workers ... other than those referred to in point (b) below;

34 Paragraph 39.

j 35 Paragraphs 35, 37.

36 Paragraphs 22–24.

37 See also to that effect D Ghailani 'La protection des droits liés à la grossesse et à la maternité dans l'ordre juridique communautaire' (2002) Revue belge de sécurité sociale p 367 et seq (pp 383, 386) and K Berthou and Masselot 'Égalité de traitement et maternité. 38 Directive 92/85 (eighth recital).

(b) maintenance of a payment ... and/or entitlement to an adequate allowance ...' a

91. It seems to me that sub-para (a) could be interpreted as covering pay rises awarded before or during maternity leave. A worker's entitlement to benefit immediately from a pay rise awarded to her may be regarded as a 'right connected with [her] employment contract'<sup>39</sup>. b

92. That interpretation would enable the difficulties identified above to be avoided. b

93. First, it would be consistent with the principle that women on maternity leave are in a special position which requires them to be afforded special protection but which is not comparable with any other situation<sup>40</sup>. The proposed interpretation would involve applying to a woman on maternity leave the measures adopted specifically to ensure that she is protected. It would further guarantee that any pay rises are included in her maternity pay without having to compare her situation with that of a woman who is actually working<sup>41</sup>. c

94. Furthermore it seems to me that the application of Directive 92/85 would enable certain adverse events that occur during maternity leave to be excluded<sup>42</sup>. d

95. It will be recalled that the purpose of Directive 92/85 is to ensure that women are afforded special protection during their maternity leave. In addition, art 1(3) of the directive contains the idea that application of the directive may not have the effect of reducing the level of protection afforded to pregnant workers, workers who have recently given birth or who are breastfeeding. It could be argued on the basis of those two elements that a woman could not, while she is on maternity leave, suffer any reduction in or loss of earnings. e

96. That view is supported by the wording of art 11(2)(a) of Directive 92/85. Whilst immediate entitlement to the benefit of a pay rise awarded while a woman is on maternity leave can amount to a 'right' connected with her contract of employment, it is difficult to argue that an obligation to reflect any reduction in or loss of earnings in the amount of maternity benefit constitutes such a 'right'. In other words the concept of 'rights connected with the employment contract' would require that account be taken of pay rises awarded before or during maternity leave, but not of reductions in or losses of earnings suffered during maternity leave. Such reductions or losses could occur only after the end of the woman's maternity leave. f

97. Finally, the interpretation I have proposed is consistent with the current case law on the protection of rights arising in connection with pregnancy and maternity<sup>43</sup>. It entails applying only the provisions of Directive 92/85 to women on maternity leave and in particular to their pay while on maternity leave. g

<sup>39</sup> However it seems harder to found the woman's rights on art 11(2)(b) of Directive 92/85. The purpose of those provisions is to ensure an 'adequate' level of income for women on maternity leave (see on this point Boyle's case (paras 33, 34) and Lewen's case (paras 22, 23)). Therefore if the authorities or persons concerned are paying adequate remuneration and/or benefits, they are implementing art 11(2)(b) of Directive 92/85 correctly. That provision does not require that in addition they reflect any pay rises awarded to the woman in her maternity pay. i

a 98. Consequently I am of the view that the law on female workers may henceforth be founded on the provisions of art 11(2)(a) of Directive 92/85.

b 99. I therefore propose that the court reply to the first question referred for a preliminary ruling that art 119 of the Treaty and the principle of non-discrimination do not require that statutory maternity pay calculated on the basis of a woman's average earnings during a specified period take account of pay rises awarded before or during maternity leave, but outside the reference period. Rather, the obligation to reflect such pay rises in the amount of maternity pay arises under art 11(2)(a) of Directive 92/85.

V—SECOND QUESTION

c 100. By its second question the Court of Appeal is asking whether the fact that a pay rise takes effect before the beginning of maternity leave, before the end of the period of payment of the earnings-related element of maternity pay or, if appropriate, on some other date, has any effect on the reply to the first question.

d 101. The considerations set out in the analysis of the first question enable a reply to be given to the national court. It is clear that, regardless of the legal basis used, the amount of the earnings-related element of the woman's statutory maternity pay must take account of any pay rise awarded between the start of the relevant period and the end of maternity leave.

VI—THIRD QUESTION

e 102. The last question to be referred for a preliminary ruling divides into four parts which I shall consider in turn.

f 103. The first two parts relate to the detailed rules for applying the principle established in Gillespie's case. The national court is asking how a pay rise is to be taken into account in calculating the woman's normal earnings during the relevant period. It also wishes to know whether the relevant period prescribed by national law ought to be changed.

g 104. Those questions are clearly of fundamental significance to employers in the United Kingdom. Following the judgment in this case they will have to calculate or review maternity pay in relation to all women awarded a pay rise before or during their maternity leave. Having regard to the large number of possible scenarios and difficulties, the national court and the defendant in the main proceedings<sup>44</sup> seek detailed guidance on how to do this.

h 105. However it seems to me that those questions can only be dealt with applying the principle of procedural autonomy<sup>45</sup>. In the absence of any Community legislation in this area, it is for the legal system of each member state to lay down the detailed rules for applying the judgment delivered in this case, including any immediate implementing measures.

i 106. The second two parts of the question relate to the possible consequences of Gillespie's case in the event that the judgment requires that maternity pay take account of pay rises awarded before or during maternity leave but outside the relevant period. The Court of Appeal is asking whether art 119 of the Treaty requires that, if it does, other factors occurring before or during maternity leave must be taken into account, in particular any loss of or reduction in earnings.

44 See written observations submitted by the Woolwich (para 8).

45 On this principle see in particular my opinion in Preston v Wolverhampton Healthcare NHS Trust, Fletcher v Midland Bank plc Case C-78/98 [2000] All ER (EC) 714, [2000] ECR I-3201 (paras 38 et seq)).

107. As we have seen, this question, though merely theoretical in the present case, is most apposite. Logical application of the principle established in Gillespie's case demands that statutory maternity pay include not only pay rises awarded before or during maternity leave but also reductions in and losses of earnings suffered during that period<sup>46</sup>. We have, however, seen how some of those adverse consequences may be obviated by using Directive 92/85<sup>47</sup>.

CONCLUSION

108. On the basis of the foregoing considerations I therefore propose that the court reply to the questions referred to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling by the Court of Appeal (Civil Division) (England and Wales) as follows:

(1) Article 119 of the EC Treaty (arts 117 to 120 of the EC Treaty have been replaced by arts 136 to 143 EC) on the principle of non-discrimination must be interpreted as meaning that, where statutory maternity benefit is calculated on the basis of a worker's average earnings during a specified period, that benefit need not include any pay rises awarded before or during the worker's period of maternity leave, but outside the relevant period laid down by national law.

(2) However, art 11(2)(a) of Council Directive (EEC) 92/85 (on the introduction of measures to encourage improvements in the safety and health at work of pregnant workers and workers who have recently given birth or are breastfeeding) (tenth individual directive within the meaning of art 16(1) of Council Directive (EEC) 89/391) requires that where statutory maternity benefit is calculated on the basis of the worker's average earnings during a specified period, that benefit must include any pay rises awarded before or during the worker's period of maternity leave.

(3) In the absence of any Community legislation in this sphere it is for each member state to determine the detailed rules according to which the pay rises referred to in para 2 are to be taken into account in the amount of the woman's statutory maternity pay.

30 March 2004. THE COURT OF JUSTICE delivered the following judgment.

1. By order of 27 March 2002, received at the Court of Justice of the European Communities on 22 April 2002, the Court of Appeal (Civil Division) (England and Wales) referred to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) three questions on the interpretation of art 119 of the EC Treaty (arts 117 to 120 of the EC Treaty have been replaced by arts 136 to 143 EC) and the judgment in Gillespie v Northern Health and Social Services Board Case C-342/93 [1996] All ER (EC) 284, [1996] ECR I-475.

2. Those questions were raised in proceedings between Mrs Alabaster and Woolwich plc (hereinafter the Woolwich) and the Secretary of State for Social Security relating to a request to have a pay rise taken into account in calculating statutory maternity pay.

LEGAL BACKGROUND

Community legislation

3. The first two paragraphs of art 119 of the Treaty (now art 141 EC), as applicable at the time of the facts in the main proceedings, provide: a 'Each Member State shall during the first stage ensure and subsequently maintain the application of the principle that men and women should receive equal pay for equal work.

b For the purpose of this Article, "pay" means the ordinary basic or minimum wage or salary and any other consideration, whether in cash or in kind, which the worker receives, directly or indirectly, in respect of his employment from his employer.'

c 4. According to the first paragraph of art 1 of Council Directive (EEC) 75/117 (on the approximation of the laws of the member states relating to the application of the principle of equal pay for men and women) (OJ 1975 L45 p 19), the principle of equal pay is intended to eliminate, for the same work or for work to which equal value is attributed, all discrimination on grounds of sex with regard to all aspects and conditions of remuneration.

d 5. Council Directive (EEC) 92/85 (on the introduction of measures to encourage improvements in the safety and health at work of pregnant workers and workers who have recently given birth or are breastfeeding) (tenth individual directive within the meaning of art 16(1) of Council Directive (EEC) 89/391) (OJ 1992 L348 p 1) was adopted on the basis of art 118a of the EC Treaty.

6. Article 14(1) provided that the directive was to be transposed by 19 October 1994 at the latest.

e 7. Article 8 of Directive 92/85, on maternity leave, provides as follows:

'1. Member States shall take the necessary measures to ensure that workers within the meaning of Article 2 are entitled to a continuous period of maternity leave of at least 14 weeks allocated before and/or after confinement in accordance with national legislation and/or practice.

f 2. The maternity leave stipulated in paragraph 1 must include compulsory maternity leave of at least two weeks allocated before and/or after confinement in accordance with national legislation and/or practice.'

8. With regard to employment rights, art 11 of Directive 92/85 provides as follows:

g 'In order to guarantee workers within the meaning of Article 2 the exercise of their health and safety protection rights as recognised in this Article, it shall be provided that ...

2. in the case referred to in Article 8, the following must be ensured:

h (a) the rights connected with the employment contract of workers within the meaning of Article 2, other than those referred to in point (b) below;

(b) maintenance of a payment to, and/or entitlement to an adequate allowance for, workers within the meaning of Article 2;

i 3. The allowance referred to in point 2(b) shall be deemed adequate if it guarantees income at least equivalent to that which the worker concerned would receive in the event of a break in her activities on grounds connected with her state of health, subject to any ceiling laid down under national legislation.

4. Member States may make entitlement to pay or the allowance referred to in points 1 and 2(b) conditional upon the worker concerned fulfilling the conditions of eligibility for such benefits laid down under national legislation.

These conditions may under no circumstances provide for periods of previous employment in excess of 12 months immediately prior to the presumed date of confinement.' a

National law

The Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992 b

9. The national provisions on statutory maternity pay are to be found in Pt XII of the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992.

10. Under s 164 of the Act, an employee is entitled to statutory maternity pay if she has been employed for a continuous period of at least 26 weeks with the same employer by the fifteenth week before the expected week of confinement, her normal weekly earnings are over a certain level, she has given the employer the appropriate notice and the baby is due within 11 weeks. c

11. Under s 165(1) of the Act, statutory maternity pay is payable for a maximum of 18 weeks.

12. Section 166(1) of the Act provides that there are two rates of pay, the 'higher rate' and the 'lower rate'. d

13. Section 166(2) of the Act states that the higher rate is a rate equivalent to nine-tenths of the woman's normal weekly earnings for a period of eight weeks immediately preceding the fourteenth week before the expected week of confinement or the lower rate, whichever is the higher. The lower rate is a flat-rate weekly payment.

14. Under s 166(1) and (4) of the Act, where an employee is entitled to higher rate statutory maternity pay, she is entitled to the higher rate for six weeks and to the lower rate for 12 weeks. e

15. Section 171(4) of the Act provides that a woman's normal weekly earnings are to be taken to be the average weekly earnings which in the relevant period have been paid to her. f

The Statutory Maternity Pay (General) Regulations 1986

16. The Statutory Maternity Pay (General) Regulations 1986, SI 1986/1960 as amended with effect from 12 June 1996 by SI 1996/1335 (the regulations), lay down certain conditions for applying the Act with regard to statutory maternity pay. g

17. Regulation 20 of the regulations defines 'earnings' for the purpose of calculating statutory maternity pay.

18. Regulation 21 determines how normal weekly earnings are to be calculated.

19. Regulation 21(2) defines 'the appropriate date' as the first day of the fourteenth week before the expected week of confinement, or the first day in the week in which the woman is confined, whichever is the earlier. h

20. Regulation 21(3) provides that the relevant period for the purposes of s 171(4) of the Act is the period between:

- (a) the last normal pay day before the appropriate date; and
- (b) the last normal pay day to fall at least 8 weeks earlier than the normal pay day mentioned in sub-paragraph (a), i
including the normal pay day mentioned in sub-paragraph (a) but excluding that first mentioned in sub-paragraph (b).'

21. Regulation 21(7) provides as follows:

- a* 'In any case where a woman receives a back-dated pay increase which includes a sum in respect of a relevant period, normal weekly earnings shall be calculated as if such a sum was paid in that relevant period even though received after that period.'
- b* THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND THE QUESTIONS REFERRED
22. Mrs Alabaster was an employee of the Woolwich in the United Kingdom from 7 December 1987 to 23 August 1996.
23. She commenced maternity leave on 8 January 1996, her expected week of confinement being 11 February 1996.
24. Mrs Alabaster received statutory maternity pay from the week of
- c* 7 January 1996. It was paid at the higher rate not just for the statutory six-week period but for an additional four weeks under her contract of employment. She then received it at the lower rate for eight weeks.
25. On 12 December 1995 Mrs Alabaster received a pay increase with effect from 1 December. However, this increase was not reflected in the calculation of her statutory maternity pay because it came after the relevant period for
- d* calculating normal earnings.
26. Pursuant to reg 21(3) of the regulations, the relevant period for calculating normal earnings in Mrs Alabaster's case began on 1 September 1995 and ended on 31 October 1995.
27. Regulation 21(7) of the regulations was thus not applicable since it only
- e* entered into force on 12 June 1996. In any event, the provision would not have applied in Mrs Alabaster's case because her pay increase was not backdated in respect of the relevant period.
28. On 21 January 1997 Mrs Alabaster brought a complaint against the Woolwich in the employment tribunal, arguing that the failure to reflect the salary increase in the calculation of the statutory maternity pay she
- f* received constituted discrimination against her on grounds of sex, contrary to art 119 of the Treaty.
29. The Secretary of State for Social Security was joined in the proceedings by an order of the employment tribunal dated 30 May 1997.
30. By a decision of 10 March 1999 the employment tribunal held, applying the Gillespie judgment, that the failure to take account of Mrs Alabaster's pay
- g* increase in determining her statutory maternity pay amounted to a breach of art 119 of the Treaty.
31. The Woolwich and the Secretary of State for Social Security appealed on this issue to the Employment Appeal Tribunal, which dismissed the appeal by a decision of 7 April 2000, also applying Gillespie's case (see [2000] IRLR 754, [2000] ICR 1037).
- h* 32. The respondents in the main proceedings appealed to the Court of Appeal (Civil Division) (England and Wales), which, taking the view that the resolution of the dispute depended on the interpretation of Community law, decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling (see [2002] EWCA Civ 211, [2002] IRLR 420):
- i*
- '[25] ... In a situation where:
- (a) the earnings-related element of a woman's statutory maternity pay (SMP) is calculated by reference to her normal weekly earnings for an eight-week period ending in the 15th week before the expected week of confinement (the relevant period), and

(b) the employer grants a pay rise, which is not back-dated to the relevant period, at any time after the end of the relevant period used for calculating that woman's earnings-related element of SMP and before the end of her maternity leave:

[26] Question 1

Are [art 119 of the Treaty] and the judgment in [Gillespie's case] to be interpreted as meaning that the woman is entitled to have that pay rise taken into consideration in calculating or recalculating the earnings-related element of her SMP?

[27] Question 2

Is the answer to Question 1 affected by whether the effective date of the pay rise commences:

- (i) prior to the beginning of the woman's maternity leave;
- (ii) prior to the ending of the earnings-related period of her SMP; or
- (iii) on some other date and, if so, on what date?

[28] Question 3

If the answer to Question 1 is in the affirmative:

(i) How should the calculation or recalculation of the normal weekly earnings in the relevant period take into account the pay rise?

(ii) Should the relevant period be changed?

(iii) What allowance, if any, should be made for other factors occurring within the period to which the pay rise relates, such as the numbers of hours worked and the reason for the pay increase?

(iv) Does it follow that, if there is a reduction in pay after the end of the relevant period but before the end of the woman's period of maternity leave, her SMP should be calculated or recalculated to take account of the reduction in pay, and, if so, how should this be done?

REQUEST FOR REOPENING OF THE ORAL PROCEDURE

33. By document lodged at the Court Registry on 18 November 2003, the United Kingdom government requested the court to order the reopening of the oral procedure pursuant to art 61 of the Rules of Procedure.

34. In support of that request, it claims that in his opinion Advocate General Léger gave his views on a question which had not been expressly referred by the national court.

35. The court may of its own motion, or on a proposal from the Advocate General, or at the request of the parties reopen the oral procedure, in accordance with art 61 of its Rules of Procedure, if it considers that it lacks sufficient information, or that the case must be dealt with on the basis of an argument which has not been debated between the parties (see the order in Emesa Sugar (Free Zone) NV v Aruba Case C-17/98 [2000] ECR I-675 (para 18), the judgment in Wouters v Algemene Raad van de Nederlandse Orde van Advocaten (Raad van de Balies van de Europese Gemeenschap interveniend) Case C-309/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 193, [2002] ECR I-1577 (para 42), and the judgment of 13 November 2003 in Schilling v Finanzamt Nürnberg-Süd Case C-209/01 [2003] STI 2121 (para 19)).

36. In the circumstances of this case, however, the court, after hearing Advocate General Léger, considers that it has all the details necessary for it to answer the questions referred and that those matters were addressed in the arguments presented to it at the hearing. The request for reopening the oral procedure must therefore be refused.

a THE QUESTIONS REFERRED

First and second questions

37. By the first question the national court asks whether art 119 of the Treaty and the judgment in Gillespie's case are to be interpreted as meaning that a woman is entitled to have a pay rise which was awarded to her after the relevant period and was not backdated to that period taken into consideration in the calculation of the earnings-related element of the statutory maternity pay. By the second question it asks whether the fact that the effective date of the pay rise commences prior to the beginning of the maternity leave, or prior to the end of the earnings-related period of her statutory maternity pay, or on some other date has any effect on the answer to the first question. As those questions are closely related it is necessary to consider them together.

38. It must be observed at the outset that whilst Directive 92/85, which was to be transposed by the member states by 19 October 1994, was not applicable at the time of the facts of the main proceedings in Gillespie's case, it does apply ratione temporis to this case.

39. However, whilst the directive provides in art 11(2) and (3) that some of the rights connected with the employment contract of persons such as the applicant in the main proceedings must be ensured, it is not sufficient to provide a useful reply to the first two questions raised by the national court.

40. In those circumstances it is necessary to determine whether it is possible to deduce the answer to those questions from other provisions or principles of Community law.

41. It must be observed in this connection that under art 1 of Directive 75/117 the principle of equal pay for men and women for equal work enshrined in art 119 of the Treaty, which was applicable at the time of the facts in the main proceedings, means that for the same work or for work to which equal value is attributed all discrimination on grounds of sex with regard to all aspects and conditions of remuneration must be eliminated.

42. Regarding first the concept of pay in the aforementioned provisions, according to the definition in the second paragraph of art 119 of the Treaty it includes all consideration which workers receive directly or indirectly from their employers in respect of their employment. The legal nature of such consideration is not important for the purposes of the application of that article, provided that it is granted in respect of employment (see Garland v British Rail Engineering Ltd Case 12/81 [1982] 2 All ER 402, [1982] ECR 359 (para 10) and Gillespie's case (para 12)).

43. Consideration classified as pay includes, inter alia, consideration paid by the employer by virtue of legislative provisions and under a contract of employment whose purpose is to ensure that workers receive income even where, in certain cases specified by the legislature, they are not performing any work provided for in their contracts of employment (see Arbeiterwohlfahrt der Stadt Berlin v Bötzel eV Case C-360/90 [1992] IRLR 423, [1992] ECR I-3589 (paras 14, 15), and Gillespie's case (para 13) and the cases cited therein).

44. It follows that, since the benefit paid by an employer under legislation or collective agreements to a woman on maternity leave is based on the employment relationship, it constitutes pay within the meaning of art 119 of the Treaty and Directive 75/117 (see Gillespie's case (para 14), and Boyle v Equal Opportunities Commission Case C-411/96 [1998] All ER (EC) 879, [1998] ECR I-6401 (para 38)).

45. Secondly, the court has consistently held that discrimination involves the application of different rules to comparable situations or the application of the same rule to different situations (see, in particular, Finanzamt Köln-Altstadt v Schumacker Case C-279/93 [1995] All ER (EC) 319, [1995] ECR I-225 (para 30), and Gillespie's case (para 16)). a

46. In that connection women taking maternity leave provided for by national legislation are in a special position which requires them to be afforded special protection, but which is not comparable, in particular, either with that of a man or with that of a woman actually at work (Gillespie's case (para 17)). Therefore they cannot usefully rely on the provisions of art 119 of the Treaty to argue that they should continue to receive full pay while on maternity leave as though they were actually working, like other workers (Gillespie's case (para 20)). b

47. However the court found, thirdly, at para 22 of Gillespie's case, that benefit paid during maternity leave is equivalent to a weekly payment calculated on the basis of the average pay received by the worker at the time when she was actually working and which was paid to her week by week, just like any other worker. The principle of non-discrimination therefore requires that a woman who is still linked to her employer by a contract of employment or by an employment relationship during maternity leave must, like any other worker, benefit from any pay rise, even if backdated, which is awarded between the beginning of the period covered by reference pay and the end of maternity leave. To deny such an increase to a woman on maternity leave would discriminate against her since, had she not been pregnant, she would have received the pay rise. c

48. It follows that in a case such as that in the main proceedings where the income guaranteed by national law to the worker is calculated partially on the pay received by her before her maternity leave, art 119 of the Treaty entitles her to have a pay rise which was awarded to her after the beginning of the period covered by the reference pay and before the end of maternity leave taken into account in determining the elements of her pay used to calculate the consideration paid by her employer. d

49. The requirement recalled in para 22 of the judgment in Gillespie's case means that any pay rise awarded after the beginning of the period covered by her reference pay must be included in the elements of pay used to determine the amount of pay owed to the worker during her maternity leave, and, contrary to the contention of the United Kingdom government, should not be limited to cases where the pay is backdated to that period. e

50. In the light of the foregoing, the reply to the first and second questions must be that art 119 of the Treaty must be interpreted as requiring that, in so far as the pay received by the worker during her maternity leave is determined, at least in part, on the basis of the pay she earned before her maternity leave began, any pay rise awarded between the beginning of the period covered by the reference pay and the end of the maternity leave must be included in the elements of pay taken into account in calculating the amount of such pay. This requirement is not limited to cases where the pay rise is backdated to the period covered by the reference pay. f

Third question

51. By the third question the referring court asks essentially, in the event that the Court of Justice finds that there is a right to have a pay rise taken into account in circumstances such as those in the main proceedings, how the pay g a rise should be taken account of in calculating the pay due to the worker during her maternity leave and whether account should also be taken of any decrease in the woman's pay during the period following that covered by the reference pay and during her maternity leave.

b 52. As regards the first point it should be borne in mind that art 234 EC is based on a clear division of functions between the national courts and the Court of Justice, so that the Court of Justice may rule on the interpretation or validity of Community provisions only on the basis of the facts which the national court puts before it (see AC-ATEL Electronics Vertriebs GmbH v Hauptzollamt München-Mitte Case C-30/93 [1994] ECR I-2305 (para 16)). It follows that, within the framework of the procedure under art 234 EC, it is not for the Court of Justice but for the national court to apply the Community rules which it has interpreted to national measures or situations (see ICAP v Beneventi Case 222/78 [1979] ECR 1163 (para 10), and Lloyd Schuhfabrik Meyer & Co GmbH v Klijsen Handel BV Case C-342/97 [1999] All ER (EC) 587, [1999] ECR I-3819 (para 11)).

c 53. Furthermore, as the manner in which the requirement referred to at para 50 of this judgment is to be implemented is not the subject of Community legislation, it is within the discretion of the competent authorities of the member state concerned, provided that they comply with that requirement and with all provisions of Community law, in particular those stemming from Directive 92/85. It is not therefore for the court to rule on the manner in which the pay rise is to be taken into account when determining the reference pay, or on whether the period covered by that pay should be altered or whether, where the information on file is in any event not sufficient, other factors that may affect the determination of that pay should be taken into account.

d 54. As to the question of whether decreases in pay ought to be taken into account, the court has held that in the context of art 234 EC proceedings it must, in order to determine whether it has jurisdiction, examine the conditions in which the case has been referred to it by the national court. The spirit of co-operation which must prevail in the preliminary ruling procedure requires the national court to have regard to the function entrusted to the Court of Justice, which is to assist in the administration of justice in the member states and not to deliver advisory opinions on general or hypothetical questions (see Union Royale Belge des Sociétés de Football Association ASBL v Bosman, Royal Club Liègeois SA v Bosman, Union des Associations Européens de Football v Bosman Case C-415/93 [1996] All ER (EC) 97, [1995] ECR I-4921 (para 59), PreussenElektra AG v Schlesweg AG (Windpark Reußenköge III GmbH, intervening) Case C-379/98 [2001] All ER (EC) 330, [2001] ECR I-2099 (para 38), Canal Satélite Digital SL v Administración General del Estado Case C-390/99 [2002] ECR I-607 (para 18), and Cura Anlagen GmbH v Auto Service Leasing GmbH (ASL) Case C-451/99 [2002] ECR I-3193 (para 16)).

e 55. In this case the hypothetical nature of the issue on which the court is asked to rule is confirmed by the fact that the main proceedings, as set out in the order for reference, relate exclusively to the refusal to take account of a pay rise, there being no question of any pay decrease. In those circumstances the reply to the second part of the third question referred by the national court cannot have any bearing on the main proceedings and that part of the question is therefore inadmissible.

f 56. In the light of the foregoing considerations, the reply to the third question must be that, absent any Community legislation in this sphere, it is for the competent national authorities to determine how, in compliance with all the provisions of Community law, and in particular Directive 92/85, any pay rise awarded before or during maternity leave must be included in the elements of pay used to calculate the pay due to a worker during maternity leave. a

COSTS

57. The costs incurred by the United Kingdom government and by the Commission of the European Communities, which have submitted observations to the Court of Justice, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. b

On those grounds, the Court of Justice, in answer to the questions referred to it by the Court of Appeal (Civil Division) (England and Wales) by order of 27 March 2002, hereby rules: c

(1) Article 119 of the EC Treaty (arts 117 to 120 of the Treaty have been replaced by arts 136 to 143 EC) must be interpreted as requiring that, in so far as the pay received by the worker during her maternity leave is determined at least in part on the basis of the pay she earned before her maternity leave began, any pay rise awarded between the beginning of the period covered by the reference pay and the end of the maternity leave must be included in the elements of pay taken into account in calculating the amount of such pay. This requirement is not limited to cases where the pay rise is backdated to the period covered by the reference pay. d

(2) Absent any Community legislation in this sphere, it is for the competent national authorities to determine how, in compliance with all the provisions of Community law, and in particular Council Directive (EEC) 92/85 (on the introduction of measures to encourage improvements in the safety and health at work of pregnant workers and workers who have recently given birth or are breastfeeding) (tenth individual directive within the meaning of art 16(1) of Council Directive (EEC) 89/391), any pay rise awarded before or during maternity leave must be included in the elements of pay used to calculate the pay due to a worker during maternity leave. f

e G GmbH, which was incorporated under Austrian law, had sold children's clothing to M Srl, a company incorporated under Italian law, for a number of years. M Srl issued proceedings in Italy seeking a ruling that the contract between the parties had terminated ipso jure, or, alternatively, that it had terminated following a disagreement between them. A few months later
f G GmbH brought an action in Austria against M Srl to obtain payment of outstanding invoices. G GmbH contended, inter alia, that the Regional Court, Feldkirch, had been designated by a choice of court clause which had appeared on all its invoices. G GmbH argued that M Srl's failure to raise any objection to that clause showed that in accordance with their practice, and the usage prevailing in trade between Austria and Italy, the parties had concluded an g agreement conferring jurisdiction within the meaning of art 17<sup>a</sup> of the Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters 1968 (the Brussels Convention). M Srl, inter alia, contested the existence of any such agreement. Of its own motion, the Regional Court decided to stay proceedings pursuant to art 21<sup>b</sup> of the Brussels Convention until the jurisdiction of the Italian court had been established.
h However, it did not rule on the existence of any agreement conferring jurisdiction. G GmbH appealed that decision to the Higher Regional Court, Innsbruck, contending that the Regional Court should be declared to have jurisdiction and that the proceedings should not have been stayed. Considering that the instant case was one of lis pendens within the meaning of art 21 of the convention, the Higher Regional Court stayed the proceedings and referred a i number of questions relating to the interpretation of art 21 to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling.

a Article 17, so far as material, is set out at judgment para 6, below

b Article 21 is set out at judgment para 8, below

Held — (1) A national court could, under the Protocol of 3 June 1971 on the interpretation by the Court of Justice of the Brussels Convention, refer to the Court of Justice a request for interpretation of the convention, even where it relied on the submissions of a party to the main proceedings of which it had not yet examined the merits, provided that it considered, having regard to the particular circumstances of the case, that a preliminary ruling was necessary to enable it to give judgment and that the questions on which it sought a ruling from the court were relevant. It was incumbent on the national court to provide the Court of Justice with factual and legal information enabling it to give a useful interpretation of the convention and to explain why it considered that a reply to its questions was necessary to enable it to give judgment (see judgment paras 23, 24, 27, below). a

(2) Article 21 of the Brussels Convention had to be interpreted as meaning that a court second seised whose jurisdiction had been claimed under an agreement conferring jurisdiction should nevertheless stay proceedings until the court first seised had declared that it had no jurisdiction. In the instant case, the claim that the court second seised had jurisdiction under art 17 did not call into question the application of the procedural rule contained in art 21 which was based clearly and solely on the chronological order in which the courts involved were seised. Moreover, the court second seised was never in a better position than the court first seised to determine whether the latter had jurisdiction as jurisdiction was determined directly by the convention rules which were common to both courts and could be interpreted and applied with the same authority by each of them. In view of the disputes which could arise as to the very existence of a genuine agreement between the parties, expressed in accordance with the strict formal conditions laid down in art 17, it was conducive to the legal certainty sought by the convention that, in cases of lis pendens, it should be determined clearly and precisely which of the two national courts was to establish whether it had jurisdiction under the convention rules. It was clear from the wording of art 21 that it was for the court first seised to pronounce as to its jurisdiction, in the instant case in the light of a jurisdiction clause relied on before it, which had to be regarded as an independent concept to be appraised solely in relation to the requirements of art 17 (see judgment paras 47, 48, 51, 54, below). b

(3) Article 21 of the Brussels Convention had to be interpreted as meaning that it could not be derogated from where, in general, the duration of proceedings before the courts of the contracting state in which the court first seised was established was excessively long. An interpretation of art 21 of the convention whereby the application of that article could be set aside where the court first seised belonged to a member state in whose courts there were, in general, excessive delays in dealing with cases would be manifestly contrary both to the letter and spirit and to the aim of the convention. Firstly, the convention contained no provision under which its articles, in particular art 21, ceased to apply because of the length of proceedings before the courts of the contracting state concerned. Secondly, the convention was necessarily based on the trust which the contracting states accorded to each other's legal systems and judicial institutions. That mutual trust had enabled the establishment of a compulsory system of jurisdiction which the courts within the purview of the convention were required to respect and, as a corollary, waive the right to apply internal rules on the recognition and enforcement of foreign judgments in favour of a simplified mechanism (see judgment paras 70–73, below). c

Reference

By judgment of 25 March 2002, the Oberlandesgericht (Higher Regional Court) Innsbruck referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling under the Protocol of 3 June 1971 on the interpretation by the Court of Justice of the Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters 1968, a number of questions on the interpretation of art 21 of the above-mentioned convention, as amended by the Convention on the Accession of the Kingdom of Denmark, Ireland and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland 1978, by the Convention on the Accession of the Hellenic Republic 1982, by the Convention on the Accession of the Kingdom of Spain and the Portuguese Republic 1989 and by the Convention on the Accession of the Republic of Austria, the Republic of Finland and the Kingdom of Sweden 1996. Those questions were raised in proceedings between Erich Gasser GmbH (Gasser), a company incorporated under Austrian law, and MISAT Srl (MISAT), a company incorporated under Italian law, following a breakdown in their business relations. Written observations were submitted on behalf of: Gasser by K Schelling, Rechtsanwalt; MISAT by UC Walter, Rechtsanwältin; the Italian government by IM Braguglia, acting as agent, assisted by O Fiumara, Vice Avvocato Generale dello Stato; the United Kingdom government by K Manji, acting as agent, and by D Lloyd Jones QC; the Commission of the European Communities by A-M Rouchaud-Joët and S Grünheid, acting as agents. Oral observations were made on behalf of: Erich Gasser GmbH, the Italian government, the United Kingdom government and the Commission. The language of the case was German. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General. f a 9 September 2003. The Advocate General (P Léger) delivered the following opinion<sup>1</sup>.

1. This case concerns the interpretation of art 21 of the Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters<sup>2</sup>. That article, which deals with lis pendens, provides that, where
b identical proceedings are brought before two courts in different member states, the court second seised must stay proceedings and refer the matter to the court first seised as soon as the latter has established its jurisdiction.

2. In this case, the Oberlandesgericht (Higher Regional Court) Innsbruck, Austria has asked the Court of Justice of the European Communities to give its first ruling on whether the court second seised must comply with art 21 of the c Brussels Convention where that court has exclusive jurisdiction to hear the case under an agreement conferring jurisdiction. It also asks whether that court may derogate from the requirements of that article where proceedings before the courts of the member state in which the court first seised is established are, in general, excessively long (see [2003] II Pr 216).

d I—LAW

3. The aim of the Brussels Convention, according to its preamble, is to facilitate the recognition and enforcement of judgments in accordance with art 293 EC (formerly art 220 of the EC Treaty), and to strengthen in the European Community the legal protection of persons therein established.
e According to the relevant recital in that preamble, it is necessary for that purpose to determine the international jurisdiction of the courts of the contracting states.

4. The relevant provisions concern, on the one hand, jurisdiction and, on the other, the recognition in a contracting state of judgments delivered by the courts of another contracting state.

f 5. The provisions relating to jurisdiction are contained in Title II of the Brussels Convention.

6. Article 2 lays down the general rule that the courts of the state in which the defendant is domiciled are to have jurisdiction. Articles 5 and 6 provide the claimant with several options in the form of a number of special heads of jurisdiction. In particular, art 5 provides that, in matters relating to a contract, g the defendant may be sued in the courts for the place where the obligation which the action seeks to enforce was or should have been performed.

7. The Brussels Convention also lays down, in Sections 3 and 4 of Title II, mandatory rules of jurisdiction in matters relating to insurance and consumer contracts.

h 8. Furthermore, art 16 of the convention lays down rules governing exclusive jurisdiction. That article provides, for example, that, in proceedings which have Convention as amended by the Convention on the Accession of the Kingdom of Denmark, Ireland and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to the Brussels Convention 1978 (OJ 1978 L304 p 1, and—amended text—p 77), by the Convention on the Accession of the Hellenic Republic to the Brussels Convention 1982 (OJ 1982 L388 p 1), by the Convention on the Accession of the Kingdom of Spain and the Portuguese Republic (OJ 1989 L285 p 1) and by the Convention on the Accession of the Republic of Austria, the Republic of Finland and the Kingdom of Sweden to the Brussels Convention 1996 (OJ 1997 C15 p 1). A consolidated version of the convention, as amended by those four conventions of accession, is published in OJ 1998 C27 p 1 (hereinafter the Brussels Convention).

as their object rights in rem in immovable property, the courts of the contracting state in which the property is situated are to have exclusive jurisdiction, regardless of domicile. a

9. Articles 17 and 18 relate to prorogation of jurisdiction. Article 17 concerns agreements conferring jurisdiction. It is worded as follows:

‘(1) If the parties, one or more of whom is domiciled in a Contracting State, have agreed that a court or the courts of a Contracting State are to have jurisdiction to settle any disputes which have arisen or which may arise in connection with a particular legal relationship, that court or those courts shall have exclusive jurisdiction. Such an agreement conferring jurisdiction shall be either: b

(a) in writing or evidenced in writing, or c

(b) in a form which accords with practices which the parties have established between themselves, or

(c) in international trade or commerce, in a form which accords with a usage of which the parties are or ought to have been aware and which in such trade or commerce is widely known to, and regularly observed by, parties to contracts of the type involved in the particular trade or commerce concerned ... d

(3) Agreements ... conferring jurisdiction shall have no legal force if they are contrary to the provisions [laid down in matters relating to insurance and consumer contracts], or if the courts whose jurisdiction they purport to exclude have exclusive jurisdiction by virtue of Article 16 ...’ e

10. Article 18 provides:

‘Apart from jurisdiction derived from other provisions of this Convention, a court of a Contracting State before whom a defendant enters an appearance shall have jurisdiction. This rule shall not apply where appearance was entered solely to contest the jurisdiction, or where another court has exclusive jurisdiction by virtue of Article 16.’ f

11. The Brussels Convention is also intended to prevent irreconcilable judgments from being given. To that effect, art 21 is worded as follows:

‘Where proceedings involving the same cause of action and between the same parties are brought in the courts of different Contracting States, any court other than the court first seised shall of its own motion stay its proceedings until such time as the jurisdiction of the court first seised is established. g

Where the jurisdiction of the court first seised is established, any court other than the court first seised shall decline jurisdiction in favour of that court.’ h

12. The provisions concerning recognition and enforcement appear under Title III of the Brussels Convention. Article 27 provides:

‘A judgment shall not be recognised ...

(3) if the judgment is irreconcilable with a judgment given in a dispute between the same parties in the State in which recognition is sought ...’ i

13. In accordance with the first paragraph of art 28, ‘[m]oreover, a judgment shall not be recognised if it conflicts with the provisions ... [in matters relating to insurance and consumer contracts or with those referred to in art 16]’.

a II—FACTS AND PROCEDURE

14. Erich Gasser GmbH<sup>3</sup> is a company whose registered office is in Dornbirn, Austria. For several years, it sold children's clothing to MISAT Srl<sup>4</sup>, a company established in Rome, Italy. Early in the year 2000, contractual relations between the parties were broken off.

b 15. By application of 14 April 2000, MISAT brought an action against Gasser before the Tribunale civile e penale di Roma (Civil and Criminal District Court, Rome) seeking a ruling that the contract between them had terminated ipso jure. In the alternative, it sought from that court a declaration that the contract had been terminated following a disagreement, that no failure to perform the contract could be attributed to MISAT and that Gasser's conduct had been unlawful, and an order requiring Gasser to pay MISAT damages for the losses sustained and to reimburse certain costs.

c 16. By application of 4 December 2000, Gasser brought an action against MISAT before the Landesgericht (Regional Court) Feldkirch, Austria, for payment of outstanding invoices. Gasser contended that that court had jurisdiction on the ground that it was the court for the place of performance of the contract. Gasser also contended that that court had jurisdiction under an agreement conferring jurisdiction. In support of that contention, it argued that all the invoices issued to MISAT stated that the court with jurisdiction in the event of a dispute would be the court in whose jurisdiction Dornbirn is located, and that MISAT had accepted those invoices without disputing them. According to Gasser, this showed that, in accordance with their practice and the usage prevailing in trade and commerce between Austria and Italy, the parties had concluded an agreement conferring jurisdiction within the meaning of art 17 of the Brussels Convention.

d 17. MISAT pleaded that the Austrian court had no jurisdiction. It argued that the court of competent jurisdiction was that where the defendant was established, under the general rule laid down in art 2 of the Brussels Convention. It disputed the existence of an agreement conferring jurisdiction and stated that it had previously brought an action before the Tribunale civile e penale di Roma on the basis of the same business relationship.

e 18. The Landesgericht Feldkirch decided to stay proceedings, pursuant to art 21 of the Brussels Convention, until such time as the jurisdiction of the Tribunale civile e penale di Roma, the court first seised, had been established. It confirmed its own jurisdiction as the court for the place of performance of the contract, but it did not rule on the existence of an agreement conferring jurisdiction.

f 19. Gasser appealed against that decision to the Oberlandesgericht Innsbruck, contending that the Landesgericht Feldkirch should be declared to have jurisdiction and that the proceedings should not be stayed.

g 20. The Oberlandesgericht Innsbruck stated, first, that the proceedings before the Landesgericht Feldkirch and the Tribunale civile e penale di Roma had been brought by the same parties and must be regarded as having the same cause of action within the meaning of the court's case law, with the result that this was indeed a case of lis pendens.

i 21. It stated, next, that while the Landesgericht Feldkirch had pointed out that the invoices issued by Gasser to MISAT designated it as the court of 3 Hereinafter Gasser.

4 Hereinafter MISAT.

competent jurisdiction, it had not ruled on the other evidence put forward by Gasser as proof of the existence of an agreement conferring jurisdiction. a

22. In that regard, the Oberlandesgericht Innsbruck noted that, under sub-para (a), (b), and (c) of the first paragraph of art 17 of the Brussels Convention, an agreement conferring jurisdiction must be either in writing or evidenced in writing, or in a form which accords with the practices between the parties, or, in international trade or commerce, in a form which accords with a usage of which the parties were or ought to have been aware and which is widely known to, and regularly observed by, parties to contracts of the type involved in the particular trade or commerce concerned. It took the view that the first two formal conditions relating to an agreement conferring jurisdiction were not fulfilled. It stated that the question none the less arose whether the conditions laid down in sub-para (c) of the first paragraph of art 17 were satisfied. It pointed out that, in its judgment in Mainschiffahrts-Genossenschaft eG (MSG) v Les Gravières Rhénanes SARL<sup>5</sup>, the court held that the fact that one of the parties repeatedly paid without objection invoices issued by the other party containing a jurisdiction clause may be deemed to constitute agreement to that clause, provided that such conduct is consistent with a practice in force in the area of international trade or commerce in which the parties in question are operating and the parties are or ought to have been aware of that practice. b

23. It stated that, if the existence of such an agreement were established, the Landesgericht Feldkirch would have exclusive jurisdiction to deal with the dispute under art 17 of the Brussels Convention. The question would then arise whether that court may review the jurisdiction of the Tribunale civile e penale di Roma. c

24. Lastly, the Oberlandesgericht Innsbruck noted Gasser's contention that its rights had been adversely affected by the excessive length of proceedings in Latin countries. d

III—THE QUESTIONS REFERRED TO THE COURT OF JUSTICE e

25. It was in those circumstances that the Oberlandesgericht Innsbruck decided to refer the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling (see [2003] IL Pr 216 at 231–232): f

(1) May a court which refers questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling do so purely on the basis of a party's (unrefuted) submissions, whether they have been contested or not contested (on good grounds), or is it first required to clarify those questions as regards the facts by the taking of appropriate evidence (and if so, to what extent)? g

(2) May a court other than the court first seised, within the meaning of the first paragraph of Art. 21 of the Brussels Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters ["the Brussels Convention"] review the jurisdiction of the court first seised if the second court has exclusive jurisdiction pursuant to an agreement conferring jurisdiction under Art. 17 of the Brussels Convention, or must the agreed second court proceed in accordance with Art. 21 of the Brussels Convention notwithstanding the agreement conferring jurisdiction? h

(3) Can the fact that court proceedings in a contracting state take an unjustifiably long time (for reasons largely unconnected with the conduct of the parties) so that material detriment may be caused to one party, have i a the consequence that the court other than the court first seised, within the meaning of the first paragraph of Art. 21, is not allowed to proceed in accordance with that provision?

b (4) Do the legal proceedings provided for by Italian Law No. 89 of March 24, 2001 justify the application of Art. 21 of the Brussels Convention even if a party is at risk of detriment as a consequence of the possible excessive length of proceedings before the Italian court and therefore, as suggested in Question 3, it would not actually be appropriate to proceed in accordance with Art. 21?

(5) Under what conditions must the court other than the court first seised refrain from applying Art. 21 of the Brussels Convention?

c (6) What course of action must the court follow if, in the circumstances described in Question 3, it is not allowed to apply Art. 21 of the Brussels Convention?

d Should it be necessary in any event, even in the circumstances described in Question 3, to proceed in accordance with Art. 21 of the Brussels Convention, there is no need to answer Questions 4, 5 and 6.'

IV—ANALYSIS

A—The first question

e 26. By its first question, the referring court seeks to ascertain whether a national court may ask the Court of Justice to interpret the Brussels Convention on the basis of the submissions of a party the merits of which that national court has not assessed. The national court is thus referring to the fact that the second question is based on the premiss that the court in whose jurisdiction Dornbirn is located has jurisdiction to give judgment in the main proceedings under an agreement conferring jurisdiction within the meaning of art 17 of the Brussels Convention, even though the existence of such an agreement conferring jurisdiction has not been confirmed by the court hearing the substance of the case.

f 27. I consider that the answer to the first question referred can be inferred from the court's case law on the admissibility of questions referred for a preliminary ruling both under the Protocol of 3 June 1971 concerning the interpretation by the Court of Justice<sup>6</sup> of the Brussels Convention (the Protocol), and under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty).

g 28. Article 3 of the Protocol provides that, where a question relating to the interpretation of the convention is raised in a case pending, the court seised may or must request the Court of Justice to give a ruling on that question if it considers that a decision on the matter is necessary to enable it to give judgment. Article 3 of the Protocol therefore follows the same logic as art 234 EC. In both cases, the reference for a preliminary ruling is intended to enable the Court of Justice to provide the national court with the interpretation it needs to give a judgment applying the provision whose interpretation is sought<sup>7</sup>. The court, logically, inferred from this that its case law concerning its jurisdiction to give preliminary rulings under art 234 EC can be transposed to requests for interpretation of the Brussels Convention<sup>8</sup>.

6 OJ 1975 L204 p 28, as amended by the conventions on accession.

7 See the opinion of Advocate General Tesouro in Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Glasgow City Council Case C-346/93 [1995] All ER (EC) 514, [1995] ECR I-615 (para 17).

8 See Van den Boogaard v Laumen Case C-220/95 [1997] All ER (EC) 517, [1997] ECR I-1147 (para 16), Farrell v Long Case C-295/95 [1997] All ER (EC) 449, [1997] ECR I-1683 (para 11), Trasporti Castelletti

29. According to settled case law, the procedure laid down in art 234 EC constitutes an instrument of co-operation between the Court of Justice and the national courts. Within the context of this co-operation, it is for the national court before which the dispute has been brought, and which must assume the responsibility for the subsequent judicial decision, to determine both the need for a preliminary ruling and the relevance of the questions which it submits to the Court of Justice. Consequently, since the questions referred concern the interpretation of Community law, the court is, in principle, obliged to give a ruling<sup>9</sup>.

30. The Court of Justice has consistently inferred from the fact that jurisdiction lies in principle with the national court that it is for that court, which alone has a direct knowledge of the facts of the main proceedings and of the arguments of the parties, to decide, in the light of considerations of procedural economy and expediency, at what stage in the proceedings it is necessary to submit a question to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling<sup>10</sup>.

31. However, the determinations made by the national court in exercising that jurisdiction may be subject to review by the Court of Justice. The latter has thus held that, in exceptional circumstances, it should examine the conditions in which the case was referred to it by the national court in order to determine whether it has jurisdiction<sup>11</sup>. It has held that the spirit of co-operation which must prevail in the preliminary ruling procedure requires the national court, for its part, to have regard to the function entrusted to the Court of Justice, which is to assist in the administration of justice in the member states and not to deliver advisory opinions on general and hypothetical questions<sup>12</sup>.

32. In this respect, it has pointed out that, in order to enable it to provide the national court with an interpretation of Community law which will be of use to it in giving judgment in the main proceedings, the national court must define the legal context in which the interpretation requested should be placed. With that in mind, the court has taken the view that it might be convenient, depending on the circumstances and without calling into question the principle that the referring court has exclusive jurisdiction to determine at what stage of the proceedings the reference for a preliminary ruling should be made, for the facts in the case to be established and for questions of purely national law to be a settled at the time the reference is made to the Court of Justice, so as to enable the latter to take cognisance of all the features of fact and of law which may be relevant to the interpretation which it is called upon to give<sup>13</sup>. Furthermore, it is essential for the national court to explain why it considers that an answer to its questions is necessary<sup>14</sup>.

b 33. The court has already had occasion to determine whether the above-mentioned conditions are satisfied and to consider itself to have jurisdiction in the case of a question referred to it for a preliminary ruling on the basis of a premiss the well-foundedness of which is a precondition for applying the provision whose interpretation has been sought, for the purpose of giving judgment in the main proceedings.

c 34. Thus, in Enderby v Frenchay Health Authority<sup>15</sup>, the Court of Appeal (England and Wales) asked the Court of Justice whether the principle of equal pay for male and female workers for equal work or work of equal value, laid down in art 141 EC (formerly art 119 of the EC Treaty), required an employer to justify objectively a difference in pay between the job of principal speech therapist and that of principal pharmacist. The Court of Appeal had proceeded d on the premiss that those two different jobs were of equal value.

35. In its observations to the court, the German government submitted that the court could not rule on the question referred to it without first determining whether the two jobs at issue were equivalent. Since, in its view, they were not, there could be no infringement of art 141 EC.

e 36. The court rejected that argument. It stated that the Court of Appeal had decided in accordance with the British legislation and with the agreement of the parties to examine the question of the objective justification of the difference in pay before that of the equivalence of the jobs in issue, which might require more complex investigation. It was for that reason that the questions referred were based on the assumption that those jobs were of equal value<sup>16</sup>. It went on to say (at para 12) that, where the court, as in that case, f receives a request for interpretation of Community law which is not manifestly unrelated to the reality or the subject matter of the main proceedings, it must reply to that request and is not required to consider the validity of a hypothesis which it is for the referring court to review subsequently if that should prove to be necessary<sup>17</sup>.

g 37. The court adopted the same position in its judgment in the JämO case, cited in footnote 10, above, in a similar context<sup>18</sup>. It held, in particular, that it is h 13 See the Irish Creamery case (para 6), Dias v Director da Alfândega do Porto Case C-343/90 [1992] ECR I-4673 (para 19), and the above-mentioned judgments in Meilicke's case (para 26), Høj Pedersen's case (para 45) and the JämO case (para 31). According to what is now settled case law, 'the need to provide an interpretation of Community law which will be of use to the national court makes it necessary that the national court define the factual and legislative context of the questions it is asking or, at the very least, explain the factual circumstances on which those questions are based'. See, in particular, Joined Cases C-320/90 to C-322/90 Telemarsicabruzzo SpA v Circostel Joined cases C-320/90 to C-322/90 [1993] ECR I-393 (para 6) and Association Basco-Béarnaise des Opticiens Indépendants v Prefet des Pyrénées-Atlantiques Case C-109/99 [2000] ECR I-7247 (para 42).

18 In that case, the Arbetsdomstolen (Labour Court) referred to the court for a preliminary ruling several questions intended to enable it to determine whether an employer had paid midwives less than a clinical technician, without adopting a position as to whether the work of those two categories of employee was equivalent.

for the national court, which alone has a direct knowledge of the facts of the case and of the arguments of the parties and which must assume responsibility for giving judgment in the case, to decide at what stage in the proceedings it requires a preliminary ruling and to determine the relevance of the questions it refers to the court<sup>19</sup>. In that case, it was also argued that determining whether the work was of equal value would require complex and costly investigations<sup>20</sup>.

38. Like the Commission of the European Communities, I consider that that case law can be transposed to the present case. First, although it is regrettable that the referring court has not provided a detailed explanation in this regard, I share the Commission's view that determining the existence in the particular trade or commerce concerned of a usage in international trade or commerce which is widely known to, and regularly observed by, parties to contracts of the type involved may indeed necessitate long and costly investigations.

39. Second, it is clear from the order for reference that the way in which the dispute in the main proceedings is dealt with by the Oberlandesgericht Innsbruck will be completely different depending on whether the court's answer to the question whether the court second seised may derogate from the requirements of art 21 of the Brussels Convention where that court has jurisdiction pursuant to an agreement conferring jurisdiction is in the affirmative or in the negative. If that question is answered in the affirmative, the referring court will have to rule on whether such an agreement exists. If the existence of that agreement is established, the Austrian court will have exclusive jurisdiction to give judgment on the dispute between the parties. Conversely, if the answer is in the negative, the examination of the existence of an agreement conferring jurisdiction will no longer be relevant and art 21 of the Brussels Convention will have to apply.

40. Last, the referring court has explained why, in the light of the judgment in the MSG case, cited in footnote 5, above, MISAT's acceptance of invoices containing a clause designating the court in whose jurisdiction Dornbirn is located as having jurisdiction to rule on any dispute between the parties must be regarded as initial evidence of the existence of an agreement conferring jurisdiction within the meaning of sub-para (c) of the first paragraph of art 17 of the Brussels Convention. The other conditions laid down in that provision, namely that the usage in the particular trade or commerce concerned must be one which is accepted in international trade or commerce and of which the parties are or ought to have been aware, are not disputed in a specific and reasoned manner by MISAT. There is therefore nothing to indicate that the premiss relating to the existence of an agreement conferring jurisdiction is manifestly erroneous.

41. The second question, which seeks to ascertain whether the existence of an agreement conferring jurisdiction permits derogation from art 21 of the Brussels Convention, is therefore highly material to the decision to be given in the main proceedings. The action taken by the referring court in asking the Court of Justice about the effects of an agreement conferring jurisdiction, before starting the investigations which might be required in the present case to establish the existence of such an agreement, cannot therefore be regarded, in my view, as a failure by that court to discharge the duty to co-operate which underpins the preliminary ruling procedure.

- a 42. In the light of the foregoing, I propose that the answer to the first question should be that it is for the national court to determine whether to refer a question to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling on the basis of a party's submissions or whether it is necessary to verify those submissions first. It is nevertheless incumbent on the national court to provide the Court of Justice with the factual and legal information enabling it to give an answer which will be of use to it in giving judgment in the main proceedings and to explain why it considers an answer to its questions to be necessary.
- b

B—The second question

- c 43. By this question, the referring court is essentially asking whether art 21 of the Brussels Convention must be interpreted as meaning that a court second seised which has exclusive jurisdiction under an agreement conferring jurisdiction may, by way of derogation from that article, give judgment in the case without waiting for a declaration from the court first seised that it has no jurisdiction. In other words, the referring court seeks to ascertain whether art 17 of the Brussels Convention constitutes a derogation from art 21 of the same convention.
- d

- e 44. Article 21 of the Brussels Convention is intended, in the interests of the sound administration of justice within the Community, to prevent parallel proceedings before the courts of different contracting states and to avoid conflicts between decisions which might result therefrom. Those rules are therefore designed to preclude, so far as possible and from the outset, the possibility of a situation arising such as that referred to in art 27(3) of the convention, that is to say the non-recognition of a judgment on account of its irreconcilability with a judgment given in proceedings between the same parties in the state in which recognition is sought<sup>21</sup>.

- f 45. In pursuit of the objectives set out above, art 21 provides a simple system for determining at the start of proceedings which of the courts seised will ultimately have jurisdiction to give judgment in the case. That system is based on the chronological order in which those courts are seised. It requires the court second seised to stay the proceedings until such time as the court first seised has given a decision as to its own jurisdiction. It is this effect of blocking the proceedings before the court second seised, an integral part of art 21 of the Brussels Convention, which is at the centre of these preliminary ruling proceedings.
- g

- h 46. In its observations on the third question, Gasser, in arguing that that article should not be applied, asks the court to reconsider its case law on the subject, which began with the judgment in Gubisch Maschinenfabrik KG v Palumbo<sup>22</sup>, in which the court held (at paras 15–17) that an action for the rescission or discharge of a contract involves the same cause of action as an action to enforce the same contract<sup>23</sup>. It was in the light of that case law that the referring court was able to consider that the action brought before the Landesgericht Feldkirch involved the same cause of action as the action brought previously before the Tribunale civile e penale di Roma.

21 See Overseas Union Insurance Ltd v New Hampshire Insurance Co Case C-351/89 [1992] 2 All ER 138, [1991] ECR I-3317 (para 16).

22 Case 144/86 [1987] ECR 4861.

23 That case concerned an action seeking to have a machine sales contract declared void or, in the alternative, rescinded, and an action for payment for the machine at issue.

47. I take the view that there is no reason in these proceedings for the court to depart from that broad interpretation of cause of action within the meaning of art 21 of the Brussels Convention. First, although it has generally been contested by legal writers, that interpretation was implicitly confirmed in the judgment in the Overseas Union Insurance case, cited in footnote 21, above<sup>24</sup>. It was clearly maintained in the judgment in The Maciej Rataj, Tetry (cargo owners) v Maciej Rataj (owners)<sup>25</sup>, in which the court held that an action seeking to have the defendant held liable for causing loss and ordered to pay damages has the same cause of action and the same object as earlier proceedings brought by that defendant seeking a declaration that he is not liable for that loss<sup>26</sup>. It was reiterated more recently in the judgment in the Gantner Electronic case, cited in footnote 8, above<sup>27</sup>.

48. Furthermore, another solution to the problem raised by Gasser may be inferred from case law. In its judgment in the Overseas Union Insurance case, cited in footnote 21, above, the court held that the requirements of art 21 of the Brussels Convention may be derogated from where the court second seised has exclusive jurisdiction to hear the case. I consider that that case law may be extended to circumstances in which the court second seised has exclusive jurisdiction under an agreement conferring jurisdiction.

49. It is appropriate to recall the context in which the judgment in the Overseas Union Insurance case, cited in footnote 21, above, was delivered. In that case, the court was faced with the following situation. In 1980, New Hampshire Insurance Co<sup>28</sup>, registered in England as an overseas company, reinsured with three companies also registered in England a risk which it had covered for the benefit of the French company Nouvelles Galeries Réunies. In July 1986, the three reinsurers ceased payment of claims. By applications lodged in 1987 and in February 1988, New Hampshire brought actions against the reinsurers for enforced performance of the contract before the Tribunal de Commerce (Commercial Court), Paris. On 6 April 1988, the three reinsurers themselves brought an action against New Hampshire before the Commercial Court of the Queen's Bench Division seeking a declaration that they were no longer bound to perform any commitments which might arise from the reinsurance policies. That court decided to stay the proceedings pursuant to the second paragraph of art 21 of the Brussels Convention until such time as the French court had given a decision on the question of its own jurisdiction in the disputes pending before it.

50. The three reinsurers appealed against that decision to the Court of Appeal, which referred to the Court of Justice questions seeking to ascertain, in particular, whether art 21 must be interpreted as meaning that the court second seised may only stay proceedings where it does not decline jurisdiction, or whether that provision authorises or obliges it to examine the jurisdiction of the court first seised, and to what extent<sup>29</sup>.

28 Hereinafter New Hampshire.

29 In order fully to understand the wording of the questions raised by the referring court, it must be remembered that art 21 of the Brussels Convention, in the version applicable in that case, read as follows: 'Where proceedings involving the same cause of action and between the same parties are brought in the courts of different Contracting States, any court other than the court first seised shall of its own motion decline jurisdiction in favour of that court. A court which would be required to a 51. The Court of Justice ruled that—‘without prejudice to the case where the court second seised has exclusive jurisdiction under the [Brussels Convention] and in particular under art 16 thereof, art 21 of the Convention must be interpreted as meaning that, where the jurisdiction of the court first seised is contested, the court second seised may, if it does not decline jurisdiction, only stay proceedings and may not itself examine the jurisdiction of the court first seised.’<sup>30</sup>

c 52. It follows from the court’s answer that a court second seised which has exclusive jurisdiction to hear the case, in particular under art 16 of the Brussels Convention, is not obliged to stay proceedings until such time as the court first seised has declared that it has no jurisdiction. The court second seised may therefore continue to examine the merits of the case and give judgment in it.

d 53. In this case, that judgment has been interpreted in different ways by those who have submitted observations as to whether art 17, like art 16, may constitute a derogation from the requirements of art 21 of the Brussels Convention. The Commission, the Italian government and MISAT consider that the derogation thus accepted by the court in that judgment does not apply to art 17 of the convention.

e 54. The Commission takes the view that such a derogation is justified in the case of art 16 by the first paragraph of art 28 of the Brussels Convention, according to which decisions given by a court in breach of art 16 cannot be recognised in any other contracting state. It would therefore be absurd to require the court with exclusive jurisdiction under art 16 to stay proceedings, since a decision given by the court first seised, which would by definition have no jurisdiction, could take effect only in the state where it was given. The first paragraph of art 28 of the Brussels Convention, it submits, is not applicable where the court second seised has jurisdiction under an agreement conferring jurisdiction within the meaning of art 17.

f 55. The Commission considers that, since it cannot be completely ruled out that the court first seised might make a different assessment as to existence of an agreement conferring jurisdiction from that of the court second seised, contradictory decisions on the substance of the case might ensue if the court second seised did not stay proceedings. The parties would then find themselves in the situation envisaged in art 27(3) of the Brussels Convention, which states that a judgment given in another contracting state is not recognised if it is irreconcilable with a judgment given in a dispute between the same parties in the state in which recognition is sought, a situation that art 21 specifically seeks to avoid.

h 56. In addition, it points out that the jurisdiction conferred by art 17 is less effective than that arising from art 16 because the parties cannot refrain from applying the latter article, whereas they can always terminate an agreement

i decline jurisdiction may stay its proceedings if the jurisdiction of the other court is contested.’ The new wording of art 21, to the effect that, in the event of lis pendens, the court second seised must stay proceedings until such time as the jurisdiction of the court first seised is established, in no way changes the conclusions to be drawn from the judgment in the Overseas Union Insurance case with respect to the answer to the question referred in this case. This new wording, which derives from the 1989 accession convention, does not change the meaning or the scope of that article but seeks to ensure that the court second seised does not decline jurisdiction to hear the case before being certain that the court first seised has jurisdiction to hear it, so as to avoid any jurisdictional vacuum.

conferring jurisdiction or waive their right to rely on it. Under art 18 of the Brussels Convention, if the defendant enters an appearance before the court first seised without raising an objection as to lack of jurisdiction on the basis of an agreement conferring jurisdiction, that court may hear and determine the case. a

57. I do not share that view. Like Gasser and the United Kingdom government, I consider that art 17 of the Brussels Convention may constitute a derogation from art 21 thereof. That analysis is based on the following considerations. First, courts designated under an agreement conferring jurisdiction in accordance with art 17 have jurisdiction which may be described as exclusive. Second, the argument that the court second seised is obliged to comply with the requirements of art 21 even if it has exclusive jurisdiction under an agreement conferring jurisdiction is such as to undermine the effectiveness of art 17 and the legal certainty that attaches to it. Third, the risk of irreconcilable decisions can be significantly reduced. b

58. First, the most important point to bear in mind is that, in the Overseas Union Insurance case (para 26), the court ruled that the requirements of art 21 of the Brussels Convention might be derogated from in 'the case where the court second seised has exclusive jurisdiction under the convention and in particular under art 16 thereof'. In my view, there are two points to be made about the wording of that derogation. The first is that, by using the adverb 'in particular', the court meant to indicate that that derogation is not confined solely to the cases of exclusive jurisdiction covered by art 16. The second is that the court likewise did not refer, as it could have done, only to the cases of exclusive jurisdiction covered by the first paragraph of art 28 of the Brussels Convention, namely the heads of jurisdiction provided for in matters of insurance or consumer contracts or by art 16. There is therefore nothing in the judgment in the Overseas Union Insurance case to suggest that the exclusive jurisdiction referred to in art 17 is excluded from the derogation from the requirements of art 21, which was accepted by the court in that judgment. d

59. Next, it should be pointed out that, since the court was not asked a question on this matter, it gave no explanation of the grounds capable of justifying that derogation. I take the view that that derogation can be explained as follows. Since the court first seised can only declare that it has no jurisdiction, it is pointless, in such a situation, to oblige the court second seised to stay proceedings. In other words, where the court second seised has exclusive jurisdiction, there is no lis pendens, since this requires that the two courts seised of the same dispute should both have jurisdiction to hear the case<sup>31</sup>. g

60. That reasoning can be transposed to art 17 of the Brussels Convention. As the wording of that article makes clear, the court or courts designated by the parties pursuant to that article 'shall have exclusive jurisdiction'. Read in conjunction with art 18 of the Brussels Convention, art 17 means that, where the parties are bound by an agreement conferring jurisdiction under that article, any other court seised by one of the parties has no jurisdiction, otherwise than with the consent of the defendant. It follows that if, as appears to be the situation here, the defendant contests the jurisdiction of the court first seised by the other party in breach of an agreement conferring jurisdiction, that court must, on the basis of that clause, declare that it has no h

a jurisdiction. The Schlosser report<sup>32</sup> states that that court must even do so of its own motion if the defendant does not enter an appearance<sup>33</sup>.

b 61. In such circumstances, the jurisdiction of the court designated by the parties in the agreement conferring jurisdiction does indeed preclude the jurisdiction of the courts designated under the Brussels Convention by the general rule laid down in art 2 and the rules of special jurisdiction contained in arts 5 and 6<sup>34</sup>. In this respect, the effects of art 17 are therefore similar to those of art 16. It may therefore seem just as pointless to require the court second seised to stay proceedings when its jurisdiction derives from art 17 as when it is based on art 16.

c 62. Second, such an obligation would be liable to jeopardise the effectiveness of art 17 and the legal certainty which attaches to it.

d 63. For the purposes of determining the effectiveness of art 17 of the Brussels Convention, it should be borne in mind that that article is intended to leave room for the voluntary prorogation of jurisdiction. It is therefore the consensus between the parties which permits derogation from the rules of general and special jurisdiction laid down in arts 2, 5 and 6 of the Brussels Convention. Consequently, the requirement of their consent to this exceptional attribution of jurisdiction is inherent in the spirit of that article. Accordingly, in its judgments in Estasis Salotti di Colzani Aimo e Gianmario Colzani v RüWA Polstereimaschinen GmbH<sup>35</sup> and Galleries Segoura SPRL v Bonakdarian<sup>36</sup>, the court held that art 17 of the Brussels Convention requires the court seised to examine whether the clause which confers jurisdiction on it was indeed the result of consent between the parties<sup>37</sup>.

e 64. Such consent by the parties is also the basis for agreements conferring jurisdiction concluded in accordance with a usage in international trade or commerce. That reference to a usage in international trade or commerce was of course added in the 1978 accession convention to make the formal conditions originally laid down in the Brussels Convention more flexible, in other words an agreement concluded in writing or a verbal agreement evidenced subsequently in writing<sup>38</sup>. However, the court has held that, in spite of that new flexibility, real consent remains one of the objectives of art 17. That requirement of real consent is justified by the concern to protect the weaker party to the contract by preventing jurisdiction clauses, incorporated in a contract by one party, from going unnoticed<sup>39</sup>. The court has thus held that the contracting parties' consent to a jurisdiction clause is presumed to exist where their conduct is consistent with a usage which governs the branch of international trade or commerce in which they operate and of which they are, or ought to have been, aware<sup>40</sup>. a

65. It follows that art 17 upholds the autonomy of the consensus formed between the parties by conferring exclusive jurisdiction on the courts so designated by them, by way of derogation from the rules of jurisdiction laid down by the Brussels Convention, but subject to those contained in the fourth paragraph of that article. As the court has held, art 17 is intended to designate, clearly and precisely, a court in a contracting state which is to have exclusive jurisdiction in accordance with the consensus formed between the parties, which is to be expressed in accordance with the strict requirements as to form laid down therein<sup>41</sup>. Article 17 thus seeks to secure legal certainty by enabling the parties to determine which court will have jurisdiction. b c

66. In this way, art 17 is entirely in harmony with the objectives of the Brussels Convention. Indeed, as the court has consistently held, the convention seeks to unify the rules on jurisdiction of the contracting states' courts, so as to avoid as far as possible the multiplication of heads of jurisdiction in relation to one and the same legal relationship and to reinforce the legal protection available to persons established in the Community by, at the same time, allowing the claimant easily to identify the court before which he may bring an action and the defendant reasonably to foresee the court before which he may be sued<sup>42</sup>. d

67. If, however, under art 21 of the Brussels Convention, the court with exclusive jurisdiction is obliged to stay proceedings until such time as the court first seised declares that it has no jurisdiction, the effectiveness of art 17 and, thus, the legal certainty to which it contributes would, in my view, be seriously jeopardised. For, in such a situation, a party who, in breach of his obligations under the agreement conferring jurisdiction, commenced proceedings first and did so before a court which he knew to have no jurisdiction could unreasonably delay judgment on the substance of a case in which he knew he would be unsuccessful. A party who failed to discharge his commitments in that way, by seising a court other than the one designated in the agreement conferring jurisdiction, would therefore derive an advantage from such a failure. e f

68. That is a disturbing consequence as far as principles are concerned and runs the risk of encouraging dilatory conduct. A party seeking to delay judgment on the substance of a case might thus be encouraged to take the initiative and bring an action before a court which has no jurisdiction and which is less convenient for the other party, so as to bring to a halt any action based on the same contract until such time as that court declares that it has no jurisdiction. In that regard, I share the view of the United Kingdom government that that risk is all the more worthy of consideration since the legal systems of the contracting states generally allow proceedings to be brought for a declaration of non-liability. g h

69. Unlike the Commission, I do not consider this problem to be attributable solely to the domestic judicial systems of the member states and the speed with which national courts seised in breach of an agreement conferring jurisdiction are able to give a decision as to their jurisdiction. After all, however quickly i a such a decision can be given, the defendant can still avail himself of all the remedies available under national law in order to put off the moment when the decision as to that court's lack of jurisdiction becomes final. I therefore take the view that the problem lies primarily in the interpretation of the Brussels Convention.

b 70. That is why I propose that the court should adopt a solution which can ensure the effectiveness of art 17 and the legal certainty to which it contributes. Indeed, a solution of this kind seems to me to be in keeping with the case law on the interpretation of that article, according to which its interpretation must respect the consensus of the parties. Accordingly, in its judgment in Elefanten Schuh GmbH v Jacqmain<sup>43</sup>, the court held that the legislation of a contracting state cannot allow the validity of an agreement conferring jurisdiction to be called in question solely on the ground that the language used is not that prescribed by that legislation. More recently, in its judgment in Benincasa's case, cited in footnote 41, above, the court found that a court in a contracting state which is designated in a clause conferring jurisdiction validly concluded under art 17 of the Brussels Convention also has exclusive jurisdiction where the action seeks a declaration that the contract containing that clause is void. According to the court (at para 29), the—e 'legal certainty which that provision seeks to secure could easily be jeopardised if one party to the contract could frustrate that rule of the [Brussels Convention] simply by claiming that the whole of the contract was void on grounds derived from the applicable substantive law.'<sup>44</sup>

f 71. Furthermore, that interpretation has the advantage of taking into consideration the requirements of international trade or commerce. I support the argument put forward by the United Kingdom government that the sound development of international commercial relations requires that companies be able to trust the agreements between them. That requirement also extends to agreements by which the parties determine which courts will be responsible for settling disputes arising in the performance of their reciprocal obligations. Lastly, it seems undeniable that a delay in the settlement of those disputes can result in significant losses for economic operators, particularly where they relate to the payment of invoices for small and medium-sized enterprises. In that regard, the solution I propose is also in keeping with the intentions of those who drafted the Brussels Convention, since it was precisely in order to satisfy the requirements of international trade and commerce that, in 1978, they made the formal rules contained in art 17 more flexible by adding to the original two rules a reference to usage in international trade or commerce<sup>45</sup>. If the court accepts that, where a court is the court second seised and has exclusive jurisdiction under an agreement conferring jurisdiction it may continue to examine the substance of the dispute without waiting for a declaration from the court first seised that it has no jurisdiction, it will indisputably facilitate the implementation of agreements conferring jurisdiction incorporated in contractual documents or documents issued in the context of those relations, such as invoices.

i 72. Third, I consider that the risk of irreconcilable judgments being delivered can be significantly reduced.

43 Case 150/80 [1981] ECR 1671.

44 See also Coreck Maritime GmbH v Handelsveem BV Case C-387/98 [2000] ECR I-9337 (para 14).

45 See the Schlosser Report, cited in footnote 32, above (para 179).

73. In order to counter that risk, the United Kingdom government proposes that the Court of Justice rule that a court first seised whose jurisdiction is contested in reliance on a clause conferring jurisdiction must stay proceedings until the court which is designated by that clause and is the court second seised has given a decision as to its jurisdiction. a

74. I do not indorse such a solution. In my view, it might encourage the very delaying tactics we are seeking to avoid. It would allow an unscrupulous party to contest the jurisdiction of the court before which proceedings had been brought against him under arts 2, 5 or 6 of the Brussels Convention by the artifice of alleging the existence of an agreement conferring jurisdiction and to bring an action before the court supposedly designated in order deliberately to delay judgment in the case until such time as that court had declared that it had no jurisdiction. b

75. In point of fact, the risk of irreconcilable judgments being given and, consequently, the resultant difficulties associated with recognition and enforcement, are inherent in any derogation from art 21 of the Brussels Convention. Such a risk also exists in the case of art 16. Thus, the question whether the dispute falls within the scope of that article may itself be assessed differently by the two courts seised<sup>46</sup>. Also, if the court first seised declares that it has jurisdiction and gives a decision on the substance of the case which is irreconcilable with that given by the court second seised, which has exclusive jurisdiction under art 16, the decision of the latter court cannot be recognised in the contracting state of the court first seised, by virtue of art 27(3) of the Brussels Convention. d

76. Consequently, the fact that determining the existence of an agreement conferring jurisdiction, in particular in the form required by sub-para (c) of the first paragraph of art 17, may sometimes necessitate complex investigations does not seem to me to justify the general exclusion of art 17 from the derogation from art 21 which has been accepted by the court. The same is true, as I see it, of the fact that art 28 of the Brussels Convention does not cover art 17, with the result that the recognition and enforcement, in other contracting states, of a decision given by a court second seised which has exclusive jurisdiction under that article might be precluded by a contrary decision of the court first seised if the latter decision was delivered first. f

77. What matters, in my opinion, is that the risk of irreconcilable judgments can be significantly reduced. I consider such a reduction to be perfectly possible given that, pursuant to the case law of the Court of Justice, the courts concerned must assess the validity of the contested agreement conferring jurisdiction in accordance with the same principles and the same conditions, provided that the court second seised refrains from complying with the requirements of art 21 only after having made absolutely sure that it has exclusive jurisdiction. g

78. On the first point, the court's case law shows that an 'agreement conferring jurisdiction' must be regarded as an independent concept<sup>47</sup>. It follows that the formal and substantive conditions governing validity to which agreements conferring jurisdiction are subject must be assessed in the light of the requirements of art 17 alone. That rule has been given clear expression with regard to the assessment of formal requirements<sup>48</sup>, and, as regards the i

46 For example, the question as to whether or not there is a lease falling within the scope of art 16(1).

47 See Powell Duffryn plc v Petereit Case C-214/89 [1992] ECR I-1745 (para 14).

48 See the Elefanten Schuh case (paras 25, 26).

a rules governing substance, follows from the judgments in which the court has held that an 'agreement' requires that the parties actually give their consent<sup>49</sup>. As I see it, that rule was confirmed in the judgment in Benincasa's case, cited in footnote 41, above, where the court held that '[a] jurisdiction clause, which serves a procedural purpose, is governed by the provisions of the convention, whose aim is to establish uniform rules of international jurisdiction'<sup>50</sup>.

b 79. That case law has been extended to usage in international trade and commerce. The court has held that the usage to which art 17 refers cannot be frustrated by provisions of national legislation which require compliance with formal conditions additional to those permitted in the particular trade or commerce concerned<sup>51</sup>. Likewise, as the referring court points out, the Court of Justice has indicated the objective factors which the national court must take into consideration in order to determine whether a usage in the particular international trade or commerce in which the parties operate exists and whether that usage is or may be assumed to be known by the parties<sup>52</sup>.

c 80. The risk of judgments which are inconsistent as regards the validity of an agreement conferring jurisdiction will therefore be further reduced since the conditions required by art 17 of the Brussels Convention will have been clarified by the court<sup>53</sup>.

d 81. On the second point, I take the view that the court second seised should not be authorised to derogate from the requirements of art 21 of the Brussels Convention until it has made absolutely sure that it does have exclusive jurisdiction under an agreement conferring jurisdiction. It will therefore have to check whether the relevant agreement conferring jurisdiction satisfies the requirements of art 17. In addition to the conditions mentioned above, it must be satisfied that that agreement does concern 'disputes which have arisen or which may arise in connection with a particular legal relationship' as required by the first paragraph of art 17, and that it does not derogate from the rules governing exclusive jurisdiction laid down in art 16 and the provisions of the Brussels Convention which are applicable in matters of insurance and consumer contracts. Next, the court second seised will have to examine whether the agreement conferring jurisdiction does cover the dispute which has been brought before it. If there were any doubt as to the validity of the agreement conferring jurisdiction or its scope, the court second seised would have to stay proceedings pursuant to art 21.

e 82. The advantage of this solution, namely that art 17 of the Brussels Convention may constitute a derogation from art 21 only where there is no room for any doubt as to the jurisdiction of the court second seised, would be that it takes into account the requirements of international trade and commerce and at the same time makes economic operators aware of their own responsibilities by encouraging them to conclude agreements conferring jurisdiction which do not in fact leave room for any doubt as to their validity and their scope. That solution might thus prompt the representatives of the various economic operators to negotiate standard conditions which are explicit and extensively disseminated in the economic sector concerned.

i 49 See the Estasis Salotti case and the Segouras case.

50 See para 25.

51 See, in particular, the MSG case (para 23) and the Castelletti case (paras 33–39).

52 See the MSG case and the Castelletti case.

53 To date, the interpretation of that article has been the subject of around 15 references for a preliminary ruling.

83. In the light of the foregoing, I propose that the court's answer to the second question should be that art 21 of the Brussels Convention must be interpreted as meaning that a court second seised which has exclusive jurisdiction under an agreement conferring jurisdiction may, by way of derogation from that article, give judgment in the case without waiting for a declaration from the court first seised that it has no jurisdiction where there is no room for any doubt as to the jurisdiction of the court second seised.

C—The third, fourth, fifth and sixth questions

84. By its third question, the referring court is essentially asking whether art 21 of the Brussels Convention must be interpreted as meaning that it may be derogated from where, in general, the duration of proceedings before the courts of the contracting state in which the court first seised is established is excessively long.

85. The referring court explains that it has raised this question because of Gasser's argument to the effect that, in Latin countries such as Italy, Greece and France, the average duration of legal proceedings is excessively long, which, in Gasser's view, is contrary to the requirements of art 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Rome, 4 November 1950; TS 71 (1953); Cmd 8969) (hereinafter the ECHR).

86. The Commission raises doubts as to the admissibility of the third question and, therefore, of the questions which follow it and are related to it, on the ground that the referring court has not provided tangible evidence to show that the Tribunale civile e penale di Roma has infringed art 6 of the ECHR in the present case.

87. I do not share that point of view. I consider that, by that question, the national court did not mean to refer to the proceedings brought by MISAT before the Tribunale civile e penale di Roma. This question clearly has to do with whether, because the average duration of proceedings before the courts of the member state in which the court first seised is established is excessively long, the court second seised may disregard the requirements of art 21. In order for the Court of Justice to be able to give a useful answer to that question, which concerns a provision of the Brussels Convention and which is relevant for the decision to be given in the main proceedings, it was therefore not necessary for the referring court to provide information on the conduct of the procedure before the Tribunale civile e penale di Roma.

88. However, I support the Commission's view with regard to the answer to be given on the substance of this question. It does not really seem conceivable that it should be possible to refrain from applying art 21 of the Brussels Convention on the ground that the court first seised is established in a member state in whose courts there are, in general, excessive delays in dealing with cases. That would be tantamount to saying that the rules on lis pendens do not apply where the court first seised is established in one of certain member states.

89. Such an interpretation would be manifestly contrary to the scheme and the basis of the Brussels Convention. The convention does not contain any provision to the effect that its rules, in particular those of art 21, should cease to apply because of the length of proceedings before the courts in another contracting state. Moreover, it should be noted that the Brussels Convention is based on the trust which the member states accord to each other's legal a systems and judicial institutions<sup>54</sup>. It is on the basis of that trust that the convention establishes a compulsory system of jurisdiction which all the courts within its purview are required to observe. It is also that trust which enables the contracting states to waive the right to apply their internal rules on the recognition and enforcement of foreign judgments in favour of a simplified mechanism for recognition and enforcement. It is therefore also the basis of the legal certainty which the convention seeks to ensure by allowing the parties to forese with certainty which court will have jurisdiction.

b 90. In the light of those considerations, I propose that the court's answer should be that art 21 of the Brussels Convention must be interpreted as meaning that it cannot be derogated from where the duration of proceedings before the courts of the contracting state in which the court first seised is established is, in general, excessively long.

c 91. In view of that proposed answer, there is no need to rule on the fourth, fifth and sixth questions. Those questions are based on the premiss of a positive answer to the third question. Thus, by the fourth question, the referring court seeks to ascertain whether Italian Law No 89 of 24 March 2001 concerning compensation for damage caused by the unreasonable length of proceedings would none the less justify the application of art 21 of the Brussels Convention. By the fifth and sixth questions, as I understand them, it is asking the court to indicate, in the event of a positive answer to the third question, the circumstances in which the court second seised might derogate from the requirements of that article and the manner in which it might do so.

e V—CONCLUSION

92. In the light of the foregoing, I propose that the Court of Justice should answer the questions referred to it by the Oberlandesgericht Innsbruck as follows:

f '(1) It is for the national court to determine whether to refer a question to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling on the basis of a party's submissions or whether it is necessary to verify those submissions first. It is nevertheless incumbent on the national court to provide the Court of Justice with the factual and legal information enabling it to give an answer which will be of use to it in giving judgment in the main proceedings and to explain why it considers an answer to its questions necessary.

g (2) Article 21 of the Brussels Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters (hereinafter the Brussels Convention) must be interpreted as meaning that a court second seised which has exclusive jurisdiction under an agreement conferring jurisdiction may, by way of derogation from that article, give judgment in the case without waiting for a declaration from the court first seised that it has no jurisdiction where there is no room for any doubt as to the jurisdiction of the court second seised.

h (3) Article 21 of the Brussels Convention must be interpreted as meaning that it cannot be derogated from where the duration of proceedings before 9 December 2003. The COURT OF JUSTICE delivered the following judgment.

1. By judgment of 25 March 2002, received at the Court of Justice of the European Communities on 2 April 2002, the Oberlandesgericht (Higher Regional Court) Innsbruck referred to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling under the Protocol of 3 June 1971 on the interpretation by the Court of Justice of the Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters 1968 (OJ 1978 L304 p 36) (the Protocol), a number of questions on the interpretation of art 21 of the above-mentioned convention, as amended by the Convention on the Accession of the Kingdom of Denmark, Ireland and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland 1978 (OJ 1978 L304 p 1 and—amended text—p 77), by the Convention on the Accession of the Hellenic Republic 1982 (OJ 1982 L388 p 1), by the Convention on the Accession of the Kingdom of Spain and the Portuguese Republic 1989 (OJ 1989 L285 p 1) and by the Convention on the Accession of the Republic of Austria, the Republic of Finland and the Kingdom of Sweden 1996 (OJ 1997 C15 p 1) (the Brussels Convention or the convention). b

LEGAL BACKGROUND

3. The aim of the convention, according to its preamble, is to facilitate the reciprocal recognition and enforcement of judgments in accordance with art 293 EC (formerly art 220 of the EC Treaty) and to strengthen the legal protection of persons established in the Community. The preamble also states that it is necessary for that purpose to determine the international jurisdiction of the courts of the contracting states. f

4. The provisions on jurisdiction are contained in Title II of the Brussels Convention. Article 2 of the convention lays down the general rule that the courts in the state in which the defendant is domiciled are to have jurisdiction. Article 5 of the convention provides, however, that in matters relating to a contract the defendant may be sued in the courts for the place where the obligation which the action seeks to enforce was or should have been performed. g

5. Article 16 of the convention lays down rules governing exclusive jurisdiction. In particular, pursuant to art 16(1)(a), in proceedings which have as their object rights in rem in immovable property or tenancies of immovable property, the courts of the contracting state in which the property is situated are to have exclusive jurisdiction. h

6. Articles 17 and 18 of the convention deal with the attribution of jurisdiction. i

Article 17 is worded as follows:

‘(1) If the parties, one or more of whom is domiciled in a Contracting State, have agreed that a court or the courts of a Contracting State are to have jurisdiction to settle any disputes which have arisen or which may a arise in connection with a particular legal relationship, that court or those courts shall have exclusive jurisdiction. Such an agreement conferring jurisdiction shall be either:

(a) in writing or evidenced in writing, or

(b) in a form which accords with practices which the parties have established between themselves, or

b (c) in international trade or commerce, in a form which accords with a usage of which the parties are or ought to have been aware and which in such trade or commerce is widely known to, and regularly observed by, parties to contracts of the type involved in the particular trade or commerce concerned ...

c (3) Agreements ... conferring jurisdiction shall have no legal force if they are contrary to the provisions of Article 12 or 15 [insurance and consumer contracts], or if the courts whose jurisdiction they purport to exclude have exclusive jurisdiction by virtue of Article 16 ...'

7. Article 18 provides:

d 'Apart from jurisdiction derived from other provisions of this Convention, a court of a Contracting State before whom a defendant enters an appearance shall have jurisdiction. This rule shall not apply where appearance was entered solely to contest the jurisdiction, or where another court has exclusive jurisdiction by virtue of Article 16.'

e 8. The Brussels Convention also seeks to obviate conflicting decisions. Thus, under art 21, concerning lis pendens:

'Where proceedings involving the same cause of action and between the same parties are brought in the courts of different Contracting States, any court other than the court first seised shall of its own motion stay its proceedings until such time as the jurisdiction of the court first seised is established.'

f Where the jurisdiction of the court first seised is established, any court other than the court first seised shall decline jurisdiction in favour of that court.'

9. Finally, in relation to recognition, art 27 of the convention provides:

g 'A judgment shall not be recognised ...

(3) if the judgment is irreconcilable with a judgment given in a dispute between the same parties in the State in which recognition is sought ...'

h 10. According to the first paragraph of art 28 of the convention, '[m]oreover, a judgment shall not be recognised if it conflicts with the provisions [concerning insurance and consumer contracts and the matters referred to in art 16]'

THE MAIN PROCEEDINGS AND THE QUESTIONS REFERRED TO THE COURT

i 11. The registered office of Gasser is in Dornbirn, Austria. For several years it sold children's clothing to MISAT, of Rome, Italy.

12. On 19 April 2000 MISAT brought proceedings against Gasser before the Tribunale Civile e Penale (Civil and Criminal District Court) di Roma seeking a ruling that the contract between them had terminated ipso jure or, in the alternative, that the contract had been terminated following a disagreement between the two companies. MISAT also asked the court to find that it had not failed to perform the contract and to order Gasser to pay it damages for failure to fulfil the obligations of fairness, diligence and good faith and to reimburse certain costs. a

13. On 4 December 2000 Gasser brought an action against MISAT before the Landesgericht (Regional Court) Feldkirch, Austria, to obtain payment of outstanding invoices. In support of the jurisdiction of that court, the claimant submitted that it was not only the court for the place of performance of the contract, within the meaning of art 5(1) of the convention but was also the court designated by a choice-of-court clause which had appeared on all invoices sent by Gasser to MISAT, without the latter having raised any objection in that regard. According to Gasser, that showed that, in accordance with their practice and the usage prevailing in trade between Austria and Italy, the parties had concluded an agreement conferring jurisdiction within the meaning of art 17 of the Brussels Convention. b

14. MISAT contended that the Landesgericht Feldkirch had no jurisdiction, on the ground that the court of competent jurisdiction was the court for the place where it was established, under the general rule laid down in art 2 of the Brussels Convention. It also contested the very existence of an agreement conferring jurisdiction and stated that, before the action was brought by Gasser before the Landesgericht Feldkirch, it had commenced proceedings before the Tribunale Civile e Penale di Roma in respect of the same business relationship. d

15. On 21 December 2001, the Landesgericht Feldkirch decided of its own motion to stay proceedings, pursuant to art 21 of the Brussels Convention, until the jurisdiction of the Tribunale Civile e Penale di Roma had been established. It confirmed its own jurisdiction as the court for the place of performance of the contract, but did not rule on the existence or otherwise of an agreement conferring jurisdiction, observing that although the invoices issued by the claimant systematically included a reference to the courts of Dornbirn under the heading 'Competent Courts', the orders, on the other hand, did not record any choice of court. e

16. Gasser appealed against that decision to the Oberlandesgericht Innsbruck, contending that the Landesgericht Feldkirch should be declared to have jurisdiction and that proceedings should not be stayed.

17. The national court considers, first, that this is a case of lis pendens since the parties are the same and the claims made before the Austrian and Italian courts have the same cause of action within the meaning of art 21 of the Brussels Convention, as interpreted by the Court of Justice (see, to that effect, Gubisch Maschinenfabrik KG v Palumbo Case 144/86 [1987] ECR 4861). g

18. After noting that the Landesgericht Feldkirch had not ruled as to the existence of an agreement conferring jurisdiction, the national court raises the question whether the fact that one of the parties repeatedly and without objection settled invoices sent by the other even though those invoices contained a jurisdiction clause can be seen as acceptance of that clause, in accordance with art 17(1)(c) of the Brussels Convention. The national court states that such conduct by the parties reflects a usage in international trade and commerce which is applicable to the parties and of which they are aware or are deemed to be aware. In the event of the existence of an agreement conferring jurisdiction being established, then, according to the national court, the Landesgericht Feldkirch alone has jurisdiction to deal with the dispute under art 17 of the convention. In those circumstances, the question arises whether the obligation to stay proceedings, provided for in art 21 of the convention, should nevertheless apply. h a 19. In addition, the national court asks to what extent the excessive and generalised slowness of legal proceedings in the contracting state where the court first seised is established is liable to affect the application of art 21 of the Brussels Convention.

b 20. It was in those circumstances that the Oberlandesgericht Innsbruck stayed proceedings and referred the following questions to the court for a preliminary ruling (see [2003] IL Pr 216 at 231–232):

c ‘(1) May a court which refers questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling do so purely on the basis of a party’s (unrefuted) submissions, whether they have been contested or not contested (on good grounds), or is it first required to clarify those questions as regards the facts by the taking of appropriate evidence (and if so, to what extent)?

d (2) May a court other than the court first seised, within the meaning of the first paragraph of Art. 21 of the Brussels Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters [“the Brussels Convention”] review the jurisdiction of the court first seised if the second court has exclusive jurisdiction pursuant to an agreement conferring jurisdiction under Art. 17 of the Brussels Convention, or must the agreed second court proceed in accordance with Art. 21 of the Brussels Convention notwithstanding the agreement conferring jurisdiction?

e (3) Can the fact that court proceedings in a contracting state take an unjustifiably long time (for reasons largely unconnected with the conduct of the parties) so that material detriment may be caused to one party, have the consequence that the court other than the court first seised, within the meaning of the first paragraph of Art. 21, is not allowed to proceed in accordance with that provision?

f (4) Do the legal proceedings provided for by Italian Law No. 89 of March 24, 2001 justify the application of Art. 21 of the Brussels Convention even if a party is at risk of detriment as a consequence of the possible excessive length of proceedings before the Italian court and therefore, as suggested in Question 3, it would not actually be appropriate to proceed in accordance with Art. 21?

g (5) Under what conditions must the court other than the court first seised refrain from applying Art. 21 of the Brussels Convention?

(6) What course of action must the court follow if, in the circumstances described in Question 3, it is not allowed to apply Art. 21 of the Brussels Convention?

h Should it be necessary in any event, even in the circumstances described in Question 3, to proceed in accordance with Art. 21 of the Brussels Convention, there is no need to answer Questions 4, 5 and 6.’

THE FIRST QUESTION

i 21. By its first question, the national court seeks in essence to ascertain whether a national court may, under the Protocol, seek an interpretation of the Brussels Convention from the Court of Justice even where the national court is relying on the submissions of a party to the main proceedings, the merits of which it has not yet assessed.

22. In this case, the national court refers to the fact that the second question is based on the premiss, not yet confirmed by the trial judge, that an agreement conferring jurisdiction within the meaning of art 17 of the Brussels Convention designates the court within whose jurisdiction Dornbirn is located as the court having jurisdiction to settle the dispute in the main proceedings.

23. It must be borne in mind in that connection that, in the light of the division of responsibilities in the preliminary ruling procedure laid down by the Protocol, it is for the national court alone to define the subject matter of the questions which it proposes to refer to the Court of Justice. According to settled case law, it is solely for the national court before which the dispute has been brought, and which must assume the responsibility for the subsequent judicial decision, to determine in the light of the particular circumstances of each case both the need for a preliminary ruling in order to enable it to deliver judgment and the relevance of the questions which it submits to the court (see Van den Boogaard v Laumen Case C-220/95 [1997] All ER (EC) 517, [1997] ECR I-1147 (para 16), Farrell v Long Case C-295/95 [1997] All ER (EC) 449, [1997] ECR I-1683 (para 11), Trasporti Castelletti Spedizioni Internazionali SpA v Hugo Trumpy SpA Case C-159/97 [1999] ECR I-1597 (para 14) and Gantner Electronic GmbH v Basch Exploitatie Maatschappij BV Case C-111/01 [2003] ECR I-4207 (paras 34, 38)).

24. However, the spirit of co-operation which must prevail in the preliminary ruling procedure requires the national court, for its part, to have regard to the function entrusted to the Court of Justice, which is to assist in the administration of justice in the member states and not to deliver advisory opinions on general or hypothetical questions. In order to enable the court to provide a useful interpretation of Community law, it is appropriate that the national court should define the legal and factual context of the interpretation sought and it is essential for it to explain why it considers that a reply to its questions is necessary to enable it to give judgment (see to that effect the Gantner Electronic case, cited above (paras 35, 37, 38)).

25. According to the account of the facts given by the national court, the proposition that there may be an agreement conferring jurisdiction is not purely hypothetical.

26. Moreover, as has been emphasised both by the Commission of the European Communities and by Advocate General Léger in paras 38–41 of his opinion, the national court, before verifying the existence of a clause conferring jurisdiction within the meaning of art 17 of the Brussels Convention and the existence of usage in international trade and commerce in that connection—a process which may necessitate delicate and costly investigations—considered it necessary to refer to the court the second question, to establish whether the existence of an agreement conferring jurisdiction allows non-application of art 21 of the Brussels Convention. If that question is answered in the affirmative, the national court will have to rule as to the existence of such an agreement conferring jurisdiction and, if the existence thereof is established, it will have to consider itself to have exclusive jurisdiction to give judgment in the main proceedings. Conversely, if the answer is in the negative, art 21 of the Brussels Convention will have to apply, so that the question whether there is an agreement conferring jurisdiction will no longer be an issue with which the national court is concerned.

27. Consequently, the answer to the first question must be that a national court may, under the Protocol, refer to the Court of Justice a request for interpretation of the Brussels Convention, even where it relies on the submissions of a party to the main proceedings of which it has not yet examined the merits, provided that it considers, having regard to the particular circumstances of the case, that a preliminary ruling is necessary to enable it to give judgment and that the questions on which it seeks a ruling from the court are relevant. It is nevertheless incumbent on the national court to provide the

- a Court of Justice with factual and legal information enabling it to give a useful interpretation of the convention and to explain why it considers that a reply to its questions is necessary to enable it to give judgment.

THE SECOND QUESTION

- b 28. By its second question, the national court seeks in essence to establish whether art 21 of the Brussels Convention must be interpreted as meaning that, where a court is the second court seised and has exclusive jurisdiction under an agreement conferring jurisdiction, it may, by way of derogation from that article, give judgment in the case without waiting for a declaration from the court first seised that it has no jurisdiction.

- c Observations submitted to the court

29. According to Gasser and the United Kingdom government, this question should be answered in the affirmative. In support of their interpretation, they rely on the judgment in Overseas Union Insurance Ltd v New Hampshire Insurance Co Case C-351/89 [1992] 2 All ER 138, [1991] ECR I-3317, in which it was held (at para 26) that it is 'without prejudice to the case where the court second seised has exclusive jurisdiction under the convention and in particular under art 16 thereof' that the court held that art 21 of the Brussels Convention was to be interpreted as meaning that, where the jurisdiction of the court first seised is contested, the court second seised may, if it does not decline jurisdiction, only stay the proceedings and may not itself examine the jurisdiction of the court first seised. According to Gasser and the United Kingdom government, there is no reason to treat arts 16 and 17 of the convention differently in relation to the lis pendens rule.

- f 30. The United Kingdom government states that, whilst art 17 comes below art 16 in the hierarchy of the bases of jurisdiction provided for in the Brussels Convention, it nevertheless prevails over the other bases of jurisdiction, such as art 2 and the special rules on jurisdiction contained in arts 5 and 6 of the convention. The national courts are thus required to consider of their own motion whether art 17 is applicable and requires them, if appropriate, to decline jurisdiction.

- g 31. The United Kingdom government adds that it is necessary to examine the relationship between arts 17 and 21 of the Brussels Convention taking account of the needs of international trade. The commercial practice of agreeing which courts are to have jurisdiction in the event of disputes should be supported and encouraged. Such clauses contribute to legal certainty in commercial relationships, since they enable the parties, in the event of a dispute, easily to determine which courts will have jurisdiction to deal with it.

- h 32. Admittedly, the United Kingdom government observes that, to justify the general rule embodied in art 21 of the Brussels Convention, the court held, in para 23 of the Overseas Union Insurance case, that in no case is the court second seised in a better position than the court first seised to determine whether the latter has jurisdiction. However, that reasoning is not applicable to cases in which the court second seised has exclusive jurisdiction under art 17 of the Brussels Convention. In such cases, the court designated by the agreement conferring jurisdiction will, in general, be in a better position to rule as to the effect of such an agreement since it will be necessary to apply the substantive law of the member state in whose territory the designated court is situated.

- i 33. Finally, the United Kingdom government concedes that the thesis which it defends might give rise to a risk of irreconcilable judgments. To avoid that risk, it proposes that the Court of Justice hold that a court first seised whose jurisdiction is contested in reliance on an agreement conferring jurisdiction must stay proceedings until the court which is designated by that agreement, and is the court second seised, has given a decision on its own jurisdiction. a

34. MISAT, the Italian government and the Commission, on the other hand, favour the application of art 21 of the Brussels Convention and therefore consider that the court second seised is required to stay proceedings. b

35. The Commission, like the Italian government, considers that the derogation under which the court second seised has jurisdiction, on the ground that it enjoys exclusive jurisdiction under art 16 of the Brussels Convention, cannot be extended to a court designated under a choice-of-court clause.

36. The Commission justifies the derogation from the rule laid down in art 21, in the event of recourse to art 16, by reference to the first paragraph of art 28 of the Brussels Convention, according to which decisions given in the state of the court first seised in disregard of the exclusive jurisdiction of the court second seised, based on art 16 of the convention, cannot be recognised in any contracting state. It would therefore be inconsistent to require, under art 21 of the convention, that the second court, which alone has jurisdiction, should stay proceedings and decline jurisdiction in favour of a court which has no jurisdiction. Such a course of action would result in parties obtaining a decision from a court lacking jurisdiction, which could not take effect in the contracting state where it was given. In such circumstances, the aim of the Brussels Convention, which is to improve legal protection and for that purpose to ensure the cross-border recognition and enforcement of judgments in civil matters would not be attained. c

37. The foregoing considerations do not apply, however, in the event of jurisdiction being conferred on the court second seised under art 17 of the Brussels Convention. Article 28 of the convention does not apply to the infringement of art 17, which forms part of Section 6 of Title II of the convention. A decision given in breach of the exclusive jurisdiction which the court second seised derives from a choice-of-court clause should be recognised and enforced in all the contracting states. f

38. The Commission also states that art 21 of the Brussels Convention seeks not only to obviate irreconcilable decisions which, under art 27(3) of the convention, are not recognised, but also to uphold economy of procedure, the court second seised being required initially to stay proceedings, and then to decline jurisdiction as soon as the jurisdiction of the court first seised is established. That clear rule is conducive to legal certainty. g

39. Referring to para 23 of Overseas Union Insurance, the Commission considers that the court second seised is not in any circumstances in a better position than the court first seised to determine whether the latter has jurisdiction. In this case, the Italian court is in as good a position as the Austrian court to establish whether it has jurisdiction under art 17 of the Brussels Convention, because, by virtue of commercial usage between Austria and Italy, the parties conferred exclusive jurisdiction upon the court in whose jurisdiction the registered office of the claimant in the main proceedings is located. h

40. Finally, the Commission and the Italian government observe that the jurisdiction referred to in art 17 of the Brussels Convention is distinguished from that referred to in art 16 thereof in that, within the scope of the latter article, the parties cannot conclude agreements conferring jurisdiction contrary to art 16 (see art 17(3)). Moreover, the parties are entitled at any time to cancel or amend a jurisdiction clause of the kind referred to in art 17. Such a case i a would arise, for example, where, under art 18 of the convention, a party brought an action in a state other than that to the courts of which jurisdiction has been attributed and the other party enters an appearance before the court seised without contesting its jurisdiction (see to that effect Elefanten Schuh GmbH v Jacqmain Case 150/80 [1981] ECR 1671 (paras 10, 11)).

Findings of the court

c 41. It must be borne in mind at the outset that art 21 of the Brussels Convention, together with art 22 on related actions, is contained in Section 8 of Title II of the convention, which is intended, in the interests of the proper administration of justice within the Community, to prevent parallel proceedings before the courts of different contracting states and to avoid conflicts between decisions which might result therefrom. Those rules are therefore designed to preclude, so far as possible and from the outset, the possibility of a situation arising such as that referred to in art 27(3) of the convention, that is to say the non-recognition of a judgment on account of its irreconcilability with a judgment given in proceedings between the same parties in the state in which recognition is sought (see the Gubisch Maschinenfabrik case (para 8), cited above). It follows that, in order to achieve those aims, art 21 must be interpreted broadly so as to cover, in principle, all situations of lis pendens before courts in contracting states, irrespective of the parties' domicile (see the Overseas Union Insurance case (para 16), cited above).

e 42. From the clear terms of art 21 it is apparent that, in a situation of lis pendens, the court second seised must stay proceedings of its own motion until the jurisdiction of the court first seised has been established and, where it is so established, must decline jurisdiction in favour of the latter.

f 43. In that regard, as the court also observed in para 13 of the Overseas Union Insurance case, art 21 does not draw any distinction between the various heads of jurisdiction provided for in the Brussels Convention.

g 44. It is true that, in para 26 of the Overseas Union Insurance case, before holding that art 21 of the Brussels Convention must be interpreted as meaning that, where the jurisdiction of the court first seised is contested, the court second seised may, if it does not decline jurisdiction, only stay proceedings and may not itself examine the jurisdiction of the court first seised, the Court of Justice stated that its ruling was without prejudice to the case where the court second seised has exclusive jurisdiction under the convention and in particular under art 16 thereof.

h 45. However, it is clear from para 20 of the same judgment that, in the absence of any claim that the court second seised had exclusive jurisdiction in the main proceedings, the Court of Justice simply declined to prejudge the interpretation of art 21 of the convention in the hypothetical situation which it specifically excluded from its judgment.

i 46. In this case, it is claimed that the court second seised has jurisdiction under art 17 of the convention.

47. However, that fact is not such as to call in question the application of the procedural rule contained in art 21 of the convention, which is based clearly and solely on the chronological order in which the courts involved are seised.

48. Moreover, the court second seised is never in a better position than the court first seised to determine whether the latter has jurisdiction. That jurisdiction is determined directly by the rules of the Brussels Convention, which are common to both courts and may be interpreted and applied with the same authority by each of them (see, to that effect, the Overseas Union Insurance case (para 23)). a

49. Thus, where there is an agreement conferring jurisdiction within the meaning of art 17 of the Brussels Convention, not only, as observed by the Commission, do the parties always have the option of declining to invoke it and, in particular, the defendant has the option of entering an appearance before the court first seised without alleging that it lacks jurisdiction on the basis of a choice-of-court clause, in accordance with art 18 of the convention, but, moreover, in circumstances other than those just described, it is incumbent on the court first seised to verify the existence of the agreement and to decline jurisdiction if it is established, in accordance with art 17, that the parties actually agreed to designate the court second seised as having exclusive jurisdiction. b

50. The fact nevertheless remains that, despite the reference to usage in international trade or commerce contained in art 17 of the Brussels Convention, real consent by the parties is always one of the objectives of that provision, justified by the concern to protect the weaker contracting party by ensuring that jurisdiction clauses incorporated in a contract by one party alone do not go unnoticed (see Mainschiffahrts-Genossenschaft eG (MSG) v Les Gravières Rhénanes SARL Case C-106/95 [1997] All ER (EC) 385, [1997] ECR I-911 (para 17) and the Castelletti case (para 19)). d

51. In those circumstances, in view of the disputes which could arise as to the very existence of a genuine agreement between the parties, expressed in accordance with the strict formal conditions laid down in art 17 of the Brussels Convention, it is conducive to the legal certainty sought by the convention that, in cases of lis pendens, it should be determined clearly and precisely which of the two national courts is to establish whether it has jurisdiction under the rules of the convention. It is clear from the wording of art 21 of the convention that it is for the court first seised to pronounce as to its jurisdiction, in this case in the light of a jurisdiction clause relied on before it, which must be regarded as an independent concept to be appraised solely in relation to the requirements of art 17 (see, to that effect, Powell Duffryn plc v Petereit Case C-214/89 [1992] ECR I-1745 (para 14)). e

52. Moreover, the interpretation of art 21 of the Brussels Convention flowing from the foregoing considerations is confirmed by art 19 of the convention which requires a court of a contracting state to declare of its own motion that it has no jurisdiction only where it is 'seised of a claim which is principally concerned with a matter over which the courts of another Contracting State have exclusive jurisdiction by virtue of Article 16'. Article 17 of the Brussels Convention is not affected by art 19. g
h

53. Finally, the difficulties of the kind referred to by the United Kingdom government, stemming from delaying tactics by parties who, with the intention of delaying settlement of the substantive dispute, commence proceedings before a court which they know to lack jurisdiction by reason of the existence of a jurisdiction clause are not such as to call in question the interpretation of any provision of the Brussels Convention, as deduced from its wording and its purpose. i

54. In view of the foregoing, the answer to the second question must be that art 21 of the Brussels Convention must be interpreted as meaning that a court second seised whose jurisdiction has been claimed under an agreement

- a conferring jurisdiction must nevertheless stay proceedings until the court first seised has declared that it has no jurisdiction.

THE THIRD QUESTION

- b 55. By its third question, the national court seeks in essence to ascertain whether art 21 of the Brussels Convention must be interpreted as meaning that it may be derogated from where, in general, the duration of proceedings before the courts of the contracting state in which the court first seised is established is excessively long.

Admissibility

- c 56. The Commission raises doubts as to the admissibility of this question and, therefore, of the questions which follow it and are related to it, on the ground that the national court has not provided concrete information such as to allow the inference that the Tribunale Civile e Penale di Roma has failed to fulfil its obligation to give judgment within a reasonable time and thereby infringed art 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Rome, 4 November 1950; TS 71 (1953); Cmd 8969) (hereinafter the ECHR).

- d 57. That view cannot be accepted. As observed by Advocate General Léger in para 87 of his opinion, it was indeed in relation to the fact that the average duration of proceedings before courts in the member state in which the court first seised is established is excessively long that the national court submitted the question whether the court second seised may validly decline to apply art 21 of the Brussels Convention. To answer that question, which the latter court considered relevant for the decision to be given in the main proceedings, it is not necessary for it to provide information as to the conduct of procedure before the Tribunale Civile e Penale di Roma.

- e 58. It is therefore necessary to answer the third question.

Substance

Observations submitted to the court

- f 59. According to Gasser, art 21 of the Brussels Convention must be interpreted in any event as excluding excessively protracted proceedings (that is to say of a duration exceeding three years), which are contrary to art 6 of the ECHR and would entail restrictions on freedom of movement as guaranteed by arts 28, 39, 48 and 49 EC (formerly arts 30, 48, 58 and 59 of the EC Treaty). It is the responsibility of the European Union authorities or the national courts to identify those states in which it is well known that legal proceedings are excessively protracted.

- g 60. Therefore, in a case where no decision on jurisdiction has been given within six months following the commencement of proceedings before the court first seised or no final decision on jurisdiction has been given within one year following the commencement of those proceedings, it is appropriate, in Gasser's view, to decline to apply art 21 of the Brussels Convention. In any event, the courts of the state where the court second seised is established are entitled themselves to rule both on the question of jurisdiction and, after slightly longer periods, on the substance of the case.

- i 61. The United Kingdom government also considers that art 21 of the Brussels Convention must be interpreted in conformity with art 6 of the ECHR. It observes in that connection that a potential debtor in a commercial case will often bring, before a court of his choice, an action seeking a judgment

exonerating him from all liability, in the knowledge that those proceedings will go on for a particularly long time and with the aim of delaying a judgment against him for several years. a

62. The automatic application of art 21 in such a case would grant the potential debtor a substantial and unfair advantage which would enable him to control the procedure, or indeed dissuade the creditor from enforcing his rights by legal proceedings. b

63. In those circumstances, the United Kingdom government suggests that the Court of Justice should recognise an exception to art 21 whereby the court second seised would be entitled to examine the jurisdiction of the court first seised where:

(1) the claimant has brought proceedings in bad faith before a court without jurisdiction for the purpose of blocking proceedings before the courts of another contracting state which enjoy jurisdiction under the Brussels Convention and c

(2) the court first seised has not decided the question of its jurisdiction within a reasonable time.

64. The United Kingdom government adds that those conditions should be appraised by the national courts, in the light of all the relevant circumstances. d

65. MISAT, the Italian government and the Commission, on the contrary, advocate the full applicability of art 21 of the Brussels Convention, notwithstanding the excessive duration of court proceedings in one of the states concerned.

66. According to MISAT, the effect of an affirmative answer to the third question would be to create legal uncertainty and increase the financial burden for litigants, who would be required to pursue proceedings at the same time in two different states and to appear before the two courts seised, without being in a position to foresee which court would give judgment before the other. The already abundant litigation on the jurisdiction of courts would thereby be pointlessly increased, contributing to paralysis of the legal system. e

67. The Commission states that the Brussels Convention is based on mutual trust and on the equivalence of the courts of the contracting states and establishes a binding system of jurisdiction which all the courts within the purview of the convention are required to observe. The contracting states can therefore be obliged to ensure mutual recognition and enforcement of judgments by means of simple procedures. This compulsory system of jurisdiction is at the same time conducive to legal certainty since, by virtue of the rules of the Brussels Convention, the parties and the courts can properly and easily determine international jurisdiction. Within this system, Section 8 of Title II of the convention is designed to prevent conflicts of jurisdiction and conflicting decisions. f

68. It is not compatible with the philosophy and the objectives of the Brussels Convention for national courts to be under an obligation to respect rules on lis pendens only if they consider that the court first seised will give judgment within a reasonable period. Nowhere does the convention provide that courts may use the pretext of delays in procedure in other contracting states to excuse themselves from applying its provisions. g

69. Moreover, the point from which the duration of proceedings becomes excessively long, to such an extent that the interests of a party may be seriously affected, can be determined only on the basis of an appraisal taking account of all the circumstances of the case. That is an issue which cannot be settled in the context of the Brussels Convention. It is for the European Court of Human h

- a Rights to examine the issue and the national courts cannot substitute themselves for it by recourse to art 21 of the convention.

Findings of the court

- b 70. As has been observed by the Commission and by Advocate General Léger in paras 88 and 89 of his opinion, an interpretation of art 21 of the Brussels Convention whereby the application of that article should be set aside where the court first seised belongs to a member state in whose courts there are, in general, excessive delays in dealing with cases would be manifestly contrary both to the letter and spirit and to the aim of the convention.

- c 71. First, the convention contains no provision under which its articles, and in particular art 21, cease to apply because of the length of proceedings before the courts of the contracting state concerned.

- d 72. Second, it must be borne in mind that the Brussels Convention is necessarily based on the trust which the contracting states accord to each other's legal systems and judicial institutions. It is that mutual trust which has enabled a compulsory system of jurisdiction to be established, which all the courts within the purview of the convention are required to respect, and as a corollary the waiver by those states of the right to apply their internal rules on recognition and enforcement of foreign judgments in favour of a simplified mechanism for the recognition and enforcement of judgments. It is also common ground that the convention thereby seeks to ensure legal certainty by allowing individuals to foresee with sufficient certainty which court will have jurisdiction.

- f 73. In view of the foregoing, the answer to the third question must be that art 21 of the Brussels Convention must be interpreted as meaning that it cannot be derogated from where, in general, the duration of proceedings before the courts of the contracting state in which the court first seised is established is excessively long.

THE FOURTH, FIFTH AND SIXTH QUESTIONS

- g 74. In view of the answer given to the third question, it is unnecessary to answer the fourth, fifth and sixth questions, which were submitted by the national court only in the event of the third question being answered in the affirmative.

COSTS

- h 75. The costs incurred by the Italian and United Kingdom governments and by the Commission, which have submitted observations to the court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court.

On those grounds, the Court of Justice (Full Court) in answer to the questions referred to it by the Oberlandesgericht Innsbruck by judgment of 25 March 2002, hereby rules:

- i (1) A national court may, under the Protocol of 3 June 1971 on the interpretation by the Court of Justice of the Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters 1968, as amended by the Convention on the Accession of the Kingdom of Denmark, Ireland and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland 1978, by the Convention on the Accession of the Hellenic Republic 1982, by the Convention on the Accession of the Kingdom of Spain and the Portuguese Republic 1989 and by the Convention on the Accession of the Republic of Austria, the Republic of Finland and the Kingdom of Sweden 1996, refer to the Court of Justice a request for interpretation of the Brussels Convention, even where it relies on the submissions of a party to the main proceedings of which it has not yet examined the merits, provided that it considers, having regard to the particular circumstances of the case, that a preliminary ruling is necessary to enable it to give judgment and that the questions on which it seeks a ruling from the court are relevant. It is nevertheless incumbent on the national court to provide the Court of Justice with factual and legal information enabling it to give a useful interpretation of the convention and to explain why it considers that a reply to its questions is necessary to enable it to give judgment.

(2) Article 21 of the Brussels Convention must be interpreted as meaning that a court second seised whose jurisdiction has been claimed under an agreement conferring jurisdiction must nevertheless stay proceedings until the court first seised has declared that it has no jurisdiction.

(3) Article 21 of the Brussels Convention must be interpreted as meaning that it cannot be derogated from where, in general, the duration of proceedings before the courts of the contracting state in which the court first seised is established is excessively long.

(Case C-383/01)

COURT OF JUSTICE OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES

JUDGES PUISSOCHET (PRESIDENT OF THE SIXTH CHAMBER, ACTING FOR THE PRESIDENT), WATHELET (RAPPORTEUR), SCHINTGEN (PRESIDENTS OF CHAMBERS), GULMANN, LA PERGOLA, JANN, SKOURIS, MACKEN, COLNERIC, VON BAHR AND CUNHA RODRIGUES

ADVOCATE GENERAL JACOBS

6 NOVEMBER 2002, 27 FEBRUARY, 17 JUNE 2003

- European Community – Taxation – Discrimination – Denmark having no domestic production of motor vehicles and charging duty upon first registration of new or used motor vehicle imported into national territory – Whether duty having ‘equivalent effect to a quantitative restriction’ or being ‘internal taxation’ – Whether duty precluded by Community law – Articles 28, 90 EC (formerly EC Treaty, arts 30, 95).*
- There was no domestic production of motor vehicles in Denmark. Where a new or used vehicle was imported into national territory, charges were payable upon its first registration, but not upon any subsequent resale. The main proceedings concerned a claim for repayment of the registration duty paid following the purchase of a new vehicle, which proceedings had been brought on the basis that the duty charged had been in breach of art 28 EC<sup>a</sup> (formerly art 30 of the EC Treaty), since its excessive level rendered the importation of motor vehicles into national territory under normal commercial conditions impossible, to the benefit of domestic purchases of previously registered used motor vehicles. The national court decided to stay the proceedings and refer to the Court of Justice of the European Communities under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) a question concerning whether the national duty was a measure having equivalent effect to a quantitative restriction prohibited by art 28 EC or discriminatory internal taxation prohibited by art 90 EC<sup>b</sup> (formerly art 95 of the EC Treaty).
- Held – A charge on the registration of a new motor vehicle established by a member state that had no domestic production of its own constituted internal taxation that was to be interpreted in the light of, and was not precluded by, art 90 EC. Obstacles to trade of a fiscal nature or having an effect equivalent to customs duties did not fall within the scope of art 28 EC. Further, although, in the absence of comparable domestic production, it was not permissible for the member states to impose on products which escaped the application of the provisions contained in art 90 EC charges of such an amount that the free movement of goods within the common market would be impeded; in the main proceedings, it was clear that, in fact, there was no impediment to the free movement of goods. Therefore, it could not be considered that the national charges had ceased to be internal taxation within the meaning of art 90 EC, such that they should be classified as a measure having equivalent effect to a quantitative restriction, for the purposes of art 28 EC. Moreover, although art 90 EC guaranteed the complete neutrality of internal taxation as regards competition between domestic products and imported products, that article could not be invoked against internal taxation imposed on imported products where there was no similar or competing production, and it was not to provide a basis for censuring the excessiveness of the level of taxation which a member state might adopt for particular products, in the absence of any protective discriminatory effect (see judgment paras 32, 37, 38, 40–42, below).

Reference

- d* By order of 26 September 2001, the Østre Landsret (Eastern Regional Court) of Denmark referred two questions (set out at judgment para 22, below) to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) on the interpretation of arts 28 and 30 EC (formerly arts 30 and 36 of the EC Treaty). The questions were raised in the context of proceedings between De Danske Bilimportører (DBI), a professional association of car importers, and Skatteministeriet, Told- og Skattestyrelsen (Danish Ministry of Fiscal Affairs) concerning the levy of a charge on the registration of new motor vehicles. Written observations were submitted on behalf of: De Danske Bilimportører by K Dyekjær-Hansen and T Ryhl, Advokaterne; the Danish government by J Molde, acting as agent, and K Hagel-Sørensen, Advokat; the Italian government by U Leanza, acting as agent, and M Fiorilli, Avvocato dello Stato; the Finnish government by E Bygglin, acting as agent; the Commission of the European Communities by HC Støvlbæk, acting as agent. Oral observations were made on behalf of: De Danske Bilimportører, represented by K Dyekjær-Hansen; the Danish government, represented by J Molde and K Hagel-Sørensen; the Finnish government, represented by T Pynnä, acting as agent; and the Commission, represented by HC Støvlbæk. The language of the case was Danish. The facts are set out in the opinion of the Advocate General.

27 February 2003. The Advocate General (FG Jacobs) delivered the following opinion<sup>1</sup>.

- h* 1. In Denmark, new passenger cars are subject to a registration tax levied at a particularly high rate. An association of car importers objects to the level of the tax and has challenged it in the national courts on a number of grounds, alleging in particular that it constitutes a measure having an effect equivalent to a quantitative restriction on imports, prohibited by art 28 EC (formerly art 30 of the EC Treaty). In that connection, the Østre Landsret (Eastern Regional Court) wishes to know (i) whether such a tax is capable of being caught by that prohibition and, (ii) if so, whether it may none the less be justified on any of the grounds set out in art 30 EC (formerly art 36 of the EC Treaty) or accepted by the Court of Justice of the European Communities in its case law.

RELEVANT TREATY PROVISIONS

2. The EC Treaty contains three specific sets of provisions prohibiting obstacles to trade in goods between member states: arts 23 and 25 EC (formerly arts 9 and 12 of the EC Treaty); arts 28 to 30 EC, on which a ruling is sought; and art 90 EC (formerly art 95 of the EC Treaty). They apply to different types of obstacle respectively, customs duties and charges having equivalent effect, quantitative restrictions and measures having equivalent effect, and internal taxation and the conditions of their application also differ.

3. Articles 23 to 31 EC concern free movement of goods. They provide for a customs union and for a prohibition of quantitative restrictions on trade.

4. In particular, art 25 EC provides:

‘Customs duties on imports and exports and charges having equivalent effect shall be prohibited between Member States. This prohibition shall also apply to customs duties of a fiscal nature.’<sup>2</sup>

5. Article 28 EC provides: ‘Quantitative restrictions on imports and all measures having equivalent effect shall be prohibited between Member States.’ Article 29 EC (formerly art 34 of the EC Treaty) embodies an identical prohibition as regards exports.

6. In Procureur du Roi v Dassonville<sup>3</sup>, the court defined measures having such an effect as all those which are ‘capable of hindering, directly or indirectly, actually or potentially, intra-Community trade’.

7. Under art 30 EC, however, arts 28 and 29 EC do not preclude—

‘prohibitions or restrictions ... justified on grounds of public morality, public policy or public security; the protection of health and life of humans, animals or plants ... Such prohibitions or restrictions shall not, however, constitute a means of arbitrary discrimination or a disguised restriction on trade between Member States.’

8. In addition, the Court of Justice has developed a line of case law, starting with the Cassis de Dijon case (Rewe-Zentral AG v Bundesmonopolverwaltung für Branntwein)<sup>4</sup>, to the effect that indistinctly applicable measures (which apply in the same way to domestic and imported goods) may be caught by art 28 EC if they restrict trade but may be justified if they are necessary in order to satisfy mandatory requirements such as the effectiveness of fiscal supervision, the protection of public health, the fairness of commercial transactions and the defence of the consumer, provided that they are also proportionate to the desired objective and are the means of achieving that objective which least hinders trade.

9. Articles 90 to 93 EC (formerly arts 95, 96, 98 and 99 of the EC Treaty), in the title on common rules on competition, taxation and approximation of laws, concern tax provisions. Article 90 EC provides:

‘No Member State shall impose, directly or indirectly, on the products of other Member States any internal taxation of any kind in excess of that imposed directly or indirectly on similar domestic products.

2 Article 25 EC is often referred to in tandem with art 23 EC, which contains the same prohibition but does not explicitly include ‘customs duties of a fiscal nature’; for the sake of simplicity I shall refer only to art 25.

3 Case 8/74 [1974] ECR 837 (para 5).

4 Case 120/78 [1979] ECR 649.

a Furthermore, no Member State shall impose on the products of other Member States any internal taxation of such a nature as to afford indirect protection to other products.'

BACKGROUND AND PROCEDURE

b 10. All member states except Germany, France, Luxembourg, Sweden and the United Kingdom levy a registration tax on the acquisition of new passenger cars. In Italy the amount is fixed, in Belgium and Portugal the tax base is the cubic capacity of the vehicle, and in the remaining states the basis of calculation is the price of the car. In Spain, Greece, the Netherlands, Austria and Finland, that basis is the price excluding VAT, whilst in Denmark and c Ireland it already includes VAT. Percentage rates vary considerably between member states, and may also vary according to other criteria (such as cubic capacity or type of use) within each member state<sup>5</sup>.

d 11. Although variation is thus great and the differences in method of calculation make precise comparisons difficult, the amount and proportion of registration tax levied in Denmark are very significantly higher than in any other member state. The tax is levied at a rate of 105% of purchase price up to a threshold determined each year—apparently some DKK 53,000 (€7,122) in 2002—and 180% of the remainder, where the price taken as tax base already includes 25% VAT and a flat-rate mark-up of 9% to take account of dealer margin, regardless of the margin actually taken by the dealer. It would thus e seem that a car with a basic price equivalent to €10,000 is likely to cost the purchaser some €30,000 in all, including some €17,000 in registration tax, and one whose basic price is €30,000 would cost some €107,000 in all, including some €67,000 in registration tax.

f 12. Such an overall tax burden often exceeding 200% is unrivalled in any other member state—the next heaviest rates of taxation, in Finland and Greece, do not attain 100% for an engine capacity of under 2,000 cc and the proportion of registration tax is less there because it is levied before VAT. In Luxembourg, by complete contrast, the only tax on the purchase price of (new) cars is 15% VAT, and Belgium, Germany, Greece, France, Italy, Sweden and the United Kingdom all levy under 30% in all.

g 13. The Danish car registration tax dates apparently from 1924 and it seems to be common ground that its purpose has always been largely to raise revenue, although other considerations—such as environmental and road-safety concerns—may also be present.

h 14. Denmark does not possess any car manufacturing industry, so that all new cars entering the Danish market are in practice imported from another member state or from outside the Community. The tax is levied on a cars first registration in Denmark, but not on any subsequent resale; it is also levied when a secondhand car is imported.

i 15. Before 1990, the tax was applied to imported secondhand cars in a way which did not adequately reflect depreciation in their value. Considering the tax on both new and secondhand cars to be incompatible with Community rules, the Commission initiated Treaty-infringement proceedings against 5 This and much other useful background information is to be found in the Commission of the European Communities' communication to the Council of the European Communities and the European Parliament on taxation for passenger cars in the European Union—options for action at national and Community levels (COM(2002) 431 final).

Denmark, culminating in the court's judgment of 11 December 1990<sup>6</sup>, in which it was found that, by imposing a registration duty on imported used motor vehicles generally based on an estimated value higher than the real value of the vehicle<sup>7</sup> with the result that imported used motor vehicles were taxed more heavily than used motor vehicles sold on the domestic market after being registered in Denmark, the Kingdom of Denmark had failed to fulfil its obligations under what is now art 90 EC.

16. The court dismissed, however, the allegation of infringement in so far as it related to the tax on new cars. Its reasoning was as follows<sup>8</sup>.

17. The Commission's action was based solely on what is now art 90 EC, and both parties agreed that the tax was internal taxation for that purpose. However, the role of that article is to guarantee complete neutrality of internal taxation as between domestic and imported products. It cannot be invoked against a tax imposed on imported products where there is no similar or competing domestic production; in particular, in the absence of any discriminatory or protective effect, it does not provide a basis for censuring the excessiveness of the level of taxation which a member state might adopt for particular products.

18. The court acknowledged that, as it had held in Firma August Stier v Hauptzollamt Hamburg-Ericus<sup>9</sup>, member states may not impose charges so high as to impede the free movement of products where, in the absence of comparable domestic production, the prohibitions in art 90 EC do not apply. However, such charges could be assessed only on the basis of what are now arts 28 to 30 EC, and the action was not brought on that basis<sup>10</sup>.

19. The applicant before the national court in the present proceedings, De Danske Bilimportører (DBI), is a trade association of car importers. In 1999 it purchased a new Audi motor car—presumably imported from another member state—for the use of its director, for a total price (including delivery costs) of DKK 498,546 of which DKK 297,456 was registration tax.

20. It has brought proceedings against the Danish Treasury in which it claims that the tax is unlawful in the light of a number of provisions of Community law, and claims a reimbursement.

21. In addition to arts 28, 29 and 90 EC, quoted above, it refers to arts 11A(2)(a) and 33 of the Sixth VAT Directive<sup>11</sup>, under which, respectively, the taxable amount for VAT purposes must include all other taxes, duties, levies and charges, and member states may maintain or introduce taxes, duties and charges other than turnover taxes only if they do not give rise to formalities connected with the crossing of frontiers; to arts 3(1)(g) and 10 EC (formerly arts 3(1)(g) and 5 of the EC Treaty), which together require member states to refrain from any action jeopardising the attainment of undistorted competition in the internal market; to art 81 EC (formerly art 85 of the EC Treaty), which a prohibits agreements and concerted practices restricting or distorting competition; and to Commission Regulation (EC) 1475/95<sup>12</sup>, which applies art 81(3) EC to motor vehicle distribution agreements in the Community.

22. The Østre Landsret, hearing the case, wishes to obtain guidance from the court specifically on the interpretation of art 28 EC; in its order for reference, it does not address the alternative claims based on the other provisions mentioned in the preceding paragraph. It has stayed the proceedings and referred the following questions for a preliminary ruling:

c '(1) Can an indirect duty (registration duty) charged by a Member State, which in the case of new cars amounts to 105% of DKK 52 800 and 180% of the remainder of the taxable value, be a measure having an effect equivalent to a quantitative restriction on imports and for that reason prohibited under Article 28 EC (reference is made in this connection to the Court's judgment in [Commission v Denmark (para 13)])?

d '(2) If the answer to Question (1) is yes: can that registration duty be justified on the grounds that are mentioned in Article 30 EC or follow from the Court's case law on Article 28 EC (reference is made to [the Rewe-Zentral case])?'

23. Written observations have been submitted by DBI, by the Danish government representing the Treasury as defendant in the main proceedings, by the Italian and Finnish governments, and by the Commission, all of whom except the Italian government presented oral argument at the hearing.

e ASSESSMENT

24. The essential question here is whether a car registration tax of the kind described may be assessed under art 28 EC; the possibility of justification arises in the event of an affirmative answer. The national court does not explicitly seek guidance on any other provisions—indeed, with regard to certain of DBI's contentions, it has rather pointedly refrained from doing so. However, art 28 EC must be viewed in the context of the structure of the Treaty, so that some consideration of arts 25 and 90 EC will also be necessary.

Articles 25, 28 and 90 EC in general

25. I have set out these provisions briefly above<sup>13</sup>, but a further recapitulation of some of their most relevant features may be helpful.

26. Article 25 EC prohibits any customs duties or charges having equivalent effect. The concept covers any charge, however small, levied by reason of the fact that goods cross a frontier<sup>14</sup>. It includes charges in connection with administrative formalities such as inspections, unless the charges do not exceed the actual costs involved and unless the formalities in question are obligatory and uniform, are prescribed by Community law in the general interest of the Community and promote free movement of goods, in particular by neutralising obstacles which could arise from unilateral measures<sup>15</sup>. Otherwise, the prohibition is absolute and independent of any restrictive effect on trade—although it might be thought that some degree of restrictive effect is normally inherent in any such charge. Where such a duty or charge exists, however minute it may be, compliance with art 25 EC can be achieved only by its abolition.

27. Article 90 EC prohibits any internal taxation that discriminates against similar goods from other member states or indirectly protects domestic production in any way. Supplementing art 25 EC, its aim is to ensure free movement of goods in normal conditions of competition by eliminating any protection which might result from discriminatory internal taxation, and thus to guarantee complete neutrality of internal taxation as between domestic and imported products<sup>16</sup>.

28. As with art 25 EC, there is no provision for taxation to escape the prohibition on the basis of any de minimis rule or any justifying ground. However, the prohibition is not of taxation but of discrimination or protection so that it is enough to eliminate the discriminatory or protective element in order to comply with the article. The situation is considered globally when deciding whether there is any discrimination or protection, so that compensating factors may come into play—depending on the conditions of its application, a flat-rate tax may in fact give rise to discrimination<sup>17</sup>, and it would be possible to conceive of a charge applied only to imported products which in fact redresses an imbalance caused by the imposition of a different charge on domestic goods at an earlier stage in production.

29. Article 28 EC prohibits all quantitative restrictions and measures having equivalent effect. The concept is very broad<sup>18</sup> and again (it is generally accepted) there is no de minimis rule<sup>19</sup>. However, in contrast to the situations governed by arts 25 or 90 EC, if a national measure is in principle caught by art 28 EC, it may none the less be justified, and thus escape the prohibition, on any of the grounds set out in art 30 EC and the court's case law<sup>20</sup>.

30. Compared to arts 25 and 90 EC, art 28 EC is clearly very broad in scope and serves something of the purpose of a safety net. The court has said that it covers in general all barriers to imports which are not already specifically covered by other Treaty provisions<sup>21</sup>. In relation to those articles, each of which constitutes a lex specialis, it has been described as a lex generalis<sup>22</sup>.

31. Clearly, in view of the different consequences flowing from application of the three articles, it is important to know with certainty in each case which one

However, the court has accepted that some restrictions may be so uncertain and indirect in their effects as not to be regarded as capable of hindering trade: see Corsica Ferries France SA v Gruppo Antichi Ormeggiatori del Porto di Genova Coop arl Case C-266/96 [1998] ECR I-3949 (para 31), BASF AG v Präsident des Deutschen Patentamts Case C-44/98 [1999] ECR I-6269 (para 16) and Schutzverband gegen Unlauteren Wettbewerb v TK-Heimdienst Sass GmbH Case C-254/98 [2000] ECR I-151 (para 30).

- a of them is relevant. If a charge is caught by art 25 EC it must be abolished, whereas if it is caught by art 90 EC then only the discriminatory or protective element need be removed. A measure caught by art 28 EC may be permitted if it pursues one or more justified aims in a manner proportionate to their achievement, whereas the scope for justification under arts 25 or 90 EC is very much more limited. On the other hand, those two articles apply only in a limited set of circumstances, always involving a charge or tax, whereas art 28 EC is capable of applying to a very wide variety of measures which may hinder trade.

32. In those circumstances, it is not surprising that the court has repeatedly indicated that there are barriers between the respective scopes of the three articles, only one of which can apply to any given measure.

33. In the Cie commerciale de l'Ouest case (paras 20–22)<sup>23</sup>, for example, it noted that—

‘the scope of Article [28 EC] does not extend to the obstacles covered by other, specific provisions of the Treaty ... obstacles which are of a fiscal nature or have an effect equivalent to customs duties and are covered by Articles [25 and 90 EC] do not fall within the prohibition laid down in Article [28 EC] ... the Court must consider, first, whether a measure ... is covered by Articles [25 or 90 EC], and only if it finds that it is not will it have to decide whether the measure in question comes within the scope of Article [28 EC] ...’

34. And as regards the separate scopes of arts 25 and 90 EC, the court has consistently held<sup>24</sup> that—

‘provisions relating to charges having equivalent effect and those relating to discriminatory internal taxation cannot be applied together, with the result that, under the system established by the Treaty, the same charge cannot belong to both categories at the same time ...’

Articles 25 and 90 EC in the present case

35. The registration tax in issue is clearly fiscal in nature. On the basis of that characteristic and in the light of the case law quoted in para 33, above, it might fall to be examined under either art 25 EC as a charge having an effect equivalent to that of a customs duty or art 90 EC as a measure of internal taxation.

36. However, art 25 EC applies only to charges levied by reason of the fact that goods cross a frontier. Here, although the tax is probably levied in practice shortly after importation, it seems that the chargeable event is the first registration for use on the road in Denmark rather than the crossing of the frontier. Although the court does not have full details of the mode of application, it may be presumed that the tax would also apply if an enthusiast were to build his own car in Denmark and seek to use it on the road there. Conversely, it seems plausible that a vehicle imported solely in order to be exhibited in a museum or, perhaps, used exclusively on private property might escape the levy. It has not in any event been suggested, either before this court or—apparently—before the national court, that the tax is in fact a customs duty or charge having equivalent effect, that it is levied by reason of the fact that cars cross a frontier or that it should be assessed in the light of art 25 EC. a

37. If those assumptions on the application of the registration tax are correct, art 90 EC would thus seem the yardstick against which to measure it even if it is in fact levied only on imported cars. As the court noted in EC Commission v France<sup>25</sup>—

‘even a charge which is borne by a product imported from another Member State, when there is no identical or similar domestic product, does not constitute a charge having equivalent effect but internal taxation within the meaning of Article [90 EC] if it relates to a general system of internal dues applied systematically to categories of products in accordance with objective criteria irrespective of the origin of the products.’ b

38. The registration tax in issue here appears to meet that definition. It applies systematically to categories of vehicles in accordance with objective criteria. Vehicle registration taxes have moreover consistently been assessed by the court as internal taxation within the meaning of what is now art 90 EC<sup>26</sup>. And in Commission v Denmark<sup>27</sup>, the Danish tax was regarded by both parties c and by the court as internal taxation within the meaning of that article. d

39. However, in that judgment the court very clearly decided that art 90 EC was not infringed by the tax on new cars since there was no similar or competing domestic production and thus no possible discriminatory or protective effect. With regard to used cars, it appears from the order for reference that Denmark has complied with the judgment in Commission v Denmark and that the discriminatory element found by the court has now been eliminated. e

40. It is true that DBI has alleged, in a comment on other aspects of its case before the national court, that the fact that a fixed rate 9% dealer margin is automatically included when taxing new cars but not used cars and that spare parts and repairs are not affected favours used cars (overwhelmingly a ‘domestic product’) over new cars (all imported) and thus introduces a discrimination prohibited by art 90 EC. However, no other argument having been submitted—and no question having been referred—in that regard, I do not think it appropriate for the court to address that point. f

41. At this stage, therefore, it seems necessary to conclude that, being part of a system of internal dues rather than being levied by reason of the crossing of a frontier, the registration tax in issue falls to be assessed with reference not to art 25 EC but to art 90 EC; however, since it contains no element which is discriminatory or protective, it is not incompatible with that provision. g

Article 28 EC in the present case h

42. If the Danish car registration tax falls to be assessed by reference to art 90 EC, it may be doubted whether, having escaped prohibition under that article, it could then be considered under art 28 EC. None the less, it might be considered that a manifestly excessive tax, clearly liable to hinder trade in the goods to which it applies, could exceptionally be assessed under art 28 EC. Indeed, in Commission v Denmark the court indicated that member states may i a not impose charges so high as to impede the free movement of products where, in the absence of comparable domestic production, the prohibitions in art 90 EC do not apply, and that such charges could be assessed on the basis of art 28 EC.

b 43. However, at least two sets of objections can be raised to that approach. It seems irreconcilable with, first, the system of the Treaty as repeatedly emphasised in the case law, namely the mutually exclusive nature of the prohibitions contained in arts 25, 28 and 90 EC, and, second, the court's overall approach to the analysis of art 28 EC, in particular as regards the absence of any threshold of applicability and the nature of the justifications which may be available.

c Mutually exclusive nature of arts 25, 28 and 90 EC

d 44. As I have noted above<sup>28</sup>, the court has consistently held that art 28 EC does not apply to obstacles to trade which fall to be assessed by reference to other specific Treaty provisions, so that obstacles to be assessed under arts 25 and 90 EC do not fall within its scope.

e 45. Such a rule is justified by the structure of the provisions in question.

f 46. Articles 25 and 28 EC are clearly parallel provisions designed to cover parallel situations and not to overlap. The same seems clear for art 90 EC, in relation to those articles, even though its wording is slightly different and it is to be found in a different title of the Treaty.

g 47. It may also be justified on grounds of legal certainty.

h 48. The three articles explicitly concern different types of measure and apply different criteria to their assessment. It is important that national authorities—and affected individuals—should know what criteria each specific measure must meet. Member states must be able to determine the areas in which their fiscal sovereignty may freely be exercised and be aware of the limits beyond which that sovereignty is constrained. Moreover, if a fiscal obstacle to trade falling within the scope of, but not within the prohibition laid down by, either art 25 or art 90 EC could be assessed under art 28 EC, it could in principle be allowed if it were justified on one of the grounds set out in art 30 EC or in the Cassis de Dijon case law<sup>29</sup>. If on the other hand it fell within either prohibition, it could not be allowed on those grounds. It does not seem reasonable that a fiscal measure adopted by a member state should be thus assessed on the basis of an alternative standard.

i 49. To ignore the distinctions between the three sets of rules would thus introduce undesirable uncertainty in an area where clarity is required.

50. It appears that the only case other than Commission v Denmark in which the court may have alluded to the possibility of applying what is now art 28 EC to exceptionally high internal taxation is the Stier case, which it cited in Commission v Denmark. It may be noted, though, that in the Stier case the court did not refer specifically to that provision but more generally to free movement of goods, no restraint on which, resulting from the imposition of particularly high charges, can be presumed to exist 'when the rate of taxation remains within the general framework of the national system of taxation of which the tax in question is an integral part<sup>30</sup>. Indeed, it seems plausible that the court may have been thinking rather of what is now art 25 EC<sup>31</sup>. a

28 See para 33, above.

29 But see para 64 et seq, below.

51. It may also be noted that the court's statements did not in fact lead to examination under art 28 EC in either the Stier case or Commission v Denmark and might thus be viewed as adventitious in those contexts.

52. It is true that the court has, in more than one other instance, examined under what is now art 28 EC fiscal measures which might have been thought to fall under art 90 EC. In EC Commission v France<sup>32</sup>, for example, as the Commission has pointed out, it examined a tax advantage granted to newspaper publishers in respect of publications printed in France but not in other member states, and concluded that since such an advantage was likely to restrict imports it must be regarded as a measure having an effect equivalent to a quantitative restriction prohibited by art 28 EC. And in Criminal proceedings against Franzén<sup>33</sup> a national licensing system for importers of alcoholic beverages, under which traders had to pay a high fixed charge to apply for a licence and a high annual fee to keep the licence, was examined with reference to art 28 EC and found incompatible. That system, the court held, constituted an obstacle to the importation of alcoholic beverages from other member states in that it imposed additional costs on such beverages, including payment of charges and fees for the grant of a licence. b

53. However, it might be thought that Commission v France, in which the possibility that art 90 EC might be a more appropriate yardstick does not seem to have been raised, should have been decided on a different basis, and the type of charge involved in Franzén's case can undoubtedly be distinguished from a tax on goods, so that art 90 EC would not in any event have been appropriate. c

54. It thus seems to me desirable, for the reasons expressed in paras 45–49, above, that a clear dividing line should be maintained between the scopes of the articles in question and that fiscal measures should not—unless they in some way fall outside the scope of both arts 25 and 90 EC—be examined under art 28 EC. d

Scheme and analysis of art 28 EC

55. Not only does the suggested assessment of an internal tax under art 28 EC clash with the scheme of the Treaty, it also and even more significantly clashes in various ways with the scheme of that article itself and with the court's analysis of it in consistent case law. e

56. However, trade in any product is at least potentially restricted to some extent when it is taxed, compared to trade in the same product untaxed. Actual or appreciable restriction of trade may however be unlikely to result (where there is no alternative domestic product) unless the rate of tax is particularly high. Conversely, there is a clear danger that an exceptionally heavy domestic tax, such as the one in issue here, will have a noticeable effect on imports. f

57. To examine such taxes under art 28 EC would, however, give rise to two major difficulties. g

a    Need for a threshold

58. First, any tax on goods of which there is no domestic production must fall within the Dassonville definition as 'capable of hindering, directly or indirectly, actually or potentially, intra-Community trade'. A number of member states have no car production, so that any registration taxes levied there would be concerned, whatever their level, and other taxes may be levied on many types of goods not produced domestically.

b    59. Yet to regard all such charges as falling within the scope of the prohibition in art 28 EC would be a momentous innovation going far beyond what is suggested in Commission v Denmark.

c    60. Thus, if 'charges of such an amount that the free movement of goods within the common market would be impeded'<sup>34</sup> are to be caught by that provision, some (presumably high) threshold of applicability must be set.

d    61. However, on the one hand, the introduction of such a threshold is impossible to reconcile with the general view, reflected in the court's consistent case law, that there is not even a de minimis exception to art 28 EC<sup>35</sup>; and on the other hand, in defining such a threshold, it would seem impossible to meet the necessary requirements of practical applicability and legal certainty without selecting some purely arbitrary criterion.

e    62. If such difficulties are to be overcome, the proper route might seem to be via clarification in the Treaty itself rather than judicial intervention, particularly since the authors of the Treaty appear to have intended the effects of internal taxation on intra-Community trade to be dealt with in accordance with the provisions of art 90 EC.

Type of justification available

f    63. The second major problem concerns the fact that measures caught by art 28 EC cannot, according to the court's case law, be justified on economic grounds, a point which relates more particularly to the second question posed by the national court.

g    64. If the Danish car registration tax is to be examined under art 28 EC and if it proves to be caught by the prohibition in that article then the answer to that second question is, in principle, clear. Once a restriction falls to be assessed under art 28 EC, the various grounds of justification available under art 30 EC or the Cassis de Dijon case law may come into play.

h    65. However, as both DBI and the Commission have pointed out, the court has held that 'aims of a purely economic nature cannot justify a barrier to the fundamental principle of the free movement of goods'<sup>36</sup>.

i    66. Yet the primary purpose of taxation is in general always the economic one of raising revenue for the state. Some charges also seek to render less attractive the purchase of certain goods, considered to have harmful or undesirable consequences but not to warrant outright prohibition. None the less, the goods in question often display great elasticity of demand and can thus provide considerable general income for the state.

<sup>35</sup> See for example the case law cited in footnote 19, above; it may be noted that the criterion of uncertain and indirect effect referred to there would be of no assistance in a case such as the present.

<sup>36</sup> Case C-120/95 [1998] All ER (EC) 673, [1998] ECR I-1831 (para 39): see also EEC Commission v Italy Case 7/61 [1961] ECR 317 at 329, EC Commission v Italy Case 95/81 [1982] ECR 2187 (para 27) and Duphar BV v Netherlands Case 238/82 [1984] ECR 523 (para 23).

67. If a charge compatible with art 90 EC were caught by the prohibition in art 28 EC, its inherently economic nature would appear, on the basis of the case law cited, to disqualify it from any justification. a

68. Such an outcome would be perverse, requiring taxes not prohibited by art 90 EC to run, none the less, the gauntlet of art 28 EC without allowing the state to plead in justification the very aim for which they were levied, namely the raising of revenue, though it can scarcely be denied that the aim of financing public expenditure by public taxation is itself justifiable. b

69. However, the case law cited by DBI and the Commission is not entirely conclusive in support of such a categorical view.

70. In the Duphar case<sup>37</sup> the court stated that art 30 EC cannot justify a measure 'whose primary objective is budgetary', implying that justification can be available only if the primary objective is other than economic. In Campus Oil Ltd v Minister for Industry and Energy<sup>38</sup>, it accepted that, where measures are justified by the needs of public security, the fact that they also make it possible to achieve other objectives of an economic nature does not exclude the application of art 30 EC—which still does not cover a situation where public interest concerns are merely secondary. In Decker v Caisse de Maladie des Employés Privés<sup>39</sup>, the court referred only to 'aims of a purely economic nature'<sup>40</sup> and allowed that the risk of seriously undermining the financial balance of a social security system might constitute an overriding reason in the general interest. c

71. That case law seems to suggest that an economic objective, such as raising revenue to finance public spending, cannot itself constitute a justification under art 30 EC or the Cassis de Dijon case law but that its presence does not negate the existence of a public interest justification of that kind if (i) it is subsidiary to the latter aim or (ii) it provides the means of achieving that aim. In those circumstances, many levies would still seem likely to remain incapable of justification. d

72. In the present case, the Danish government has stated that the car registration tax is levied essentially for reasons of public finance (it accounts for some 9.5% of all state revenue from excise duties and consumer taxes) but that environmental concerns (to reduce traffic congestion and encourage public transport) are also present. e

73. The aims of levying the tax would thus appear incapable of falling within the scope of art 30 EC or the court's case law relating to justification. f

74. If they were to do so, however, it would still be necessary for the levying of the tax to comply with the principle of proportionality; it must be proportionate to the objective to be achieved<sup>41</sup>, and it cannot qualify for a derogation if the aims sought can be achieved as effectively using measures which are less restrictive of intra-Community trade<sup>42</sup>. In that case, it would be for the national court to verify compliance with the principle. g

a Final considerations

75. The difficulties involved in establishing—in a manner consistent with the existing case law—both a threshold which could trigger the application of art 28 EC to internal taxation and a scheme of possible justifications for such taxation reinforce in my view the conclusion that art 28 is not the appropriate provision in the light of which to review measures of internal taxation, even though they may have a de facto restrictive effect on intra-Community trade.

b 76. I am aware that such a conclusion appears to indicate a lacuna in the Treaty where none would be expected. It does indeed seem totally incompatible with the aims of the internal market for a member state to be able to tax certain imported goods to such an extent that the flow of intra-Community trade is appreciably affected.

c 77. It may also seem anomalous—having regard to the case law on arts 25 and 90 EC—that the most minute charge levied on the occasion of goods crossing a frontier infringes the Treaty whilst a very high internal tax in many cases does not, regardless of the respective effects of each on intra-Community trade.

d 78. However, the answer to both apparent anomalies may lie in part, when compatibility with art 90 EC is in issue, in a more careful scrutiny of the extent to which any disputed tax actually forms a coherent part of a normal system of taxation in the member state in question—scrutiny of a kind which has been carried out, in slightly different contexts, in the past<sup>43</sup>. For that purpose, it might also be relevant to consider the level of the tax in relation both to that of other national taxes in comparable fields and even to differential rates of such taxation in the other member states.

e 79. It may finally be recalled that the Commission has submitted certain recommendations to the Council and the Parliament in its communication of 6 September 2002<sup>44</sup>. Those recommendations seek, inter alia, to achieve a degree of restructuring and approximation of national taxation on motor vehicles with a view in particular to improving the functioning of the internal market and encouraging CO2 emissions reduction. I express no view on the content of those recommendations but a legislative initiative seems to me to be more appropriate, for a matter of taxation, than a case-by-case approach under art 28 EC.

g CONCLUSION

80. I am therefore of the opinion that the Court of Justice should give the following answer to the Østre Landsret:

h A charge levied by a member state on the first registration of a motor vehicle is not in principle a measure having an effect equivalent to a quantitative restriction on imports prohibited under art 28 EC but falls to be assessed under art 90 EC as internal taxation, unless the mode of imposition is such that it constitutes a customs duty or charge having equivalent effect within the meaning of art 25 EC.

17 June 2003. THE COURT OF JUSTICE delivered the following judgment.

i 1. By order of 26 September 2001, received at the Court of Justice of the European Communities on 5 October 2001, the Østre Landsret (Eastern Regional Court) referred to the court for a preliminary ruling under art 234 EC (formerly art 177 of the EC Treaty) two questions on the interpretation of arts 28 and 30 EC (formerly arts 30 and 36 of the EC Treaty).

2. The questions were raised in the context of proceedings between De Danske Bilimportører (DBI), a professional association of car importers, and the Skatteministeriet (Danish Ministry of Fiscal Affairs) concerning the levy of a charge on the registration of new motor vehicles.

LEGAL BACKGROUND

Community provisions

3. Articles 23 to 31 EC (formerly arts 9 to 37 of the EC Treaty), which form Title I, entitled 'Free movement of goods', of the EC Treaty, introduce a customs union and prohibit quantitative restrictions on trade between member states.

4. In particular, art 25 EC states:

'Customs duties on imports and exports and charges having equivalent effect shall be prohibited between Member States. This prohibition shall also apply to customs duties of a fiscal nature.'

5. Furthermore, under art 28 EC, '[q]uantitative restrictions on imports and all measures having equivalent effect shall be prohibited between Member States'. Article 29 EC contains an identical prohibition in respect of exports.

6. However, under art 30 EC:

'The provisions of Articles 28 and 29 shall not preclude prohibitions or restrictions on imports, exports or goods in transit justified on grounds of public morality, public policy or public security; the protection of health and life of humans, animals or plants ... Such prohibitions or restrictions shall not, however, constitute a means of arbitrary discrimination or a disguised restriction on trade between Member States.'

7. Articles 90 to 93 EC (formerly arts 95 to 99 of the EC Treaty) form Ch 2, entitled 'Tax provisions', of Title VI, entitled 'Common rules on competition, taxation and approximation of laws', of the Treaty.

8. Article 90 EC states:

'No Member State shall impose, directly or indirectly, on the products of other Member States any internal taxation of any kind in excess of that imposed directly or indirectly on similar domestic products.'

Furthermore, no Member State shall impose on the products of other Member States any internal taxation of such a nature as to afford indirect protection to other products.'

National legislation

9. The lov om registreringsafgift af motorkøretøjer (Law on registration duty on motor vehicles), in the version resulting from Consolidating Law No 222 of 14 April 1999, which was applicable at the material time, provides for the levy of a charge, known as 'registration duty', on new motor vehicles. That charge, levied upon first registration of the vehicle in the national territory, is based on the purchase price. The rate of the charge is 105% on the first portion, which is fixed annually, and 180% on the remainder of the price. In 1999, the first portion was DKK 52,800.

- a 10. Furthermore, the price taken as the tax base already includes 25% value added tax and a flat-rate mark-up of 9% to take account of dealer margin, regardless of the margin actually taken by the dealer.
- b 11. It is apparent from the documents before the Court of Justice that the principal purpose of the registration duty is to raise tax revenue, although other considerations such as environmental protection and road safety may also account for the levy.
- c 12. Since the duty is levied upon first registration of the vehicle in Denmark, but not upon any subsequent resale, it is also levied when a used vehicle is imported into Denmark.
- d 13. Before 1990, the registration duty was applied to imported used vehicles in a way which did not adequately reflect depreciation in their value. Therefore, in EC Commission v Denmark Case C-47/88 [1990] ECR I-4509, the court held that, by imposing a registration duty on imported used motor vehicles generally based on an estimated value which is higher than the real value of the vehicle, with the result that imported used motor vehicles were taxed more heavily than used motor vehicles sold on the domestic market after being registered in Denmark, the Kingdom of Denmark had failed to fulfil its obligations under art 95 of the EEC Treaty (which became art 95 of the EC Treaty and is now, after amendment, art 90 EC).
- e 14. In the infringement proceedings which resulted in that judgment, the Commission of the European Communities also contested the compatibility of the registration duty on new motor vehicles with art 95 of the Treaty, having regard in particular to the very high level of the duty.
- f 15. The court however rejected that claim of infringement after having found that art 95 of the Treaty could not be invoked against internal taxation imposed on imported products where there is no similar or competing domestic production, and that, in particular, that article did not provide a basis for censuring the excessiveness of the level of taxation which the member states might adopt for particular products, in the absence of any discriminatory or protective effect (see Commission v Denmark (para 10)).
